R E P O R T.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE appointed to inquire into the CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS, 1866—1869, their Administration, Operation, and Effect; and who were instructed, That they have power to receive Evidence which may be tendered concerning similar systems in British Colonies, or in other Countries, and to Report whether the said CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS should be maintained, amended, or repealed;—HAVE agreed to the following REPORT :—

INTRODUCTORY.

AFTER an inquiry, which has extended over a period almost unprecedented in the history of Parliamentary Committees, your Committee are in a position to present their Report.

Your Committee were first appointed in June 1879, on the motion of the Secretary of State for War, for the purpose of inquiring into the administration, operation, and effect of the Contagious Diseases Acts, 1866-1869, and they were also empowered to receive evidence concerning similar systems in the British Colonies, or in other countries, and of reporting whether the Acts should be maintained, amended, extended, or repealed.

Since that time they have been re-appointed four times, have examined 71 witnesses, and have sat 68 days.

Owing to the lamented death of the Right Honourable W. N. Massey, who occupied the Chair of your Committee during the Sessions 1879—1881, your Committee have been deprived of the advantage which they would have derived, in the subsequent conduct of their inquiry, and in the preparation of their Report, from his intimate acquaintance with the history and working of the Acts.

It will be observed, if the lists of the Committee, as nominated in 1879, and in the second Session of 1880, are compared, that the Dissolution and General Election of the latter year considerably altered its composition.

In consequence of the length to which it was necessary to extend the inquiry with respect to the operation of the Acts in Great Britain and Ireland, your Committee being desirous to report in the present Session, found themselves unable to receive evidence with reference to the systems prevailing in British Colonies or foreign countries. Your Committee believe that owing to the difference between English and foreign and colonial habits and social institutions, such an inquiry, if prosecuted, would not have thrown any additional light on the questions referred to them.

At an early stage of their proceedings it was thought desirable by your Committee to divide the inquiry into two branches :

(1st.) The hygienic effect of the Acts, especially on the health of the Army and Navy; and (2nd.) The constitutional, moral and social, aspects of their principles and administration.

The extent of the subject induced your Committee to exclude from their hygienic inquiry any special investigation into the effect of the Acts on the Navy, and to direct their attention principally to the Army, which affords adequate basis for observation and inference. Some important evidence was presented as to the effect of the system on the civil population.

In the first branch, viz., the hygienic question, seven witnesses were called on behalf of the War Department, and four by the opponents of the Acts.

Of the remaining 60 witnesses who gave evidence on the second part of the inquiry, i.e., the constitutional, moral and social aspects of the principles and administration of the Acts, 25 were called by the supporters, and 35 by the opponents of the system.

The 25 Government witnesses include persons belonging to the following classes: Metropolitan police inspectors employed in administering the Acts, four; physicians, four; surgeon, one; non-professional persons (male), five; clergymen of the Established Church, two; Roman Catholic priests, three; Dissenting minister, one; superintendent of Lock Hospital, one; police constables, three; serjeant in a Line regiment, one. Those who gave evidence against the Acts may be classified under the following heads: chief constables, five; physician, one; clergymen of the Established Church, two; Dissenting ministers, twelve; non-professional persons (male), nine; (female), six. It is, however, right to add that of these witnesses, several were called with respect to special cases arising out of the working of the Acts.

SUMMARY OF THE CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS, 1864—1869.

The Contagious Diseases Acts which your Committee are directed to report upon, were passed in the years 1866, 1868, and 1869. They were preceded by the first Contagious Diseases Act, which was passed in 1864, and repealed in 1866. This Statute provided in substance that on information being laid before a justice of the peace by a superintendent or inspector of police, or a medical practitioner, showing that he had good cause to believe that a woman was a common prostitute and infected with venereal disease, and that she had been within the limits of certain districts within a specified time for purposes of prostitution, the justice could order her to be taken to a certified hospital for examination. Provision was also made for voluntary submission to examination on the part of women, and on the certificate of the examining medical officer that the woman was diseased, it was enacted that a justice should issue an order for her detention in hospital for a period not exceeding three months. This Act, while making no provision for the erection of hospitals, contained regulations for the inspection and supervision of such hospitals as might become available for the purposes of the Act from any source. It did not, like subsequent legislation, actually enforce examination, but it imposed penalties on women who, being ordered to submit to examination, refused to do so, or quitted hospital without being duly discharged. It also imposed penalties on owners, occupiers, and managers of houses, rooms, and places within the limits of any subjected district for permitting prostitutes, who were known, or whom there was reasonable cause to believe to be affected with a contagious disease, to resort to such houses, &c., for purposes of prostitution.

For the purposes of the Act of 1866, the Admiralty or Secretary of State for War, as the case may be, are empowered to provide hospitals, or places to be certified as hospitals, and to appoint the visiting surgeons and inspectors. The expenses of the Acts are to be provided for in the Army and Navy Estimates.

No hospital, however, can be certified under this Act, unless at the time of the granting of a certificate adequate provision is made for the moral and religious instruction of the women detained therein under the Act; and if at any subsequent time it appears that in any such hospital adequate provision for that purpose is not made, the certificate is to be withdrawn.

The

The most important provisions of the Act, on which the sections above-mentioned are consequential, are those which deal with the periodical medical examinations of common prostitutes, and their detention, if diseased, in a hospital.

By Section 15, where an information on oath is laid before a justice by a superintendent of police, charging, to the effect that the informant has good cause to believe that a woman therein named is a common prostitute, and either is resident within the limits of any place to which this Act applies, or being resident within five miles of those limits, has, within 14 days before the laying of the information, been within those limits for the purpose of prostitution, the justice may, if he thinks fit, issue a notice calling on such woman to appear at a certain time and place, which notice the superintendent of police shall cause to be served on her. Sect. 15.

If the woman appears to the summons, or if no such appearance is made, and it is proved that the notice was properly served on her, the justice on being satisfied on oath of the truth of the information, may order the woman to be subjected to a periodical medical examination by the visiting surgeon for any period not exceeding one year, for the purpose of ascertaining at the time of each such examination whether she is affected with a contagious disease. This order is to specify the time and place at which the woman shall attend for the first examination. Sect. 16.

Any woman may, by a voluntary submission in writing, signed by her in the presence of the superintendent, subject herself to a periodical examination for any period not exceeding one year. Sect. 17.

The times and places of examination are to be fixed by the visiting surgeon, subject to regulations by the Admiralty or Secretary of State for War. Sect. 18.

If on examination the woman is found diseased, she may be detained in hospital, under the certificate of the visiting surgeon, until discharged by the chief medical officer. Sect. 20.

It is provided that no woman shall be detained longer than three months, unless the medical officer of the hospital, and the inspector of certified hospitals, or the visiting surgeon for the place whence she came, certify that further detention for treatment is requisite; she may then be further detained, but no detention under one certificate shall be longer than six months. Sect. 24.

Any woman who refuses to go to a certified hospital after the certificate of the visiting surgeon that she is diseased, may be conveyed there by the police. Power is also given for a woman, who thinks herself unjustly detained, to go before a justice, who may discharge her on being satisfied that she is free from disease. Sect. 25.

Any woman subjected to examination and refusing to be examined, or quitting hospital before being discharged therefrom, or disobeying hospital regulations, is liable, on summary conviction, to imprisonment with or without hard labour.

No order for periodical examination shall be in force for more than a year, and if a woman is certified to be free from disease on her discharge from a hospital, the order ceases to operate. Sect. 32.

Any woman who desires to be relieved from examination, and who is not detained in a hospital, may apply, in writing, to a justice, who shall hear the case; and if he is satisfied that she has ceased to be a common prostitute, or if, with his approval, she enters into a recognizance for her good behaviour during three months, he may order her to be released therefrom. Sects. 33—35.

An owner or occupier within the limits to which this Act applies who knowingly allows a diseased prostitute to resort to his house for the purpose of prostitution, is liable to a penalty not exceeding 20 £, or to imprisonment for six months, with or without hard labour. Sect. 36.

“The periodical examinations” according to present practice, take place at intervals of a fortnight.

The Act of 1868 merely enacts that the term “superintendent” shall include “head constable, &c.,” in Ireland. Act of 1868.

The Act of 1869 extended locally the operation of the Acts, and provided, amongst other things:—

First, that any woman attending under the provisions of the Act of 1866 for examination, and found by the visiting surgeon to be in such a condition that he could not properly examine her, should, if such surgeon had reasonable grounds for believing her affected with a contagious disease, be liable to be detained in a certified hospital until she could be properly examined, so that she should not be so detained for a period exceeding five days.

Second, that a voluntary submission, in writing, should have the same effect as a magistrate's order subjecting her to examination.

Third, that a woman might be detained for a period not exceeding three months, in addition to the six months allowed under the Act of 1866, if a certificate to the effect that her further detention for medical treatment was requisite was given at the expiration of such six months; so, nevertheless, that no woman should be detained under one certificate for a longer time in the whole than nine months.

The Acts apply to 13 districts in Great Britain, and 2 in Ireland, selected on account of the number of soldiers and sailors quartered in them, and the amount and virulence of venereal disease they gave proof of in periods anterior to the passing of the Acts.

The limits of many of the above-named places, hereafter referred to as "subjected districts," include, for the purposes of the Acts, localities geographically outside them. Thus, for instance, Plymouth and Devonport include amongst other places, Dartmouth. The Acts apply not merely to common prostitutes residing within the limits of the subjected districts, but also to common prostitutes, who, being resident within 10 miles of such limits, or, having no settled place of abode, have within fourteen days before the laying of the information, either been within those limits for the purpose of prostitution, or been outside of those limits for the purposes of prostitution in the company of men resident within those limits.

REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION, 1871.

Report, Royal Commission, 1871.

Before the end of 1869 a formidable opposition to the Acts had arisen, supported by many persons of station and intelligence, and among others by several ladies, who resented this legislation as insulting to their sex, and tending to the deterioration of public morals. A motion for repeal of the Acts was brought forward in the House of Commons, and the Government recommended the issue of a Royal Commission to inquire into and report upon their Administration and Operation.

A Royal Commission of 25 members, of which Mr. Massey was president, was accordingly appointed, and in sittings which occupied 45 days, from 14th December 1870 to 13th May 1871, examined between 80 and 90 witnesses.

A Report, signed by 23 members of the Commission, with certain reservations by some of its members, was the result of the inquiry. The Commissioners, recalling the fact that periodical examination was only in partial operation up to May 1870, and that the returns were only made up to the end of that year, pointed out that statistical tables (formed on such return) could not be conclusive as to the physical effect of frequent periodical examination. But they subsequently added, though the numerical results of the statistics must be inconclusive, inconclusive, the evidence before them appeared to testify to a general impression on the part of the medical officers of both services, that the Acts had operated beneficially on the health of the men. The Report stated that the Commission had come to the conclusion that although the periodical examination of common prostitutes was the most effectual mode of dealing with venereal disease, it would be difficult, if not practically impossible, to make the system general, even if on other grounds it were desirable to do so; that the restriction of the remedy of periodical examination to a few places, while the disease was general through the country, was a state of things that could not in their opinion be permanently maintained; and that a modification of the Acts might be arrived at by which they might be stripped of their anomalous and offensive character, without materially impairing their efficiency.

They accordingly recommended:

(1.) That the periodical examination of public women should be discontinued.

(2.) That every common prostitute found to be diseased after an examination by a medical officer upon a voluntary submission, or upon a magistrate's order, should be detained in a certified hospital until discharged by a magistrate's order, or by the authorities of such hospital; provided that such detention should in no case exceed three months.

(3.) That in order to obtain a conviction under s. 36, of the Act of 1866, it should not be necessary to prove that the owner or occupier of the house therein named had reasonable cause to believe that the prostitute resorting to his house was affected with a contagious disease.

(4.) That 32 & 33 Vict. c. 96 (the Act of 1869), ss. 3, 4 and 5, be repealed.

(5.) That the Secretary of State for the Home Department should be substituted for the Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Secretary of State for the War Department in the Act of 1866, and that the police employed in carrying the Acts into force should perform their duty in uniform instead of plain clothes.

(6.) That the main provisions of the repealed Act of 1864 (with an amendment of the provision imposing penalties for permitting women to resort to for purposes of prostitution corresponding to the amendment contained in Section 36 of the Act of 1866) should be extended to any place in the United Kingdom (except the Cities of London and Westminster), from which a request for such extension should be made, and in which proper hospital accommodation should be provided.

(7.) That every keeper of a public-house harbouring prostitutes should be deprived of his license.

(8.) That every keeper of a common lodging-house harbouring prostitutes should be subject to the penal clauses of the Common Lodging Houses Acts.

(9.) That the certificate of the Secretary of State under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 69, s. 16 (the Police Counties and Boroughs Act), should certify that the third section of the Vagrant Act, 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, and the section of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 89, relating to common prostitutes and night walkers have been duly observed.

(10.) That 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100 (the Act to consolidate and amend the Statute Law relating to Offences against the Person), ss. 51 and 52, should be amended by making them applicable in cases where the girl was under 14 years of age.

(11.) That girls under the age of 16 acting as common prostitutes should be sent to a home or industrial school for a period not exceeding two years, if they could not be otherwise provided for to the satisfaction of a magistrate.

(12.) That the Acts should be partially extended to the Metropolis.

The Commissioners observed that the title of the Act of 1866 was not applicable to the amendment of the law as proposed by them, as they did not propose special legislation for purposes of protecting from the consequence of vicious indulgence any class of Her Majesty's servants, but thought that, for the public good, particular districts, from any cause peculiarly liable to contagious disease, should be subject to special sanitary regulations. They therefore approved of the establishment of hospitals at the public charge, and of police regulations enforced under central authority within such districts. Although the Report was signed by all the members of the Royal Commission who attended the proceedings, seven of them appended a dissent to certain portions of it, especially to the recommendations that the periodical examinations should be given up, and the Act of 1864 practically re-enacted. After pointing out the diminution of disease effected by the Act of 1866, the seven dissentients state :—

“We now proceed to recapitulate the good moral effects which these calumniated Acts have produced, and which, in our opinion, far outweigh any moral objections which have been, or can be, alleged against them.

“(a.) Religious and moral influence has been brought to bear upon large numbers of women, a great portion of whom had been from infancy familiar only with scenes of debauchery and vice.

“(b.) Towns and camps have been cleared, or nearly so, of the miserable creatures who were formerly to be found in their streets and thoroughfares.

“(c.) A considerable number of abandoned women have been reclaimed and restored to respectable life, and in many instances married.

“(d.) The number of town women have been greatly reduced, and those who remain have been rendered more decent and decorous in appearance and conduct.

“(e.) The practice of clandestine prostitution, which too often degenerate into professional vice, has been materially checked by fear of the consequences of such indulgence which are rendered probable under these Acts.

“(f.) The sad spectacle of juvenile prostitutes of tender age, so rife in such localities heretofore, has been greatly diminished, in some instances almost removed.

“(g.) The temptations by which young men of all classes have been hitherto assailed, have been, to a great extent, taken out of their way, and morality has thus been promoted.

“Such are some of the good effects, irrespective of the diminution of disease, which we are led to believe by the evidence before us have been obtained by these Acts, and probably many of those who conscientiously disapprove of these Acts have been unaware of the results brought to light by this inquiry.”

Another dissent was signed by six Members of the Commission, who objected to the revival of the compulsory powers of surgical examination, and committal to hospital, contained in the Act of 1864. They further state as follows :—

“The compulsory surgical examination of all common prostitutes suspected of being diseased, is not free from the objections which are recognised in the report as valid against the periodical examination of all common prostitutes, whether diseased or not, and it is attended by an additional difficulty which does not affect the latter examination, viz.: That the indications of the existence of these contagious diseases are not within the cognizance of the police or of the public, but must be sought from the testimony of accomplices or accessories, a source of information both objectionable and untrustworthy.

“The objections we entertain against the modes that have been tried for compulsory admission to the hospital need not interfere with the duty of the State to support those hospitals with the view of diminishing disease in garrison districts and naval ports; nor do they interfere with other recommendations of the Report. Lock hospitals and lock wards are voluntarily resorted to as other hospitals are, and it is certainly the real and permanent interest of persons of both sexes, who are afflicted with these diseases, to have recourse to medical treatment in hospitals during the early stages of their disorders.”

Four of the six who signed the last-mentioned dissent, signed a further document in which they expressed their dissent from the opinion expressed in the Report, that "the most effectual mode of preventing the disease is the regular examination of women at short intervals;" and they thought that important qualifications ought to have been stated in the Report in reference to the evidence as to—

- (1.) The reduction of prostitutes in the protected districts ;
- (2.) The reclamation of fallen women in such districts ; and,
- (3.) The diminution of disease in the Army and Navy as being facts attributable to other causes apart from the operation of the Acts.

Other dissents were signed by single members of the Commission. Such dissents were chiefly based upon the objection of the dissenting members to revert to the system established by the Act of 1864, and in one or two cases to its extension to any part of London.

FIRST BRANCH OF THE INQUIRY—HYGIENIC.

Your Committee now proceed to state the result of its first, or hygienic inquiry. The Contagious Diseases Acts were passed with two objects, the diminution of venereal disease, and the increased efficiency of the military and naval services. Your Committee have conducted their inquiry into the hygienic effect of the system with the view of learning how far these objects have been attained.

SEVERITY OF VENEREAL DISEASE.

Under the head of venereal diseases are included syphilis and gonorrhœa. The classification of the forms and developments of primary venereal sores has been a subject of controversy between the witnesses before your Committee. The Medical Department of the Army divides it, only, however, for certain statistical purposes, into primary venereal sores, and secondary syphilis. Some primary sores are merely local, others affect the constitution, and their more immediate results, which vary, are called secondary symptoms. Some of the evidence laid before the Royal Commission of 1871 and your Committee was directed to prove that syphilis had lost much of its virulence, and was no longer so great a physical evil as in the past. But the testimony to its severity, and to the injuries inflicted by it on the person who contracts it by contract, and on his or her innocent descendants, was irresistible. Your Committee are of opinion that however increased medical skill and improved sanitary conditions may have mitigated its results, or prepared the human frame to withstand it, it has lost little of its virulence when prompt and adequate measures for its treatment are not taken. It is still, when local, a painful and disabling malady ; and, in its constitutional form, the cause not only of the numerous diseases and deaths generally attributed to it, but, in the opinion of eminent and experienced physicians, of much sickness and premature mortality, ordinarily set down to other sources, not only in those who contract it, but in their innocent offspring. The Report of the Royal Commission cites opinions as to the formidable character of syphilis given by Sir James Paget, Sir William Jenner, and Mr. Prescott Hewett, which sustain the inference drawn by your Committee from the evidence laid before them on the subject. Sir James Paget said, before a Committee of the House of Lords, "We now know that certain diseases of the lungs, liver, and spleen, are all of syphilitic origin, and the mortality from syphilis in its later forms is every year found to be larger and larger by its being found to be the source of a number of diseases which previously were referred to other origins, or to accidents, or which were put down under various heads that they did not belong to. Sir William Jenner dwelt on the transmission of syphilis to the offspring of a diseased parent. Mr. Prescott Hewett, when asked whether the evil existed to such a degree as to require, if possible, legislative remedy, answered, "Certainly, if possible. I do not know any disease that is more terrible to my mind than this." Gonorrhœa is not followed by the fatal consequences which result from constitutional syphilis. It causes, in many instances, an amount of local inflammation which interferes seriously for the time with the physical efficiency of the patient, and, in no inconsiderable number of cases, it leads to sequelæ, often of a serious character.

EFFECT OF LORD CARDWELL'S ORDER.

Ev. 1879; Muir 59 et seq.; Lawson 817 et seq.
Ev. 1881; Lawson 1304 et seq.

A disturbing element, which it will appear considerably affected the statistics, came into force in 1873. In October of that year an order known as Lord Cardwell's Order, was issued, which had the effect of stopping the pay of men under treatment for primary syphilis and gonorrhœa. This led, in all military stations, to considerable concealment of both these forms of disease, to an apparent, but unreal diminution of their prevalence, and to an apparent and real increase of secondary syphilis, the result of concealed and neglected primary sores. This Order ceased to operate late in 1879.

As the Acts had got into full working order by the beginning of 1870, and continued effective till 1873, when the consequences of Lord Cardwell's Order began to interfere with their operation, the statistics of the period from 1870 to 1873 afford the most satisfactory basis for estimating the value of the system.

PRESUMPTION IN FAVOUR OF ACTS DIMINISHING DISEASE.

Your Committee would premise that prima facie, and in the absence of strong evidence to the contrary, it might fairly be presumed that a measure which has the effect of secluding while in a diseased condition a class of persons admittedly instrumental in propagating a contagious disease, must tend in some degree to diminish the disease. The evidence taken before your Committee fully bears out this presumption.

FLUCTUATIONS OF SYPHILIS.

Ev. 1879; Lawson 498 et seq.
Ev. 1881; Lawson 1304 et seq.; Macnamara 644.

Syphilis, like certain other maladies, fluctuates under the operation of causes not yet brought completely within the range of science. Its intensity will increase for one period, and diminish for the next, without any palpable reason. This circumstance must be borne in mind in estimating the effect of the Acts. A reduction of syphilis in a given period in a subjected district may be to some extent the result of such a fluctuation, and to guard against any error from this source, it is necessary to contrast the condition of unsubjected stations before with their condition at periods after the passing of the Acts. The contrast will show what may be supposed to be due to fluctuation and to other causes outside the Acts. The next step is to contrast the conditions of subjected districts for the same periods. Finally, if, on comparing the changes of condition which have taken place in unsubjected districts where natural fluctuations and ordinary causes have been at work and not impeded, with the changes of condition in subjected districts where, in addition to such fluctuation and causes, the Acts have been in operation, it is found that there is a marked difference between the directions or amounts of change, the difference is, in the opinion of your Committee, to be set down to the influence of the Acts.

DETAILS OF PLAN OF COMPARISONS OF STATIONS AND PERIODS INSTITUTED FOR THE PURPOSES OF THE INQUIRY.

In the course of the inquiry a comparison was instituted of the changes of condition as to the three kinds of venereal disease between the period anterior to the operation of the system, and the period immediately following its introduction in the 14 subjected districts. Subsequently, a similar comparison was instituted instituted in the case of all the stations which have never come under the Acts, called, for the sake of brevity, "the non-subjected stations or districts." A two-fold comparison, of periods of equal length, was instituted. The first contrasted the period from 1861 to 1866, inclusive, with the period from 1867 to 1872, inclusive. The former of these periods covers a time when the Acts of 1866 and 1869 were not in force, the latter a time during the earlier part of which, though not completely applied, they were being actively brought into operation, and during the latter part of which, from 1870 to 1872, they were, as we have seen, in full working order.

The second comparison contrasted the period between 1860 and 1863, the period immediately preceding the introduction of the system by the Act of 1864, with the period between 1870 and 1873, the period of their full operation.

Your Committee also took evidence contrasting the 14 subjected with all the unsubjected stations from 1873 to 1878. The statistics of 1878 are the latest which your Committee has been in a position to deal with for the purposes of their Report.

COMPARISON AS TO PRIMARY VENEREAL SORES BETWEEN 14 SUBJECTED AND ALL UNSUBJECTED STATIONS, 1861-67, 1867-72, 1860-63, 1870-73.

At all unsubjected stations the annual rate per thousand of admissions from 1861 to 1866 was 103·0; from 1867 to 1872, 93·6. This shows a fall of 9·4, equivalent to 9 per cent. of the former ratio. In the subjected districts the ratio per thousand from 1861 to 1866 was 109·7, and from 1867 to 1872, 65·4. This shows a fall of 44·3, equivalent to 40 per cent. of the former ratio. The reduction of 9 per cent. in the unsubjected stations, being the result of natural fluctuations and ordinary causes, and thus indicating a general abatement of the disease through the community, an equal reduction must be assumed to have been effected by the same causes in the subjected districts. It must, therefore, be deducted from the total diminution found in the latter, and the difference, namely, 31, is, in the opinion of your Committee, attributable to the application of the Acts.

et seq., 1284 et seq.,
1294 et seq.
App. Tab. 1.

The ratio of primary sores in unsubjected stations from 1860 to 1863 was 116·3; from 1870 to 1873, 86·0, showing a reduction of 26 per cent. on the former ratio. The ratio in the 14 subjected stations for the period from 1860 to 1863 was 129·8; for the period from 1870 to 1873, 52·5, showing a reduction of 60 per cent. Deducting from this the reduction of 26 per cent. in the unprotected stations, there remains a reduction of 34 per cent. due to the influence of the Acts when they had been brought into full operation, and before the disturbing influence of Lord Cardwell's Order was felt.

App. Tab. 1.

An examination of the figures brought forward for the purposes of these comparisons, showed that in some instances between 1866 and 1877, the ratio of admission for primary venereal sores was higher in some subjected districts than in certain unsubjected stations. But on comparing the condition of the district and stations in question before the Acts with their condition when the Acts were in operation, it was found that in far the larger number of cases, the reduction at the subjected stations was much greater than the reduction at the unsubjected ones. This circumstance pointed clearly to the effectiveness of the Acts in diminishing the disease. The mean per-centage of reduction in admissions for primary sores between the two periods, 1861-66 and 1870-73, when the Acts were in full operation in the 14 unsubjected stations was 5; in the 14 suspected stations it was 52, showing an excess of reduction in the suspected district of 47 per cent.

CONSIDERATIONS AS TO THE FLUCTUATIONS OF PRIMARY VENEREAL SORES, FROM 1860 TO 1878.

It was argued that as for some time previous to the operation of the system, the amount of primary disease had been diminishing in the subjected districts, the reduction subsequently occurring was attributable to a continuance of the causes which had sufficed to produce the former diminution, and that it would have equally taken place if the Acts had not been in force. The reduction previous to the Acts was attributed to the means used to improve the moral condition of the soldier, to occupy his leisure, and to promote clean habits.

habits. Now, as these influences were at work at unsubjected as well as subjected districts, it would be natural to expect that in the period before the Acts they would have wrought a reduction in the unsubjected, similar to that which they effected in the subjected districts. A great, though irregular, fall did take place in all the unsubjected stations between 1860 and 1866, and in 1866 both classes stood at nearly the same point as to the amount of primary venereal sores, the rate in the subsequently protected districts being then a shade higher; but if the theory attributing to moral causes and increased cleanliness, the continued reduction subsequent to the Acts in the subjected stations were well founded, the unsubjected stations being under the same influences ought to show in the period subsequent to the Acts a reduction corresponding to that which they experienced in the former period, and therefore similar to, though not identical with, the reduction which later years disclosed in the subjected districts. But this did not occur; the unsubjected districts showed a sudden increase in 1867, and a further considerable increase in 1869. They then fell, rose, fell again, and rose again, maintaining through all these vicissitudes a much higher rate of disease than the subjected districts, and deviating enormously from the course of diminution which, if the theory of general improvement were true, they should have followed. Meantime, the subjected stations have shown, with some irregularities a gradual and considerable diminution. Starting in 1866, with a rate slightly higher than the unsubjected districts, they experienced, in 1867, a slight increase, trifling in comparison with that exhibited by the unsubjected. The Act of 1866 now began to be effective; in 1869, while the unsubjected districts were still rising, the subjected districts fell very considerably. They subsequently experienced variations similar in kind, but very dissimilar in degree to those experienced in the unsubjected districts. The similarity in kind shows that both classes of districts were influenced by the causes which produce general fluctuations, and by Lord Cardwell's Order; the dissimilarity in degree, and the lower level maintained in the subjected districts since 1866 prove that it is to the influence of the Acts, and not to a general tendency to diminution, that the improvement in the subjected districts is mainly due. These considerations were brought clearly before your Committee in a valuable statistical diagram, the accuracy of which was admitted, which contrasted the theoretical line of improvement, and the lines followed by the subjected and unsubjected districts respectively, from 1860 to 1878. To this diagram, constructed by Mr. Robert Lawson, Inspector General Army Medical Department, your Committee desire to direct particular attention.

COMPARISON AS TO SECONDARY SYPHILIS BETWEEN 14 SUBJECTED AND ALL UNSUBJECTED STATIONS, 1861-67, 1867-72, 1860-63, 1870-73.

In the unsubjected stations the ratio per thousand from 1861 to 1866 was 30·7; from 1867 to 187, 29·2, showing a reduction of 5 per cent. In the subjected stations the ratio from 1861 to 1866 was 37·4, and from 1867 to 1872, 24·6, showing a reduction of 34 per cent. If 5 per cent., the reduction arising from fluctuation and ordinary causes be deducted, the balance, 29 per cent., will represent the reduction effected by the Acts.

Turning to the periods between 1860 and 1863, and between 1870 and 1873, the ratio per thousand of admissions for secondary syphilis in unsubjected stations was, in the former period, 30·5; in the latter, 27·5; showing a reduction of 10 per cent. In the subjected districts the corresponding ratios were 40 and 20·3 per thousand, a diminution of 49 per cent., from which, if the natural reduction of 10 per cent. in the unsubjected districts be subtracted, there remains, as the result of the operation of the Acts, diminution of 39 per cent.

IMPORTATION OF SYPHILIS FROM SUBJECTED TO UNSUBJECTED STATIONS, AND vice versâ.

As secondary syphilis makes its appearance, in a large number of cases, at a considerable interval, occasionally as long as twelve months, from the appearance and even from the cure of the primary sore, it is obvious that the amount of secondary syphilis appearing at a given spot does not necessarily represent, but may either exceed or fall short of, the amount of secondary syphilis caused by intercourse at the spot. Men contract primary syphilis at a subjected station; they are removed to an unsubjected place; secondary syphilis presents itself in their new quarters and is so charged in the returns. The converse process also occurs. Men contract primary syphilis in an unsubjected district, and secondaries develop themselves after removal to a station under the Acts. It is, therefore, obvious that the returns do not disclose the amount of secondary syphilis really chargeable to any particular locality. It is impossible to determine accurately the number of cases of the constitutional phase of disease for which particular localities are responsible. There is, however, a consideration which will enable an estimate to be formed of the relative quantity of secondary syphilis imported from subjected to unsubjected districts, and vice versâ. Secondary syphilis bears certain numerical proportions, varying at different times, to primary syphilis. From 1861 to 1872, in all stations, subjected and unsubjected, there were about three primary cases to one secondary case. For the following years, covered by Lord Cardwell's Order, when primary disease was frequently concealed, there being but no inducement to conceal secondary syphilis, the apparent proportion of secondary to primary, as recorded in the returns, had risen from a third to a half. If, then, one set of stations discloses a lower rate of primary syphilis than another set, it must be taken that the first exports a lower, and the second set a higher rate of secondary syphilis. It follows, of course that if there be a free and promiscuous interchange of troops between the two sets, the first set of stations imports a higher rate of secondary syphilis than the second. If these considerations be applied to the subjected and unsubjected districts, and if it be borne in mind that the former disclose a lower rate of primary syphilis than the latter, it will appear that while, of course, the unsubjected stations import a certain proportion of secondary disease from the subjected, the latter import a larger proportion from the former, and that the statistics attribute to places under the Acts an amount of secondary syphilis exceeding what was contracted in those places. The fewer the primary sores contracted in a given district the less secondary disease it will export, and the more of the secondary disease appearing against it in the Tables it will have imported. It would follow from this that in the subjected districts the primary sores being greatly reduced, and the excess of importation over exportation being considerable, the proportion of secondaries to primaries recorded should be high, and should not show signs of diminution proportionate to the real diminution of disease, primary and secondary, taking place under the Acts.

Great reliance was placed by the opponents of the Acts on the fact that soldiers coming into the protected districts were subjected to medical examination, whereas soldiers coming into the unprotected districts were not so subjected. Your Committee are unable to recognise the force of the argument. If valid at all, it would seem to tell unfairly against those subjected districts, as soldiers so examined and found diseased, would be at once sent to hospital, and would thus swell the number of men returned as under hospital treatment in those districts, although their diseases were contracted outside of them.

COMPARISON AS TO GONORRHOEA BETWEEN 14 SUBJECTED AND ALL UNSUBJECTED STATIONS, 1861-67, 1867-72, 1860-63, 1870-73.

The rate of admissions per thousand for unsubjected stations from 1861 to 1866 was 108·2; from 1867 to 1872, 105·4, a reduction of 3 per cent. The ratios for the same periods in the subjected districts were respectively 125·1 and 114·6, a reduction of 8 per cent.; attributing 3 per cent. of this to the causes outside the Acts, the latter are to be credited with a reduction of 5 per cent.

Ev. 1881: Lawson

App. 1, Tab. 1.

The contrast of 1860-63 and 1870-73 shows ratios in the unsubjected stations of 116·1 and 95·0, proving a general reduction of 18 per cent. The corresponding ratios in the subjected districts were 134·6 and 100·6, involving a reduction of 25 per cent., and leaving as the result of the Acts, after the subtraction of the general reduction, a reduction of 7 per cent.

COMPARISONS BETWEEN 14 SUBJECTED AND 14 UNSUBJECTED STATIONS AS TO PRIMARY VENEREAL SORES AND GONORRHOEA UP TO 1873.

Comparisons as to change of condition with respect to primary venereal sores and gonorrhœa in the above periods were also drawn at an early stage in the inquiry of your Committee between the 14 subjected stations and 14 above-mentioned unsubjected stations, each of which contain 500 men, or upwards. Secondary syphilis was not included in this contrast, because although the information in the possession of the Army Medical Department at the time would have enabled tables to be constructed for the purpose of a comparison as to secondary syphilis, the statistics were not set in order for that purpose until a later date, when they were utilised for the purposes of the contrast of changes of condition between the 14 subjected and all the unsubjected stations. The object of the comparison between the changes in the 14 unsubjected and the 14 subjected stations was not to contrast any one unsubjected with any one subjected station at a given period, but to contrast the condition of the stations of each class at one time with their condition at another, and by juxtaposition of the changes to distinguish, as in the case of the more general comparison above described, the results of fluctuations and ordinary causes from the results of the Acts. The conclusions deducible from these comparisons as to primary syphilis and gonorrhœa were even more favourable to the effect of the Acts than those derived from the broader comparison drawn between the 14 subjected and all unsubjected stations as to those diseases, and showed a considerable reduction in the case of the former disease, and a moderate one in the case of the latter effected by the Acts.

App. 1, p. 157.

COMPARISON BETWEEN 14 SUBJECTED AND ALL UNSUBJECTED STATIONS,
FROM 1873 TO 1878, AS TO PRIMARY VENEREAL SORES, SECONDARY SYPHILIS, AND GONORRHŒA.

From 1873 to 1878 the ratio per 1,000 of admissions to hospital for primary syphilis in the subjected districts was 39·3; in the unsubjected, 71·2. The corresponding ratios of secondary syphilis were 22·0 and 30·2.

The per-centage of secondary on primary sores in the subjected stations for this period was 56·0; in the unsubjected, 42·4. Your Committee are obliged to attribute the higher per-centage in the subjected stations to their greater importation of secondary syphilis already noted, the apparent effect of which on the relative proportions of primary and secondary syphilis was increased by the concealment of primary syphilis, in consequence of Lord Cardwell's Order.

The subjected districts show a reduction in the ratio of admissions per 1,000 for secondary syphilis from 24·6 in the period 1867-72 to 22·0 in the period 1873-78. This is equivalent to a reduction of 10·6 per cent. The unsubjected districts disclose as the corresponding figures 29·2 and 30·2, showing an increase of 3·4 per cent.

The mean rate of death from syphilis all over England from 1870 to 1873 was 80 per million; from 1873 to 1878 it rose to 86 per million, an increase of 7·5 per cent. on the former rate. This fluctuation told on the army as well as on the general population. But the comparison of its effects on the statistics of constitutional disease in the subjected and unsubjected stations deserves to be noted. Constitutional disease rose in both classes of districts from 1873 to 1878, but in different degrees. The ratio of admissions per 1,000 for secondaries from 1870 to 1873 were, in the subjected districts, 20·3; in the unsubjected, 27·5. The corresponding figures for 1873 to 1878 were 22·0 for the subjected, and 30·2 for the unsubjected districts. The fluctuation produced in the subjected districts an increase of 8·4 per cent. on the low ratio of 20·3, against an increase of 9·8 per cent. on the higher ratio of 27·5 in the unsubjected

For gonorrhœa the ratios of admission per 1,000 for 1873 to 1878 were in the subjected districts, 69·5; in the unsubjected, 73·3. The difference at first sight seems trivial, but it is to be remembered that the subjected stations, in the period previous to the passing of the present Acts, from 1861 to 1866, show a ratio of 125·1 against a ratio of 108·2 in the unsubjected. Passing to the first sexennial period during which the Acts were in operation, the subjected, notwithstanding a considerable reduction of gonorrhœa, show a ratio of 114·5, while the unsubjected, though little improved from their former condition, show a smaller absolute ratio than the subjected, namely, 105·4. Even during the period from 1870 to 1873, although the effect of the Acts in reducing the disease is visible, the subjected stations have not overcome the disadvantage under which they started, and show a ratio of 100·6 against 95·0 in the unsubjected. But the period 1873-78 reverses the situation, and shows the subjected districts with not merely a greater reduction in gonorrhœa than that disclosed by the unsubjected, but with a smaller ratio of admissions per 1,000, instead of the larger ratios which prevailed in them before, and to a lesser degree during the previous history of the Acts.

The average ratios per thousand of cases of gonorrhœa from 1867 to 1877 in the 14 protected, and 14 unprotected districts were compared and showed higher figures in the case of certain of the former than certain of the latter. But on applying the test of comparing each class of districts in the period 1867-1877 with itself in 1861-1866, and contrasting, as has been done in the case of primary syphilis, the change of condition, it appeared that the ratio in the 14 stations not under the Acts, was, in the earlier period, 109·0; in the latter it was 101·0, showing a reduction of 7, while the corresponding figures in the 14 subjected districts were 125·1 and 92·2, showing a reduction of 26 per cent. The 14 subjected districts, therefore, taken together, show a reduction of 19 per cent. over the others.

CLASSIFICATION OF PRIMARY VENEREAL SORES.

It has been stated above that the classification of venereal diseases adopted by the Army Medical Department has been the subject of controversy. It is complained that the enumeration under one head of sores which do, and sores which do not produce secondary syphilis, deprives the Army statistics of all value. Your Committee received evidence showing that there are two schools on the subject of syphilis in the medical profession. One asserts that the sore which produces constitutional disease (called "infecting or hard sore"), and that which does not affect the constitution (called "pseudo-syphilitic" or soft sore), are different in kind. This view is called the dual theory. The other school, whose adherents are called Unicists, holds that the same primary sore may, under different circumstances, remain merely local, or develop into constitutional syphilis. It seems, however, to be admitted by both parties that it is in a very large number of cases impossible in the earlier stages of a sore to say whether it will lead to secondaries or not. It might indeed be inferred from the evidence of some witnesses that in some instances the precise nature of the primary sore can only be determined ex post facto, according as it does, or does not, produce secondaries, and that in such cases whether a sore is, in the true sense, pseudo-syphilitic or infecting can only be ascertained by the ultimate event. Mr. Macnamara, a surgeon of great experience, stated, with reference to this subject, that he had seen "as bad secondaries result from soft as hard sores, and that he had seen a man with a hard chancre without any treatment whatsoever, never have secondaries, and that it was a chancre (i.e., a hard sore) was proved by his communicating the disease in a very severe form to his wife, and he was not what is termed a 'syphilised' man (i.e., a man protected by previous inoculation from true syphilitic contagion) for he never had had previously any kind of venereal sore." The Army Medical Department being obliged to give weekly returns of primary sores as they arise, without waiting for their development, is under the necessity of classing all primary sores under one head for statistical purposes. This does not pledge it to either of the theories described, nor does it appear to your Committee to interfere with the value of the departmental statistics as to the disease.

QUESTION AS TO VALUE OF EXAMINATION OF WOMEN.

Some of the medical opponents of the Acts have urged as an argument against the value of the examination that it is difficult to ascertain the presence of syphilis in the female. One of these witnesses, Dr. Routh, went so far as to say that out of a given number of diseased women coming to a competent medical man, the examination would prove abortive, and the medical man would not be able to ascertain the traces of disease, in about one-half these cases. It must be remarked that most of the medical witnesses who insist on the difficulty of ascertaining the presence of the disease, stop far short of this opinion. Your Committee, taking into account all the medical evidence given on this subject, have come to the conclusion that while, undoubtedly, cases may occur in which the traces of disease escape notice, they are unusual, and that an experienced surgeon will rarely fail to detect venereal disease.

EFFECT OF THE ACTS ON THE EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

App. 1, Tab. 2, 3.

Your Committee examined carefully into the question how far the Acts have operated to influence the efficiency of the Army. Their effect in this respect was considered from several points of view, and it appears that they have augmented the available strength of the Army to an extent proportioned to that which the statistics show that they have diminished disease. Applying the plan adopted for measuring the true effect of the Acts in reducing disease, your Committee contrasted the changes of condition as to efficiency (so far as the diminution or increase of efficiency resulted from a greater or lesser number of men being in hospital in consequence of venereal disease) in unsubjected with corresponding changes in subjected districts. This comparison involved considerable difficulty, but after carefully eliminating all discoverable inaccuracies and sources of error, your Committee were satisfied, contrasting the 14 subjected with all unsubjected stations, that during the period between 1870 and 1873, when the Acts were in full operation, unaffected by Lord Cardwell's Order, they saved 5·38 men per 1,000 daily to the Army. The daily loss from venereal disease in the 14 subjected stations from 1860 to 1863, was 24·01 per 1,000; in the unsubjected stations 19·75 per 1,000, or 4·26 less than in the subjected. This last number constitutes $\frac{1}{364}$ of the rates at the unsubjected stations. Starting with this disadvantage, the subjected stations showed in 1870-1873, a daily loss of 11·31 per 1,000, against a daily loss in the unsubjected, of 13·73. The difference, 2·42 per 1,000, does not show all that has been effected in the way of saving by the Acts, because it does not take into account that at the period 1860-1863, previous to the operation of any of the Acts, the subjected districts were in a worse position, as regards diminution of efficiency, than the unsubjected by $\frac{1}{364}$ of the amount observed in the latter. In order to make up for the advantage possessed by the unsubjected districts in the period before the Acts, and thus to show the real improvement effected under and by virtue of the Acts in the subjected districts, it is necessary to add to the ratio of daily loss per 1,000 from 1870 to 1873 in the unsubjected districts, an amount corresponding with the relative advantage as to daily loss they possessed over the subjected from 1860 to 1863, namely, as has been stated, $\frac{1}{364}$ of the amount of their amount of daily loss. Adding, therefore, to 13·73 $\frac{1}{364}$ of itself, namely, 2·96, a sum of 11·69 is obtained, and subtracting thence 11·31, the ratio of daily loss per 1,000 in the subjected districts, a difference of 5·38 per 1,000, representing the true saving effected by the Acts is the result. This, it is to be borne in mind means that out of 16·69 per 1,000, who would probably have been daily withdrawn from the efficient strength per 1,000 of the Army in the subjected districts, if they had not been under the Acts, 5·38 per 1,000 have been daily saved to the efficient strength of the Army by the operation of the Acts.

To this saving ought to be added the gain to the service derived from the increased immunity of the men from the various debilitating and incapacitating disorders which, though not classed as venereal diseases, not unfrequently result therefrom.

A remarkable instance of the effect of venereal disease in diminishing efficiency in unprotected districts was presented to your Committee in the third year of their inquiry. It appeared that within ten months of the arrival of a regiment in Dublin, over 43 per cent. of its men had been incapacitated from duty by venereal disease.

In a general sense, as has been said, the effect of Lord Cardwell's order has been uniform on all districts, subjected and unsubjected; but it is to be borne in mind that the concealment to which it led resulted in the neglect of primary disease, and consequently in an increased virulence of secondary disease. Now the more virulent secondary disease is, the longer time it will require for treatment, and the more it will diminish the efficiency of the army by keeping men in hospital. But it has been shown that while both subjected and unsubjected districts are charged with an amount of secondary disease, contracted outside their respective limits, the subjected districts have been charged with a greater proportion of secondaries contracted outside them than the unsubjected. Lord Cardwell's Order increasing the virulence of this excessive proportion of secondary syphilis, unduly charged to the subjected districts, has added to the disadvantage at which the excessive importation of secondaries has placed the subjected districts as to the number of men in hospital, and the diminution of the daily efficiency per 1,000 of the army.

EFFECT OF THE ACTS ON THE CIVIL POPULATION.

Your Committee have had evidence tending to show that the Acts have diminished venereal disease in the civil population in those parts of Great Britain where they have been in operation. In dealing with the statistics of mortality from syphilis it must be borne in mind that, as already stated, many deaths primarily due to syphilis are set down to other causes. All the subjected stations in Great Britain, save two, are in the second and fifth divisions of the Registrar General; the exceptions are Colchester, which is in the fourth, and Woolwich, which is in the first, or Metropolitan division. The variations in the number of deaths from syphilis in the second and fifth divisions were contrasted with the variations in the other divisions which were almost entirely, as in the case of the first and fourth, or altogether as in the case of all the others save the first and fourth, outside the region of the Acts. The second and fifth divisions for the three quinquennial periods, 1865-9, 1870-4, 1875-9, showed a reduction from first to last, of 14 per cent. in the deaths from syphilis in the civil population. The third, fourth, and sixth divisions immediately north of the second and fifth, showed over the same period an increase of 16 per cent.; proceeding still northward, the seventh and eleventh showed an increase of 37 per cent., while the most northern part showed an increase of 15 per cent. The Metropolitan division showed a moderate decrease of about 9 per cent. over the whole period. Your Committee do not attribute its exceptional position to the fact of its containing Woolwich, which, compared with the entire division, is too small to be an important factor: but your Committee are of opinion that the general figures show that the Acts have diminished mortality from syphilis among the civil population to a considerable distance around them. They have also received evidence showing that the number of cases of venereal disease presented for treatment from the civil population to practitioners in several subjected districts, has fallen off considerably, a circumstance which points to a general diminution of disease outside the army in subjected districts.

CONSIDERATION OF EVIDENCE AS TO REDUCTION OF DISEASE IN GLASGOW.

Evidence was given showing a decrease in the number of admissions to the female Lock Hospital at Glasgow, and it was asserted that the system of police surveillance prevailing in that town had led to a considerable diminution of disease. Your Committee have observed that the administration of Glasgow aims mainly at the repression of public prostitution. It does not, like the Acts, provide any organization by which women who choose to lead a life of prostitution privately, and without attracting public notice, can be brought under supervision. It is therefore impossible in the case of a town circumstanced like Glasgow to infer from the returns of a public Lock Hospital what the extent of disease may be among women who court privacy, and therefore do not enter such institutions. Besides no satisfactory evidence was given as to the amount of disease amongst the male population, an element without which it is absolutely impossible to measure the real amount and intensity of venereal disease in any locality, or the success of any system for its diminution.

STATE OF DISEASE AMONG PROSTITUTES IN SUBJECTED DISTRICTS.

It is alleged that disease has shown a tendency to increase among registered women, and that the cause of its increase is the diminished number of prostitutes in subjected stations. It is to be observed (1) That the actual number of women who contract and propagate the disease is admittedly diminished. (2) That though the cases are more numerous in proportion to the diminished number of prostitutes, the disease is milder in form, and is arrested before it has become virulent, and inflicted the injuries which result from neglected contagion. (3) That notwithstanding the increase in the number of admissions to hospital among a given number of registered women in a given period, venereal disease among soldiers has diminished. This proves that hygienic purposes are better served by the presence of a reduced number of prostitutes, liable to increased risks of the recurrence of disease in a mild form, but subject to careful medical treatment, than by the presence of a large number of prostitutes in a chronic state of neglected disease.

The extent to which the Acts have diminished primary and constitutional or secondary syphilis in the subjected districts appears of itself, to your Committee, to establish the hygienic utility of the Acts. The diminution of gonorrhœa in the subjected districts attributable to the Acts in the same period is less considerable but substantial.

OPINION OF MEDICAL PROFESSION.

In connection with this part of the subject, your Committee cannot overlook the very general opinion of the medical profession, both in and outside of the subjected districts, who on hygienic grounds strongly advocate the maintenance of the Acts.

Your Committee are of opinion that the Acts have successfully served the two objects to which they were directed—the diminution of venereal disease, and the increased efficiency of the army. It is to be remembered that the Acts have had in reality but an inadequate trial. In the earlier years, from 1866 to 1869, they were not in full efficiency. The three following years were not a sufficiently long period to develop their full influence, and their utility thenceforward has been diminished, up to 1879, by the action of Lord Cardwell's order. The benefit conferred since 1866 is great, but it is only an earnest of what the Acts may be expected to do hereafter for the health and efficiency of the army.

SECOND BRANCH OF INQUIRY—CONSTITUTIONAL, MORAL, AND SOCIAL

Your Committee now proceed to deal with the second branch of their inquiry, namely, the operation of the Acts as regarded in their constitutional, moral, and social aspects, a subject involving considerations of great delicacy and difficulty.

OBJECTIONS (ON OTHER THAN HYGIENIC GROUNDS) TO THE ACTS.

The main objections raised against the Acts from these points of view may be stated as follows :—

I. That they involve the recognition and regulation of vice by the State, and are therefore an outrage upon public morality.

II. That they violate the first principles of constitutional law.

III. That, in practice, they tend to increase sexual vice, by creating an impression on the minds both of soldiers and civilians that it may be indulged with impunity.

IV. That they subject women to restraints and penalties from which men are free.

V. That under them virtuous and respectable women at the instance, and even on the mere caprice of the police, may be, and, as a matter of fact, are, brought before a magistrate, classed as prostitutes, and subjected to a painful and degrading examination.

VI. That they have increased what is called “clandestine prostitution.”

It will be convenient to discuss each of these objections under a separate head.

The two first objections to the Acts are objections of principle. The opponents urge that, whether hygienically successful or not, and whether well or ill administered, they violate principles of paramount moral and constitutional value. This argument has been pressed to such an extent, that a few witnesses have not hesitated to declare that the more successful the Acts may have proved from a sanitary point of view, the more objectionable they are from a moral point of view.

Obj. 1.—THAT THE ACTS INVOLVE IN THEORY THE RECOGNITION AND ENCOURAGEMENT OF VICE BY THE STATE.

It is said that they regulate prostitution, and offer it in return for obedience to the regulations of the State, a definite toleration. Your Committee have afforded the exponents of this view ample opportunity of explaining their opinions, and have endeavoured to learn the position which, in their judgment, the State, apart from these Acts, does maintain, and also the position which, according to them, the State ought to maintain in reference to the social evil. It is not denied that the State permits prostitution to exist. The prostitute is punishable if she carries on her trade in such a manner as to outrage public decency, or violate certain laws and regulations not directed against the habit of prostitution, pure and simple, but against the habit, under certain aggravating circumstances of disorder. Simple prostitution is at present, not connived at, but openly tolerated. Women known to be engaged in it are permitted to appear in public, notoriously with a view to plying their trade, provided they abstain from solicitation and indecent and disorderly conduct. If there be any law prohibitory of prostitution, pure and simple, it is a dead letter. As to the position which the State ought to take up, it has not been seriously argued that the total suppression of prostitution by the State is practically possible. Now it appears to your Committee that if the State tolerates this evil, it is under a certain obligation to mitigate, as far as possible, the grave injuries resulting from it. Further, if it is admitted that the State cannot suppress the evil, it is difficult to see how those who make this admission, and thus absolve the State from the obligation of suppression, can consistently deny the State the right to take effective measures for the purpose of minimising the injurious results of the evil. The Acts do not give prostitution more toleration than it enjoyed before their existence, or than it now enjoys, where they are not in force. It is not the Acts, but the administration of the ordinary law that gives it toleration. All the Acts have done is to insist that the toleration permitted by the institutions of the country shall be exercised with less detriment to public health.

It is alleged that the Acts involve in principle the encouragement of vice by offering safety to its indulgence. It has not, however, been seriously argued that the Acts were passed with this object. In a subsequent paragraph your Committee give their reasons for the belief that they have not, as a matter of fact, done so. If, then, it is admitted that their object was not to encourage vice, and if your Committee are right in the belief that as a matter of fact they do not operate in that direction, it seems to your Committee unreasonable to charge them with a violation of moral principle which was not intended in framing the system, nor produced in the course of its administration. The argument founded on the alleged encouragement of vice by the Acts is, in principle, available against any State institution or system devised to cure disease in the known prostitute, because such institution or system must diminish the chance of the infliction of disease on men who consort with her after her cure. If the State encourages vice by insisting on submission to examination and treatment, and by thus inducing men to believe they can sin with impunity, it would also encourage vice by offering the prostitute special facilities for cure, and inducements to avail herself of them. Some opponents of the Acts, conscious of the force of this view, object to the endowment of Lock hospitals by the State. They are however, willing that the disease should be treated in general hospitals side by side with other diseases. It is obvious that if the argument against enforced examination and cure, founded on the impunity it offers to sin, be valid, it is in principle available against any aid being given by the State for the treatment of unreclaimed prostitutes in common hospitals, as well as for the erection of separate hospitals, and not only against the grant of such aid by the State, but against its grant from the rates and from private individuals. Your Committee are of opinion that the objection to the system on the ground of the alleged encouragement or facilities given to vice involves fundamentally the opinion, which however the opponents of the Acts strenuously reject, that prostitutes who have no intention of leaving their calling should not be provided with the means of cure, lest their freedom from disease should encourage men to associate with them.

It has been usual for the opponents of the system to assume that the Acts are analogous to certain continental methods of dealing with prostitution, which avowedly offer facilities for vice. It seems to your Committee that the contrast between the Acts and the notorious features of certain continental systems affords strong proof that the former violate no principle of morality. The English statutes make an attempt at reclamation by moral and religious agencies an essential part of every attempt to check the evils of prostitution. The foreign systems tend to confine public women in brothels, where every good influence is avowedly excluded. The insistence on religious and moral influences make the system in principle an ally and not an enemy of religion and morality. Whether they practically work in this direction is a question of fact hereafter to be considered. But your Committee are of opinion that so far as the objection of principle is concerned, it is not well founded.

Obj. 2.—THAT THE ACTS VIOLATE CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLES.

It is also alleged that the Acts violate constitutional rights by the authority they confer over the person of the prostitute. Your Committee have found nothing in the arguments brought forward in support of this view which is not in principle equally cogent against other enactments which have been passed for the purpose of diminishing disease in the community by insisting on its prevention or cure in the individual. The State insists on vaccination, and on the isolation and treatment of persons suffering from certain infectious diseases. In doing so, the State assumes a certain authority over the person of the individual for the preservation of the general health. It follows precisely the same principle in asserting its right to prevent the spread of venereal disease. It is said that the means used by the State for this object, namely, the compulsory examination of the prostitute, makes the interference of the State unconstitutional. Your Committee reject this view. The prostitute, of her own free will, makes her person a source of danger, not only to the men who consort with her, but to innocent persons. She cannot justly complain if she is compelled to submit to examination and treatment which her own deliberate act has rendered necessary for the good of the community. If it were found, as a matter of fact, that her examination and treatment had the effect of confirming her in evil, it might well be argued that the State had no right to lessen the chances of moral reclamation for the purpose of preventing physical injury. Your Committee, in subsequent paragraphs, give reasons for their belief that no such effect is produced by the system, and they are of opinion that the authority assumed by the State is not unconstitutional. The prostitute, in order to prevent the spread of a dangerous disease, is compelled to submit to measures which are not in themselves indecent, and which virtuous women often undergo voluntarily. The examination is not in itself, and apart from the causes which necessitate it, a dishonour, and the compulsion to which the prostitute has to submit, is the result of her own misconduct.

Obj. 3.—THAT THE ACTS, IN PRACTICE, INCREASE VICE BY MAKING IT SAFE.

As to the objection that these Acts by making vice safe practically operate so as to increase immorality, your Committee from the very nature of the question feel that it is one with which it is difficult to deal. It is not easy to diagnose the various motives which impel or restrain different men to or from vicious sexual indulgence, and it is probable that these motives vary considerably according to the age, disposition, and circumstances of each individual. But the evidence which your Committee have received on the subject, as well as the inherent probabilities of the case, lead to the conclusion that, as a rule, men who indulge in irregular sexual intercourse, especially the younger and more reckless among them, gratify their vicious passions without the slightest regard to any sanitary consequence, and that the fear of disease is absolutely no check upon the gratification of what is often nothing more than a strong animal instinct. Your Committee therefore think that in this respect too the opponents of the Acts have failed to make out their case. It is worthy of observation that this objection, founded as it is on the supposed tendency of the Acts to secure immunity from disease, is urged by the very persons who contend that they have, from a sanitary point of view, proved a complete failure.

Obj. 4.—THAT THE ACTS AFFECT UNFAIRLY THE FEMALE SEX.

The fourth objection may be quickly disposed of. The Acts are directed not against women, but against prostitutes, i.e., against a class who, as stated in the Report of the Royal Commission (paragraph 60), “commit the sin of fornication as a matter of gain,” and it may be added, in the deliberate exercise of their calling, and who are specially liable to contract and propagate disease in the exercise of that calling. Among the male part of the population no corresponding class exists, and it is difficult to see to what men such legislation could be applied. To extend it to the whole male population of the country or of any particular district would be almost as absurd as to extend it to the whole female population, while the medical examination of soldiers, if thought desirable from a sanitary point of view, might be, and in certain cases is, carried out as a matter of military regulation without the need for any actual legislation. It may be observed, in passing, that since the cancelling of Lord Cardwell’s Order, already referred to, there is not the same inducement to soldiers to conceal venereal disease of any kind.

Obj. 5.—THAT VIRTUOUS WOMEN MAY BE AND ARE BROUGHT UNDER THIS OPERATION.

The fifth objection to the Act is of the gravest kind, and if it could be sustained would be, in the opinion of your Committee, fatal to their maintenance. They have, therefore, thought it their duty to spare no labour in probing it to the utmost.

Before proceeding further with this branch of the inquiry, your Committee would call special attention to the fact that in the course of 16 years not a single case has been brought before your Committee in which any woman alleged to have been wrongfully brought under the operation of the Acts has brought an action or taken legal proceedings against the police authorities in respect of any act done by them under the Contagious Diseases Acts. Considering the large funds at the disposal of the various associations for the repeal of the Acts—the zeal and activity with which their operations have been carried on, and the opportunities for the exposure of the alleged vices of the system, which such proceedings, even if unsuccessful, would afford, your Committee cannot but regard this fact as a significant testimony to the conduct of the police. The explanation given by Mr. Shaen in his evidence, that under the 42nd section of the Act of 1866, the defendant to such an action “might plead generally that the act complained of was done in pursuance or execution, or intended pursuance or execution of the Acts, and give the Act and the special matter in evidence at any trial to be had thereupon,” seems to your Committee singularly insufficient. It must be obvious to most persons acquainted with legal procedure that such a plea would in no way protect any person acting under the Acts from the consequences of such misconduct as has been imputed to the police.

Various cases, including the case of Caroline Wybrow, have, however, been brought before your Committee in which it was alleged that an attempt had been made by the police charged with the administration of the Acts improperly to bring women under their operation. Many of these cases were defended by the agents of the societies for the repeal of the Act, and in some cases such defences were successful. Considering, however, the number of years during which the Acts have been in operation, your Committee cannot but think that, especially of late years, these cases have been very rare, while the evidence by which it has been sought to substantiate them, has been anything but satisfactory.

In all these cases, except the Dover case, hereafter referred to, the evidence brought forward to inculcate the police was purely hearsay evidence, or did not admit of being tested by cross-examination, and was therefore open to all the objections which apply to such evidence. Great stress was laid on the case of Caroline Wybrow, which occurred in the beginning of 1875. In this instance a careful consideration of the entire case has led your Committee to the conclusion that although certain irregularities were proved to have occurred, neither the medical authorities nor the police are open to serious censure. Your Committee feel bound to observe that the complaints made by the girl herself of her treatment were not made for several months after the occurrence to which they related, and that her most important statements were directly contradicted by reliable witnesses.

On the whole, therefore, your Committee are not satisfied that in a single case the action of the police has been marked by the carelessness and misconduct somewhat recklessly attributed to them. Even where the summonses have been dismissed by the magistrates the cases appear to have warranted reasonable suspicion, or to have been surrounded by doubt, the benefit of which was naturally given to the women summoned. On the other hand, many of the most strenuous opponents of the system have testified to the great care and discretion with which the police have acted. In a recent case, however, alluded to as the Dover case, which was dismissed by the borough justices without hearing the defence, the charges brought against the police (who it is only fair to state, were not professionally represented before the magistrates) were so grave and specific that your Committee felt it to be their duty to sift the case thoroughly, not with a view of reviewing or contesting the decision of the justices, but in order to see whether the police acted with reasonable discretion. For this purpose they adopted the only course by which such an investigation could be properly carried out, and called before themselves, not only those witnesses who were examined before the magistrates, but several other witnesses who were in a position to throw light upon the case. The evidence of these witnesses (who were examined on oath) occupied more than three whole days, and will be found in the printed evidence. Your Committee think it unnecessary to make any comment on this evidence, except to say that they think that the conduct of the police charged with the administration of the Acts was not open to censure.

In connection with this part of the subject, it should be borne in mind that one of the charges brought against the Acts is, that they are administered with so much laxity that almost any prostitute who chooses can evade their operation. It is hardly necessary to point out that this objection, which will be hereafter considered, is, on the face of it, scarcely consistent with the theory, that they have introduced a system of espionage fatal to personal liberty, or even that they have been carried out with undue severity.

Your Committee therefore are of opinion that the charges of misconduct brought against the police have broken down, and they desire to record their concurrence in the opinion unanimously expressed by the Royal Commission (para. 23 of the Report) "That the police are not chargeable with any abuse of their authority, and that they have hitherto discharged a novel and difficult duty with moderation and caution."

Obj. 6.—THAT THE ACTS HAVE INCREASED CLANDESTINE PROSTITUTION.

It is charged that the Acts have increased clandestine prostitution in the subjected districts. This allegation is disproved, in the opinion of your Committee, by the evidence, not only of trustworthy officials, experienced in the condition of those places, but also by that of persons unconnected with the administration of the system who have watched closely its effect. The evidence as to Aldershot, the largest military centre, showed that when the Acts first came into operation, clandestine prostitution was common in its neighbourhood, and that since then, both in the opinion of the residents, and in that of the experienced physician in charge of the Lock Hospital, it has largely decreased. In Plymouth, Devonport, Woolwich, Deal, Cork, and other districts, which may be regarded as typical subjected stations, it has been proved to your Committee that a similar decrease has taken place, and a consideration of the scope of the Acts show that their general tendency is to diminish clandestine, as well as open, prostitution. Your Committee wish to call special attention to the evidence on this subject as to Cork, one of the Irish subjected stations. A general assertion of the increase of clandestine prostitution amongst a class of girls of respectable position in that district was made by one of the witnesses, who founded his opinion on, amongst other things, the alleged admission of members of the constabulary engaged in administering the Act in Cork. It was met in the first place by denials from each of the constables so employed that he had made such an admission; in the second place, by clear testimony that clandestine prostitution had not increased, given by clergymen intimately acquainted with the condition of the town, and and by the surgeon of the Lock Hospital, who had special opportunities for knowing the real state of things; and, thirdly, by the fact that illegitimate births, which are an ordinary result of extensive clandestine prostitution, had become far fewer than in former times, and that attempts to procure abortion, an equally clear index of this form of vice, were quite exceptional. The deterrent influence of the Acts tends to restrain persons who are not committed to a life of prostitution, public or clandestine, from entering on it, and exposing themselves to the supervision of the police. Women are thus deterred, or if not deterred, rescued at an early stage of vice from that more private kind of prostitution, which they resort to before going regularly on the streets. In this way the Acts of necessity cut off one great source of clandestine prostitution. Again, the police diminish the tendency to clandestine prostitution by seeking out and warning women whom they find likely to enter such a career, and by giving information to their relatives, a subject which will be hereafter more fully considered. Of course, the desire to escape registration will lead prostitutes who consort with the richer classes of men to practice increased secrecy, in order to escape the notice of the police. There is no doubt that some women who in the subjected districts before the Acts would have practised prostitution openly, now endeavour, and in comparatively few cases with success, to carry on their trade in private. But your Committee are of opinion that owing to the vigilant administration of the police, this does not take place to any great extent, and that on the whole the deterrent effect of the Acts, and their judicious administration have diminished the number of clandestine, as well as public prostitutes.

The contention in a former paragraph that the diminution in the number of prostitutes caused by the Acts has increased disease amongst registered women, virtually admits that the system has not had the effect of increasing clandestine prostitution to any considerable extent. If, as is alleged, clandestine prostitution grows in subjected districts as open prostitution diminishes, the increase in the amount of disease among registered women cannot proceed from the cause to which it is sometimes ascribed, namely, the diminished number of women consorting with the soldiers.

ADVANTAGES (OTHER THAN HYGIENIC) CONFERRED BY THE ACTS.

On the other hand, the advocates of the Acts claim for them that they have,—

- I. Diminished prostitution in subjected districts.
- II. Almost entirely suppressed juvenile prostitution.
- III. Rescued fallen women from the frightful state of filth and disease in which they had previously lived, and thus placed them under conditions in which they for the first time become amenable to humanizing and reforming influences.
- IV. Contributed to promote public order and decency in the districts in which they are in force.

DIMINUTION OF PROSTITUTION IN SUBJECTED DISTRICTS.

(I.) There can be no doubt that in the subjected districts the number both of prostitutes and brothels has, since the Acts, largely decreased. On this point your Committee would refer to the evidence given by the Rev. Prebendary Wilkinson, by Mr. W. Luscombe, and Inspector Annis as to Plymouth, Devonport, and Stonehouse; by the Rev. H. Reid, the Rev. T. O'Reilly, the Rev. Canon Hegarty, and Mr. Curtis as to Cork; by the Rev. E. P. Grant as to Portsmouth; by the Rev. T. Tuffield as to Woolwich, by Mr. Adam Stigent as to Chatham, and by Mr. Pittcock as to Deal, as well as to the returns published under Captain Harris's direction. Indeed this diminution has been admitted by the opponents of the Acts, though they attribute it to other causes. But without pushing the argument post hoc ergo propter hoc too far, your Committee feel that they are justified not only by a comparison between the condition of the subjected districts before and after the Acts, but by comparison between the present condition of these districts and that of other large towns in setting down a main portion of these good effects to the credit of the Acts.

The various witnesses who have been examined on behalf of the Acts account for this diminution in three ways :

(1.) By the deterrent effect of the Acts in preventing many women especially young girls on the border-land, as it has been called between levity and immorality, from embarking in a career of vice. This question was partially discussed in the paragraphs dealing with clandestine prostitution, and will be further considered when the question of the decrease of juvenile prostitution is discussed.

(2.) By the excellent spiritual and moral influences brought to bear on the women while in hospital, and the successful efforts made by the superintendents and chaplains of these hospitals to place them in the way of obtaining a decent and respectable livelihood after their discharge.

(3.) By the intimate knowledge which the police charged with the administration of the Acts obtain, both of the houses of ill-fame in their districts, and of the inmates of such houses, and the consequent opportunities which they have of suppressing the one, and of tracing, and, in many cases, reclaiming the other.

Your Committee think that all these three agencies have been proved to be instrumental in producing the beneficial results above referred to.

1. Diminution of Prostitution by Deterrent Effect of Acts.—That the Acts should exercise a deterrent effect upon women, a point strongly insisted upon by every witness called in defence of the system, seems almost self-evident. The point was virtually admitted by some of the witnesses on the other side, who spoke of prostitutes as removing from the subjected to the unsubjected districts for the purpose of escaping the yoke of the police. Indeed, it would seem that the more irksome that yoke was, the stronger would be the deterrent influences of the Acts.

2. By Spiritual Influences brought to bear on Women in Hospital.—Your Committee are satisfied on the evidence placed before them that the moral and religious influences brought to bear in the certified hospitals are largely productive of reclamation. Some witnesses spoke of the registered women who became patients as altogether hardened and unwilling to submit to good influences. The Rev. Flavel Cook, Chaplain of the London Lock Hospital, is of this opinion. But his views were controverted by Mr. Seton Karr, Vice-chairman of the Hospital, who was able to point to a large number of registered women, patients in the institution, who were reclaimed through its agency. Your Committee desire to call special attention to the statements on this subject of Miss Webb, the Lady Superintendent of the Chatham Lock Hospital, and to the numerous testimonies which she produced as to the good effects of hospital detention upon the women under her charge, and the success of her efforts to bring them back to a virtuous and respectable life.

It has been said that the beneficial results above referred to are only the indirect consequences of the Acts. This argument is disposed of by the 12th section of the Act of 1866, and as a large portion of the women reclaimed would, but for the system created by the Acts, never have been subjected to the influences in question, it is only fair to credit that system with these results. On the other hand, it is contended that the examination hardens the prostitute in vice and shamelessness. The evidence given in this direction has been, in the opinion of your Committee, overborne in the first place by the evidence of opinions to the contrary held not only by respectable officials connected with the administration of the Acts, but also by clergymen and other benevolent persons who have watched the operation of the system and utilised it for reclamation. Again, the number of reclamations which take place among women who have been placed on the register is, in itself, a proof that the examination system has not the deteriorating effect attributed to it. In connection with this subject, it is to be borne in mind that the examination is conducted with a scrupulous decency, and that when disease is discovered, its cure is accompanied by moral and religious efforts to effect conversion. These facts are calculated not to harden the registered women, but to assure them that the State is still hopeful and desirous of their return to a decent life.

Attention was called to the fact that some women remain on the register up to a more advanced age than formerly. This is attributable, not to the so-called hardening effect of the Acts, which have proved powerful for purposes of reclamation, but to the improved health of the women and their freedom from neglected disease, which in former times cut short not only the career, but the life of the prostitute at an early age.

3. By the opportunities they afford the Police charged with the Administration of them to suppress Brothels, and to trace and reclaim Women found in them.—Your Committee cannot lay sufficient stress on the means which these Acts afford the police charged with their administration for tracking out the keepers of brothels, and for following and rescuing the unhappy women who have been enticed into them, and who, there is too much reason to believe, are often detained in them against their will. Such a practice (which Mr. Lowndes, a surgeon of large experience of Liverpool, believes to be very common) could hardly be carried on in the subjected districts, where the police know every brothel and inmate of a brothel in the place. The result is that to smuggle away girls into houses of ill-fame, and immure them there against their will, becomes practically impossible. Indeed, it is a very general practice in these districts for the parents of girls who have been decoyed, or have run away from home, to apply to the police charged with administering the Acts for information respecting their missing daughters, and when this is done, only a very few hours usually elapse before the girl is found and restored to her relatives. Several instances of this kind were mentioned to your Committee by Inspector Anniss and other witnesses.

In the same way, these police being, from their occupation and duties, necessarily made acquainted with the brothels in their district, are enabled to use the machinery of the law and other agencies for the purpose of suppressing them. Inspector Anniss has, in his evidence, detailed the various ways in which this has been effected in Plymouth and the adjoining district, and the Rev. H. Reed and the Rev. Canon Hegarty have admitted, in the fullest manner, the assistance which they obtained from the Cork police charged with the administration of the Acts in a crusade which they some years ago instituted against these houses. It is no answer to this contention to say that the Acts give the police no power to suppress or even to enter a brothel as such. The 36th section of the Act of 1866 subjects every person inducing or suffering a prostitute whom he has reasonable cause to believe diseased to resort to his house for the purpose of prostitution to very severe penalties, the enforcement of which rests practically with the police. The knowledge that they possess this weapon, as well as the opportunities which they have of watching and checking such nefarious traffic, practically place the brothel keepers in the subjected districts in the power of the police to an extent unknown in other localities.

II. DIMINUTION OF JUVENILE PROSTITUTION.

The returns of the department of the metropolitan police, which administers the Acts, have shown since the introduction of the system a continuous and great decrease in the number of juvenile prostitutes in the subjected districts. This evidence is borne out by the testimony of persons well acquainted with the condition of many of those places. As juvenile prostitution is the principal source by which the supply of fallen women is kept up, it is evident that the Acts, in diminishing the number of youthful prostitutes, are operating effectually to diminish the number of adult women abandoned to an evil life. Many cases were detailed to your Committee in which young girls who were either on the point of falling, or had already fallen, were rescued by the intervention of the metropolitan police, and restored to their families. But cases of this kind are few in comparison with the numerous class in which the deterrent influence of the Acts frightens young girls from vice. It is to be remarked that while a constant decrease in juvenile prostitution has gone on in the subjected districts, the Committee of the House of Lords appointed to consider the subject and other kindred topics in 1881, states in its Report, dated 10 July 1882, that "juvenile prostitution, from an almost incredible early age, exists to an appalling extent in England generally, and especially in London." Their Lordships attribute its prevalence mainly to certain specified causes. Every one of these causes has been proved to your Committee to be vigorously and effectively counteracted by the administration of the Contagious Diseases

Acts, so that the alleged reduction of juvenile prostitution in the subjected districts, is borne out by the fact that the influences stated by the Committee of the House of Lords to be its principal source are deprived of much of their strength, where the administration of the Acts is brought to bear against them.

The causes referred to are:—

1. The want of parental control. This is remedied by the information which the police give parents as to the dangers of their daughters, and by the authority which the police exert for the reclamation of young girls.

2. Residence in brothels. As already shown, it has been proved to your Committee that the police exert their power with excellent effect to prevent brothel keepers from harbouring young girls.

3. The example and encouragement given by girls slightly older. The deterrent influence of the system acts effectually against the temptation.

4. The state of the streets "in which little girls are allowed to run about and become accustomed to the sight of open profligacy." Your Committee find that the Acts have much improved the condition of the streets, and repressed public disorder and indecency among fallen women, thus removing much of the bad example which was formerly to be seen in subjected districts.

III.—IMPROVEMENT IN PHYSICAL CONDITION OF WOMEN.

Upon the third point raised by the advocates of the system, there seems scarcely room for serious doubt. Before the passing of the Acts women of this class were sunk in a state of disease and misery, which baffles description. They are represented as living "like wild beasts," in woods and in drains, without shelter, and almost without clothing, and without the slightest regard to, or conception of, ordinary decency. To speak of persons in such a bodily plight as capable of moral reclamation would seem little short of an absurdity; and it is clear that, so far as the Acts have tended to improve the physical state of fallen women, (and of this fact your Committee have had abundant proofs) they must of necessity have helped to place them under conditions in which their moral reclamation becomes, for the first time, possible.

IV.—PROMOTION OF PUBLIC ORDER AND DECENCY.

That the subjected districts have since the passing of the Acts greatly improved in point of outward order and decency, is denied by very few even of the opponents of the Acts.

STRONG FEELING IN FAVOUR OF THE ACTS IN THE SUBJECTED STATIONS.

It is possibly to this fact that the steady decline of the popular agitation against the system in these districts, as its operation came to be better known and understood, is to be attributed. Your Committee cannot doubt that the great majority of the more intelligent and respectable classes in these districts would be strongly opposed to the repeal of the Acts, a circumstance to which, in their judgment, sufficient importance has not yet been attached. Indeed, it may be stated generally that the strength of the opposition to them in each locality is proportioned to its distance from the places where they are in operation.

The suggestion that the Acts are approved in the subjected districts on account of the pecuniary advantages derived from them, seems to your Committee as unfounded as it is injurious.

IMPERFECT ACQUAINTANCE OF MANY WITNESSES AGAINST THE ACTS WITH THE SUBJECTED DISTRICTS.

Your Committee also feel bound to observe that a very large proportion of the witnesses called by the opponents of the Acts, admitted that they had never visited these places, or that they were very imperfectly acquainted with the administration of the Acts, and with the management of the certified hospitals.

The

CONSIDERATION OF THE SUGGESTION THAT THE BENEFITS CONFERRED
BY THE ACTS MIGHT BE OBTAINED BY OTHER MEANS.

Several witnesses, while admitting that the improvement above referred to had taken place in these districts, maintained that the same results might be, and even were, obtained in other places by the vigorous enforcement of ordinary police regulations. The case of Glasgow, already referred to, was especially relied upon as showing that without the exceptional legislation of the Acts prostitution might be greatly diminished, and order and decency established in a large town simply by means of stringent police regulations vigorously enforced by the local authorities. But assuming all these assertions to be true, your Committee doubt whether the rigid police interference, by which it is stated that such good results have been obtained in Glasgow (which, it may be remarked, is not a great military station), would be tolerated in the large towns of England or Ireland. Indeed the social conditions of the great centres of population in the United Kingdom vary so much that it would be unsafe to predict that local regulations for the suppression of vice which have proved effective in one town would be equally successful in another. With regard to the assertion that the gradual improvement in general morality may safely be trusted to lessen and exterminate this great social evil, your Committee would only refer to the evidence of Mr. Macnamara, of Dublin, and Mr. Lowndes, of Liverpool, as to the prevalence of vice and disease in those cities at the present moment.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

Your Committee having thus reviewed the various arguments which have been urged against and for the Acts, and dissected the evidence by which those arguments have been supported, now proceed to consider the several questions specially referred to them, viz., whether the Acts should be repealed, extended or maintained, and if so, with any and what amendments.

I.—SHOULD THE ACTS BE REPEALED ?

Before dealing with this question, your Committee would draw attention to a passage in the Report of the Royal Commission, in which, after attributing to the Acts most of the good results which, in the opinion of your Committee, may be traced to them, they say, in paragraph 43, "If such results, have been attained, either wholly or partially, through the operation of the Acts, those who demand their absolute repeal are bound to show that they have produced evils to counterbalance the good which, after all reasonable deductions have been made, may be fairly attributed to them." Your Committee desire emphatically to endorse this opinion.

But, apart from this consideration, it is most important that Parliament and the country should clearly understand what the simple and absolute repeal of the Acts, including the abolition of police surveillance and of State-aided Lock Hospitals, would mean in districts where they have been in operation for 13 years and more,—

It would mean—

(a.) Full license for venereal disease of all kinds, to disseminate itself unchecked either by police control or by hospital treatment.

(b.) A serious diminution in the effective strength of our Army and Navy, which would be especially felt in the event of their services being suddenly called into requisition.

(c.) The relegation of numbers of these unhappy women to the state of hopeless misery, squalor, and disease, in which they lived before the system was introduced.

(d.) The letting loose of increased crowds of abandoned and diseased women and girls of all ages upon streets and thoroughfares swarming with soldiers and sailors, with little or no practical check or control over their behaviour.

It is scarcely surprising that such a prospect should excite feelings of dismay in the minds of the more intelligent and thoughtful inhabitants of subjected districts.

Your Committee are aware that it is urged by the opponents of the system that if the Acts were repealed Lock Hospitals would spring up in the subjected districts, supported by voluntary contributions, which, it is assumed, would then flow in in sufficient abundance to take the place of State aid. Your Committee believe this prediction to be perfectly illusory. The reluctance of the public to subscribe to hospitals for the cure of venereal diseases is well known, and has been abundantly illustrated in the course of this inquiry. Your Committee can place no reliance on a bare assertion which is contradicted by past experience.

The other argument that the last 12 or 14 years have produced such a change for the better in the moral and sanitary condition of the subjected districts that they have ceased to stand in need of exceptional legislation, is directly opposed to the whole gist of the arguments directed against the Acts.

For these reasons your Committee cannot recommend the repeal of the Acts.

II.—SHOULD THE ACTS BE EXTENDED?

The hygienic and other benefits conferred by the Acts in their present narrow application appear to your Committee to warrant the belief that if extended to the United Kingdom generally they would become still more effective for the diminution of venereal disease, and for other beneficial purposes. Diseased persons coming from unsubjected to subjected districts interfere with the efficiency of the Acts in the latter. If the system were generally applied, this element of weakness would be diminished, and the whole country would be served to a greater extent than the best administered subjected district can be at this moment. It would be unreasonable to predict the extirpation of venereal diseases, because they would continue to be imported from foreign countries, or to elude in a certain number of cases the vigilance of the administration. Allowance being made for these elements of danger, your Committee are of opinion that if practical results were alone to be considered, the Acts might be extended with excellent effect. But the results of the Acts are not the only questions which demand the attention of the Legislature. However intrinsically useful any system may be, it is often unwise hastily to press its extension while any considerable body of opinion, even though that of a minority, condemns it. There is no doubt that, although the Acts are, on the whole, approved of in the subjected districts, large numbers of persons in various parts of the country whose convictions are entitled to respect, object to them. Many of the opponents rest their hostility on religious grounds. This is especially observable with regard to several important Nonconformist bodies, which have protested in their corporate, or quasi-corporate capacity, against the system. It is true that to a large extent the agitation against the Acts appears to your Committee to have arisen and been promoted among classes and persons who have had no opportunity of seeing their practical working, and who have mistaken the objects at which the system aims. But making allowance for this, your Committee cannot, having regard to the character, rather than to the extent, of opinion hostile to the Acts, recommend their extension.

It has been argued that a recommendation of repeal ought, logically, to be the consequence of a refusal to recommend extension. Your Committee cannot accept this view. The ground on which your Committee decline to recommend extension is that the public opinion of a part of the community, which it would be unwise and unjust to neglect, is unprepared for such a step. But this does not apply to the districts where the system is in operation. There the Acts are, on the whole, approved of, and their repeal would be a subject of regret. Besides, while it seems to your Committee to be the duty of Parliament to abstain from any step calculated to wound the conscientious religious convictions of any considerable body of people, it would be unfair to soldiers and sailors, and unwise from the point of view of the efficiency of the service to abolish a system which in localities favourable to its maintenance has been found effective for rescuing men of both services from diseases to which they are especially exposed.

III.—SHOULD THE ACTS BE AMENDED ?

In considering this question, the three main features of the system are to be borne in mind. They are,—

- (1.) Registration and Police Supervision.
- (2.) Periodical Examination.
- (3.) Detention in Hospital.

(1.) Registration and Supervision.—Registration in some form and the supervision which follows it, are necessary if public women are to be placed under any kind of supervision for hygienic purposes. Without them no system could work with regularity. Your Committee cannot, therefore, recommend their abolition. The method of registration in force under the Acts appears to be free from defects. The registration takes place after and in consequence of the voluntary submission to examination, or the judgment of the magistrate rendering the prostitute liable thereto. It has been said that the system tends to the unfair procurement of registration, because, it is alleged, the so-called voluntary submission is obtained by compulsion. It is quite true that some prostitutes would be glad to escape the operation of the Acts, if they could, and in this sense their submission is not voluntary. But this is not the sense in which the Legislature meant the words “voluntary submission” to be used. The Act of 1866 gives a woman alleged to be a subject for its application the choice of two courses, to submit to examination, or to appear before a magistrate and have his decision on the charge of prostitution made against her. Her adoption of the former course is called “voluntary submission,” because it excludes the element of magisterial compulsion. Your Committee are satisfied that the police before taking the voluntary submission, explain the meaning of the step, and inform the women that the alternative of attending before a magistrate is open to them. It has been said that the fact of being on the register throws difficulties in the way of women who, being converted, seek employment. Your Committee are satisfied that in theory the regulations afford women every facility for the removal of their names; that in practice the police habitually, without requiring any formal application, remove from the register the names of those women who give up a life of prostitution, and finally that in many cases they and the Lock hospital authorities exert themselves to obtain for such women shelter or employment in order to secure them against the temptation to relapse. Under these circumstances your Committee do not recommend any alteration in the system of registration and supervision.

(2.) Periodical Examination.—The opposition to the Acts assails the whole principle of sanitary supervision of prostitutes by the State, but beyond doubt the periodical examination is the feature of the Acts that has caused most offence, and has been especially selected for attack. Your Committee are of opinion that if abandoned women could be induced by any method to submit themselves to medical supervision and care, it would be unjust and unwise to continue the system of compulsory periodical examination. But while the medical witnesses who support the Acts and understand their administration assert that the process is necessary, the opponents, when asked to suggest any other means by which prostitutes in subjected districts could be induced to submit themselves with regularity and promptness to the supervision and treatment necessary for their health, have failed to do so. If any such means could be devised and brought into operation, your Committee would not hesitate to recommend the abolition of compulsory periodical examination. No such means being shown to exist, they recommend its maintenance. The Royal Commission of 1870 recommended the abolition of periodical examinations, and the resumption of the main provisions of the Act of 1864. This Statute, while not insisting on periodical examination, subjected to compulsory examination prostitutes reasonably suspected of being infected with venereal disease. It appears to your Committee that the principles of the objections taken to the examination, under the Act of 1866, apply equally to the Act of 1864, and that while the course recommended by the Royal Commission would deprive the system of its chief means of detecting disease and preventing its diffusion, it would not satisfy the opponents of the system. It would be rejected as a half measure, and would lead to renewed agitation. Your Committee for these reasons cannot assent to the recommendation of the Royal Commission of 1870 that the main principles of the Act of 1864 should be substituted for the periodical examinations required by the Act of 1866.

(3.) Detention in Hospital.—Your Committee consider that compulsory detention in hospital is absolutely necessary for the effectual cure of disease, and they recommend its maintenance under the restrictions and regulations at present in force.

ADDITIONAL RECOMMENDATIONS.

(1.) Your Committee recommend the institution, in some of the unsubjected districts, of female Lock hospitals, supported by State aid and by such charitable contributions as may be obtained, to which entrance shall be voluntary. Unsubjected stations, in which venereal diseases are at present most prevalent among soldiers and sailors, should be selected for this purpose. The adoption of this course would afford an opportunity for testing the value of the opinion so freely expressed by the opponents of the Acts, that an adequate system of voluntary treatment would be efficacious from a hygienic point of view.

(2.) Your Committee further recommend that additional and more absolute powers should be given to the police within subjected districts and elsewhere, to enter houses of ill-fame for the purpose of taking steps to diminish prostitution and its attendant evils.

(3.) That powers analogous to that given by Act of 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 5, to householders, to institute proceedings for the prosecution of brothel keepers, should be given to the police.

(4.) That it should be a misdemeanour for any person to receive into any house or into or on any premises occupied or possessed by him or of which he has the management or control, any girl under the age of 16 years for the purpose of her having unlawful sexual intercourse with any person, whether such intercourse is intended with any particular man or generally.

(5.) That a police magistrate should have power, on application of a police inspector, and on his affidavit that he has reason to believe that some girl has been so received and is then in such house or premises, to grant a warrant to such inspector to search the house or premises and to bring before him any person offending as aforesaid, and also the girl, and if the magistrate shall commit any person for trial for such offence, he may also bind over the girl to appear as a witness on such trial.

DRAFT REPORT, proposed by the Chairman, read the first time, as follows:—

"1. AFTER an inquiry, which has extended over a period almost unprecedented in the history of Parliamentary Committees, your Committee are in a position to present their Report.

"2. Your Committee were first appointed in June 1879, on the motion of the Secretary of State for War, for the purpose of inquiring into the administration, operation and effect of the Contagious Diseases Acts, 1866–1869, and they were also empowered to receive evidence evidence concerning similar systems in the British Colonies, or in other countries, and of reporting whether the Acts should be maintained, amended, extended, or repealed.

"3. Since that time they have been re-appointed four times, have examined 71 witnesses, and have sat 68 days.

"4. Owing to the lamented death of the Right Honourable W. N. Massey, who occupied the Chair of your Committee during the Sessions 1879-81, your Committee have been deprived of the advantage which they would have derived, in the subsequent conduct of their inquiry, and in the preparation of their Report, from his intimate acquaintance with the history and working of the Acts.

"5. It will be observed, if the lists of the Committee, as nominated in 1879, and in the second Session of 1880, are compared, the Dissolution and General Election of the latter year considerably altered its composition.

"6. In consequence of the length to which it was necessary to extend the inquiry with respect to the operation of the Acts in Great Britain and Ireland, your Committee being desirous to report in the present Session, found themselves unable to receive evidence with reference to the systems prevailing in British Colonies or foreign countries. Your Committee believe that owing to the difference between these systems and that which is the subject of the present inquiry, as well as to the difference between English and Continental habits and social institutions, such an inquiry, if prosecuted, would not have thrown any additional light on the questions referred to them.

"7. At an early stage of their proceedings it was thought desirable by the Committee to divide the inquiry into two branches:

"(1st.) The hygienic effect of the Acts, especially on the health of the Army and Navy; and

"(2nd.) The constitutional, moral, and social aspects of their principles and administration.

"8. It was decided that the Government being charged with the administration of these Acts, should first produce evidence of the sanitary benefits of the system, and that then the opponents should be at liberty to call witnesses in support of their views on this subject,

"9. The extent of the subject induced your Committee to exclude from their hygienic inquiry any special investigation into the effect of the Acts on the Navy, and to direct their attention principally to the Army, which affords adequate basis for observation and inference. Some important evidence was presented as to the effect of the system on the civil population.

"10. In the first branch, viz., the hygienic question, seven witnesses were called by the Judge Advocate General, acting on behalf of the War Department, and four by the opponents of the Acts.

"11. Of the remaining 60 witnesses who gave evidence on the second part of the inquiry, i.e., the constitutional, moral, and social aspects of the principles and administration of the Acts, 25 were called by the supporters, and 35 by the opponents of the system.

"12. The 25 Government witnesses include persons belonging to the following classes: Metropolitan police inspectors employed in administering the Acts, four; physicians, four; surgeon, one; non-professional persons (male), five; clergymen of the Established Church, two; Roman Catholic priests, three; Dissenting minister, one; superintendent of Lock Hospital, one; police constables, three; serjeant in a Line regiment, one. Those who gave evidence against the Acts may be classified under the following heads: chief constables, five; physician, one; clergymen of the Established Church, two; Dissenting ministers, 12; non-professional persons (male), nine; (female), six. It is, however, right to add that of these witnesses, at least 12 were called with respect to special cases arising out of the working of the Acts.

"SUMMARY OF THE CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS, 1866—1869.

"13. The Contagious Diseases Acts which your Committee are directed to report upon, were passed in the years 1866, 1868, and 1869. They were preceded by the first Contagious Diseases Act, which was passed in 1864, and repealed in 1866. This Statute provided in substance that on information being laid before a justice of the peace by a superintendent or inspector of police, or a medical practitioner showing that he had good cause to believe that a woman was a common prostitute and infected with venereal disease, and that she had been within the limits of certain districts within a specified time for purposes of prostitution, the justice could order her to be taken to a certified hospital for examination. Provision was also made for voluntary submission to examination on the part of women, and on the certificate of the examining medical officer that the woman was diseased, it was enacted that a justice should issue an order for her detention in hospital for a period not exceeding three months. This Act, while making no provision for the erection of hospitals, contained regulations for the inspection and supervision of such hospitals as might become available for the purposes of that from any source. It did not, like subsequent legislation, actually enforce examination, but it imposed penalties on women who, being ordered to submit to examination, refused to do so, or quitted hospital without being duly discharged. It also imposed penalties on owners, occupiers, and managers of houses, rooms, and places within the limits of that for permitting prostitutes, who were known, or whom there was reasonable cause to believe to be affected with a contagious disease, to limit to such houses, &c., for purposes of prostitution.

" 14. For the purposes of the Act of 1866, the Admiralty or Secretary of State for War, as the case may be, are empowered to provide hospitals, or places to be certified as hospitals, and to appoint the visiting surgeons and inspectors. The expenses of the Acts are to be provided for in the Army and Navy Estimates.

Sect. 12.

" 15. No hospital, however, can be certified under this Act, unless at the time of the granting of a certificate adequate provision is made for the moral and religious instruction of the women detained therein under the Act; and if at any subsequent time it appears that in any such hospital adequate provision for that purpose is not made, the certificate is to be withdrawn.

" 16. The most important provisions of the Act, on which the sections abovementioned are consequential, are those which deal with the periodical medical examinations of common prostitutes, and their detention, if diseased, in a hospital.

Sect. 15.

" 17. By Section 15, where an information on oath is laid before a justice by a superintendent of police, charging, to the effect that the informant has good cause to believe that a woman therein named is a common prostitute, and either is resident within the limits of any place to which this Act applies, or being resident within five miles of those limits, has, within 14 days before the laying of the information, been within those limits for the purpose of prostitution, the justice may, if he thinks fit, issue a notice calling on such woman to appear at a certain time and place, which notice the superintendent of police shall cause to be served on her.

Sect. 16.

Sect. 17.

" Any woman may, by a voluntary submission in writing, signed by her in the presence of the superintendent, subject herself to a periodical examination for any period not exceeding one year.

Sect. 18.

" The times and places of examination are to be fixed by the visiting surgeon, subject to regulations, by the Admiralty or Secretary of State for War.

Sect. 20.

" If on examination the woman is found diseased, she may be detained in hospital, under the certificate of the visiting surgeon, until discharged by the chief medical officer.

Sect. 24.

" It is provided that no woman shall be detained longer than three months, unless the medical officer of the hospital, and the inspector of certified hospitals, or the visiting surgeon for the place whence she came, certify that further detention for treatment is requisite; she may then be further detained, but no detention under one certificate shall be longer than six months.

Sect. 25.

" Any woman who refuses to go to a certified hospital after the certificate of the visiting surgeon, may be conveyed there by the police. Power is also given for a woman, who thinks herself unjustly detained, to go before a justice, who may discharge her on being satisfied that she is free from disease.

Sect. 32.

" No order for periodical examination shall be in force for more than a year, and if a woman is certified to be free from disease on her discharge from a hospital, the order ceases to operate.

Sects. 33—35.

" Any woman who desires to be relieved from examination, and who is not detained in a hospital, may apply, in writing, to a justice, who shall hear the case; and if he is satisfied that she has ceased to be a common prostitute, or if, with his approval, she enters into a recognizance for her good behaviour during three months, he may order her to be released therefrom.

Sect. 36.

" An owner or occupier within the limits to which this Act applies who knowingly allows a diseased prostitute to resort to his house for the purpose of prostitution, is liable to a penalty not exceeding 20*l.*, or to imprisonment for six months, with or without hard labour.

" 19. 'The periodical examinations' take place at intervals of a fortnight. The Act of 1868 merely enacts that the term 'superintendent' shall include 'head constable, &c.,' in Ireland.

" 20. The Act of 1869 extended locally the operation of the Acts (for the purpose amongst others of preventing prostitutes from evading the operation of the system by going going immediately outside the limits of the subjected towns and camps), and provided, amongst other things:—

“ First, that any woman attending under the provisions of the Act of 1866 for examination, and found by the visiting surgeon to be in such a condition that he could not properly examine her, should, if such surgeon had reasonable grounds for believing her affected with a contagious disease, be liable to be detained in a certified hospital until she could be properly examined, so that she should not be so detained for a period exceeding five days.

“ Second, that a woman might be detained for a period not exceeding three months, in addition to the six months allowed under the Act of 1866, if a certificate to the effect that her further detention for medical treatment was requisite was given at the expiration of such six months; so, nevertheless, that no woman should be detained under one certificate for a longer time in the whole than nine months.

“ 21. The Acts apply to 13 districts in Great Britain, and two in Ireland, selected on account of the number of soldiers and sailors quartered in them, and the amount and virulence of venereal disease they gave proof of in periods anterior to the passing of the Acts.

“ Southampton is not treated as a subjected station in the Army Medical Reports.

“ 22. The limits of many of the above-named places, hereafter referred to as ‘ subjected districts,’ include, for the purposes of the Acts, localities geographically outside them. Thus, for instance, Plymouth and Devonport include amongst other places, Dartmouth. The Acts apply not merely to common prostitutes residing within the limits of the subjected districts, but also to common prostitutes, who, being resident within 10 miles of such limits, or, having no settled place of abode, have within 14 days before the laying of the information, either been within those limits for the purpose of prostitution, or been outside of those limits for the purposes of prostitution in the company of men resident within those limits.

“ REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION, 1871.

“ 23. Before the end of 1869 a formidable opposition to the Acts had arisen, supported by many persons of station and intelligence, and among others by several ladies, who resented this legislation as insulting to their sex, and tending to the deterioration of public morals. A motion for repeal of the Acts was brought forward in the House of Commons, and the Government recommended the issue of a Royal Commission to inquire into and report upon their Administration and Operation.

Report, Royal Commission, 1871.

“ 24. A Royal Commission of 25 members, of which Mr. Massey was president, was accordingly appointed, and in sittings which occupied 45 days, from 14th December 1870 to 13th May 1871, examined between 80 and 90 witnesses.

“ 25. A Report, signed by the whole of the Commission, with certain reservations by some of its members, was the result of the inquiry. The Commissioners, recalling the fact that periodical examination was only in partial operation up to May 1870, and that the returns were only made up to the end of that year, pointed out that statistical tables (formed on such return) could not be conclusive as to the physical effect of frequent periodical examination. But they subsequently added, though the numerical results of the statistics must be inclusive, the evidence before them appeared to testify to a general impression on the part of the medical officers of both services, that the Acts had operated beneficially on the health of the men. The Report stated that the Commission had come to the conclusion that although the periodical examination of common prostitutes was the most effectual mode of dealing with venereal disease, it would be difficult, if not practically impossible, to make the system general, even if on other grounds it were desirable to do so; that the restriction of the remedy of periodical examination to a few places, while the disease was general through the country, was a state of things that could not in their opinion be permanently maintained; and that a modification of the Acts might be arrived at by which they might be stripped of their anomalous and offensive character, without materially impairing their efficiency.

"(1.) That the periodical examination of public women should be discontinued.

"(2.) That every common prostitute found to be diseased after an examination by a medical officer upon a voluntary submission, or upon a magistrate's order, should be detained in a certified hospital until discharged by a magistrate's order, or by the authorities of such hospital; provided that such detention should in no case exceed three months.

"(3.) That in order to obtain a conviction under s. 36, of the Act of 1866, it should not be necessary to prove that the owner or occupier of the house therein named had reasonable cause to believe that the prostitute resorting to his house was affected with a contagious disease.

"(4.) That 32 & 33 Vict. c. 96 (the Act of 1869), ss. 3, 4, and 5, be repealed.

"(5.) That the Secretary of State for the Home Department should be substituted for the Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Secretary of State for the War Department in the Act of 1866, and that the police employed in carrying the Acts into force should perform their duty in uniform instead of plain clothes.

"(6.) That the main provisions of the repealed Act of 1864 (with an amendment of the provision imposing penalties for permitting women to resort to for purposes of prostitution corresponding to the amendment contained in Section 36 of the Act of 1866) should be extended to any place in the United Kingdom (except the Cities of London and Westminster), from which a request for such extension should be made, and in which proper hospital accommodation should be provided.

"(7.) That every keeper of a public-house harbouring prostitutes should be deprived of his license.

"(8.) That every keeper of a common lodging-house harbouring prostitutes should be subject to the penal clauses of the Common Lodging Houses Acts.

"(9.) That the certificate of the Secretary of State under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 69, s. 16 (the Police Counties and Boroughs Act), should certify that the third section of the Vagrant Act, 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, and the section of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 89, relating to common prostitutes and night walkers have been duly observed.

"(10.) That 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100 (the Act to consolidate and amend the Statute Law relating to Offences against the Person), ss. 51 and 52, should be amended, by making them applicable in cases where the girl was under 14 years of age.

"(11.) That girls under the age of 16 acting as common prostitutes should be sent to a home or industrial school for a period not exceeding two years, if they could not be otherwise provided for to the satisfaction of a magistrate.

"(12.) That the Acts should be partially extended to the Metropolis.

"The Commissioners observed that the Act of 1866 was not applicable to the amendment of the law as proposed by them, as they did not propose special legislation for the benefit of the Army and Navy, but thought that, for the public good, particular districts, from any cause peculiarly liable to contagious disease, should be subject to special sanitary regulations. They therefore approved of the establishment of hospitals at the public charge, and of police regulations enforced under central authority within such districts. Although the Report was signed by all the members of the Royal Commission, seven of them appended a dissent to certain portions of it, especially to the recommendations that the periodical examinations should be given up, and the Act of 1864 practically re-enacted. After pointing out the diminution of disease effected by the Act of 1866, the seven dissentients state:—

"We now proceed to recapitulate the good moral effects which these calumniated Acts have produced, and which, in our opinion, far outweigh any moral objections which have been, or can be, alleged against them.

"(a.) Religious and moral influence has been brought to bear upon large numbers of women, a great portion of whom had been from infancy familiar only with scenes of debauchery and vice.

"(b.) Towns and camps have been cleared, or nearly so, of the miserable creatures who were formerly to be found in their streets and thoroughfares.

"(c.) A considerable number of abandoned women have been reclaimed and restored to respectable life, and in many instances married.

"(d.) The number of town women have been greatly reduced, and those who remain have been rendered more decent and decorous in appearance and conduct.

"(e.) The practice of clandestine prostitution, which too often degenerate into professional vice, has been materially checked by fear of the consequences of such indulgence which are rendered probable under these Acts.

"(f.) The “(f.) The sad spectacle of juvenile prostitutes of tender age, so rife in such localities heretofore, has been greatly diminished, in some instances almost removed.

“(g.) The temptations by which young men of all classes have been hitherto assailed, have been, to a great extent, taken out of their way, and morality has thus been promoted.

“Such are some of the good effects, irrespective of the diminution of disease, which we are led to believe by the evidence before us have been obtained by these Acts, and probably many of those who conscientiously disapprove of these Acts have been unaware of the results brought to light by this inquiry.”

“Another dissent was signed by six members of the Commission, who objected to the revival of the compulsory powers of surgical examination, and committal to hospital, contained in the Act of 1864. These powers, they allege, were open to the objections recognised in the Report as valid against the periodical examination authorised by the Acts of 1866 and 1869, as well as to other objections.

“Four of the six who signed the last-mentioned dissent, signed a further document in which they expressed their dissent from the opinion expressed in the Report, that ‘the most effectual mode of preventing the disease is the regular examination of women at short intervals.’

“26. Your Committee now proceeds to state the result of its first, or hygienic inquiry. The Contagious Diseases Acts were passed with two objects, the diminution of venereal disease and the increased efficiency of the military and naval services. Your Committee has conducted its inquiry into the hygienic effect of the system with the view of learning how far these objects have been attained.

“27. Under the head of venereal diseases are included syphilis and gonorrhœa. The classification of the forms and developments of syphilis has been a subject of controversy between the witnesses before your Committee. The Medical Department of the Army divides it, only, however, for certain statistical purposes, into primary venereal sores, and secondary syphilis. Some primary sores are merely local, others affect the constitution, and their more immediate results, which vary, are called secondary symptoms. Some of the evidence laid before your Committee was directed to prove that syphilis had lost much of its virulence, and was no longer so great a physical evil as in the past. But the testimonies to its severity, and to the injuries inflicted by it on the person who contracts it by contact, and on his or her innocent descendants, were irresistible. Your Committee is of opinion that however increased medical skill and improved sanitary conditions may have mitigated its results, or prepared the human frame to withstand it, it has lost little of its virulence when prompt and adequate measures for its treatment are not taken. It is still, when local, a painful and disabling malady; and, in its constitutional form, the cause not only of the numerous diseases and deaths generally attributed to it, but, in the opinion of eminent and experienced physicians, of much sickness and premature mortality, ordinarily set down to other sources, not only in those who contract it, but in their innocent offspring. The Report of the Royal Commission cites opinions as to the formidable character of syphilis given by Sir James Paget, Sir Wm. Jenner, and Mr. Prescott Hewett, which sustain the inference drawn by your Committee from the evidence laid before them on the subject. Sir James Paget said, before a Committee of the House of Lords, ‘We now know that certain diseases of the lungs, liver and spleen, are all of syphilitic origin, and the mortality from syphilis in its later forms is every year found to be larger and larger by its being found to be the source of a number of diseases which previously were referred to other origins, or to accidents, or which were put down under various heads that they did not belong to. Sir Wm. Jenner dwelt on the transmission of syphilis to the offspring of a diseased parent. Mr. Prescott Hewett, when asked whether the evil existed to such a degree as to require, if possible, legislative remedy, answered, ‘Certainly, if possible. I do not know any disease that is more terrible to my mind than this.’ Gonorrhœa is not followed by the fatal consequences which result from constitutional syphilis. It causes in many instances an amount of local inflammation which interferes seriously for the time with the physical efficiency of the patient, and, in no inconsiderable number of cases, it leads to sequela, often of a serious character.

“28. For the purposes of the inquiry comparisons were instituted—

“(a.) Between 14 subjected districts (Southampton being left out), and all unsubjected stations.

“(b.) Between the same 14 subjected districts and 14 unsubjected stations, namely:

Isle of Wight.
London.
Warley.
Hounslow.
Pembroke Dock.
Sheffield.
Manchester.

Preston.
Edinburgh.
Fermoy.
Limerick.
Dublin.
Athlone.
Belfast.

"29. A disturbing element, which it will appear considerably affected the statistics, came into force in 1873. In October of that year an order, known as Lord Cardwell's Order, was issued, which had the effect of stopping the pay of men under treatment for primary syphilis and gonorrhoea. This led, in all military stations, to considerable concealment of both these forms of disease, to an apparent, but unreal diminution of their prevalence, and to an apparent and real increase of secondary syphilis, the result of concealed and neglected primary sores. This Order ceased to operate late in 1879.

"As the Acts had got into full working order by the beginning of 1870, and continued effective till 1873, when the consequences of Lord Cardwell's Order began to interfere with their operation, the statistics of the period from 1870 to 1873 afford the most satisfactory basis for estimating the value of the system.

"30. Your Committee would premise that prima facie, and in the absence of strong evidence to the contrary, it might fairly be presumed that a measure which has the effect of secluding while in a diseased condition a class of persons admittedly instrumental in propagating a contagious disease, must tend in some degree to diminish the disease. The evidence taken before your Committee fully bears out this presumption.

"31. Syphilis, like certain other maladies, fluctuates under the operation of causes not yet brought completely within the range of science. Its intensity will increase for one period, and diminish for the next, without any palpable reason. This circumstance must be borne in mind in estimating the effect of the Acts. A reduction of syphilis in a given period in a subjected district may be to some extent the result of such a fluctuation, and to guard against any error from this source it is necessary to contrast the condition of unsubjected stations before with their condition at periods after the passing of the Acts. The contrast will show what may be supposed to be due to fluctuation and to other causes outside the Acts. The next step is to contrast the conditions of subjected districts for the same periods. Finally, if, on comparing the changes of condition which have taken place in unsubjected districts where natural fluctuations and ordinary causes have been at work and not impeded with the changes of condition in subjected districts where, in addition to such fluctuation and causes, the Acts have been in operation, it is found that there is a marked difference between the directions or amounts of change, the difference is, in the opinion of your Committee, to be set down to the influence of the Acts.

"32. Your Committee in the course of its inquiry contrasted the changes of condition as to the three kinds of venereal disease between the period anterior to the operation of the system, and the period immediately following its introduction in the 14 subjected districts. They instituted a similar contrast in the case of all the stations which have never come under the Acts, called, for the sake of brevity, 'the non-subjected stations or districts.' A twofold comparison, of periods of equal length, was instituted. The first contrasted the period from 1861 to 1866 inclusive, with the period from 1867 to 1872 inclusive. The former of these periods covers a time when the Acts of 1866 and 1869 were not in force, the latter a time during the earlier part of which, though not completely applied, they were being actively brought into operation, and during the latter part of which, from 1870 to 1872, they were, as we have seen, in full working order.

"33. The second comparison contrasted the period between 1860 and 1863, the period immediately preceding the introduction of the system by the Act of 1864, with the period between 1870 and 1873, the period of their full operation.

"34. Your Committee also took evidence contrasting the 14 subjected with all the unsubjected stations from 1873 to 1878. The statistics of 1878 are the latest which your Committee has been in a position to deal with for the purposes of their Report.

"PRIMARY VENEREAL SORES.

"35. At all unsubjected stations the annual rate per thousand of admissions from 1861 to 1866 was 103·0; from 1867 to 1872, 93·6. This shows a fall of 9·4, equivalent to 9 per cent. of the former ratio. In the subjected districts the ratio per thousand from 1861 to 1866 was 109·7, and from 1867 to 1872, 65·4. This shows a fall of 44·3, equivalent to 40 per cent. of the former ratio. The reduction of 9 per cent. in the unsubjected stations, being the result of natural fluctuations and ordinary causes, and thus indicating a general abatement of the disease through the community, an equal reduction must be assumed to have been effected by the same causes in the subjected districts. It must, therefore, be deducted from the total diminution found in the latter, and the difference, namely, 31, is, in the opinion of your Committee, attributable to the application of the Acts.

"36. The ratio of primary sores in unsubjected stations from 1860 to 1863 was 116·3; from 1870 to 1873, 86·0, showing a reduction of 26 per cent. on the former ratio. The ratio in the 14 subjected stations for the period from 1860 to 1863 was 129·8; for the period from 1870 to 1873, 52·5, showing a reduction of 60 per cent. Deducting from this the reduction of 26 per cent. in the unprotected stations, there remains a reduction of 34 per cent. due to the influence of the Acts when they had been brought into full operation, and before the disturbing influence of Lord Cardwell's Order was felt.

" 37. An examination of the figures brought forward for the purposes of these comparisons showed that in some instances between 1866 and 1867, the ratio of admission for primary venereal sores was higher in some subjected districts than in certain unsubjected stations. But on comparing the condition of the district and stations in question before the Acts with their condition when the Acts were in operation, it was found that in far the larger number of cases, the reduction at the subjected station was much greater than the reduction at the unsubjected ones. This circumstance pointed clearly to the effectiveness of the Acts in diminishing the disease. The mean per-centage of reduction in admissions for primary sores between the two periods, 1861-66 and 1870-73, when the Acts were in full operation in the 14 unsubjected stations, was 5; in the 14 suspected stations it was 52, showing an excess of reduction in the suspected district of 47 per cent.

" 38. It was argued that as for some time previous to the operation of the system, the amount of primary disease had been diminishing in the subjected districts, the reduction subsequently occurring was attributable to a continuance of the causes which had sufficed to produce the former diminution, and that it would have equally taken place if the Acts had not been in force. The reduction previous to the Acts was attributed to the means used to improve the moral condition of the soldier, to occupy his leisure, and to promote clean habits. Now, as these influences were at work at unsubjected as well as subjected districts, it would be natural to expect that in the period before the Acts they would have wrought a reduction in the unsubjected, similar to that which they effected in the subjected districts. A great, though irregular, fall did take place in all the unsubjected stations between 1860 and 1866, and in 1866 both classes stood at nearly the same point as to the amount of primary venereal sores, the rate in the subsequently protected districts being then a shade higher; but if the theory attributing to moral causes and increased cleanliness, the continued reduction subsequently to the Acts in the subjected stations were well founded, the unsubjected stations being under the same influences ought to show in the period subsequent to the Acts a reduction corresponding to that which they experienced in the former period, and therefore similar to, though not identical with, the reduction which later years disclosed in the subjected districts. But this did not occur; the unsubjected districts showed a sudden increase in 1867, and a further considerable increase in 1869. They then fell, rose, fell again, and rose again, maintaining through all these vicissitudes a much higher rate of disease than the subjected districts, and deviating enormously from the course of diminution which, if the theory of general improvement were true, they should have followed. Meantime, the subjected stations have shown, with some irregularities, a gradual and considerable diminution. Starting in 1866, with a rate slightly higher than the unsubjected districts, they experienced, in 1867, a slight increase, trifling in comparison with that exhibited by the unsubjected. The Act of 1866 now began to be effective; in 1869, while the unsubjected districts were still rising, the subjected districts fell very considerably. They subsequently experienced variations similar in kind, but very dissimilar in degree to those experienced in the unsubjected districts. The similarity in kind shows that both classes of districts were influenced by the causes which produce general fluctuations, and by Lord Cardwell's Order; the dissimilarity in degree, and the lower level maintained in the subjected districts since 1866 prove that it is to the influence of the Acts, and not to a general tendency to diminution, that the improvement in the subjected districts is mainly due. These considerations were brought clearly before your Committee in a valuable statistical diagram, the accuracy of which was admitted, which contrasted the theoretical line of improvement, and the lines followed by the subjected and unsubjected districts respectively, from 1860 to 1878. To this diagram, constructed by Mr. Robert Lawson, Inspector General Army Medical Department, your Committee desire to direct particular attention.

" SECONDARY SYPHILIS.

" 39. In the unsubjected stations the ratio per thousand from 1861 to 1866 was 30·7; from 1867 to 1872, 29·2, showing a reduction of 5 per cent. In the subjected stations the ratio from 1861 to 1866 was 37·4, and from 1867 to 1872, 24·6, showing a reduction of 34 per cent. If 5 per cent., the reduction arising from fluctuation and ordinary causes be deducted, the balance, 29 per cent., will represent the reduction effected by the Acts.

" 40. Turning to the periods between 1860 and 1863, and between 1870 and 1873, the ratio per thousand of admissions for secondary syphilis in unsubjected stations was, in the former period, 30·5; in the latter, 27·5, showing a reduction of 10 per cent. In the subjected districts the corresponding ratios were 40 and 20·3 per thousand, a diminution of 49 per cent., from which, if the natural reduction of 10 per cent. in the unsubjected districts be subtracted, there remains, as the result of the operation of the Acts, a diminution of 39 per cent.

" 41. As secondary syphilis makes its appearance, in a large number of cases, at a considerable interval, occasionally as long as twelve months, from the appearance and even from the cure of the primary sore, it is obvious that the amount of secondary syphilis appearing at a given spot does not necessarily represent, but may either exceed or fall short of, the amount of secondary syphilis caused by intercourse at the spot. Men contract primary syphilis at a subjected station; they are removed to an unsubjected place;

secondary syphilis presents itself in their new quarters and is so charged in the returns. The converse process also occurs. Men contract primary syphilis in an unsubjected district, and secondaries develop themselves after removal to a station under the Acts. It is, therefore, obvious that the returns do not disclose the amount of secondary syphilis really chargeable to any particular locality. It is impossible to determine accurately the number of cases of the constitutional phase of disease for which particular localities are responsible. There is, however, a consideration which will enable an estimate to be formed of the relative quantity of secondary syphilis imported from subjected to unsubjected districts, and vice versa. Secondary syphilis bears certain numerical proportions, varying at different times, to primary syphilis. From 1861 to 1872, in all stations, subjected and unsubjected, there were about three primary cases to one secondary case. For the following years, covered by Lord Cardwell's Order, when primary disease was frequently concealed, there being but no inducement to conceal secondary syphilis, the apparent proportion of secondary to primary, as recorded in the returns, had risen from a third to a half. If, then, one set of stations discloses a lower rate of primary syphilis than another set, it must be taken that the first exports a lower, and the second set a higher rate of secondary syphilis. It follows, of course, that if there be a free and promiscuous interchange of troops between the two sets, the first set of stations imports a higher rate of secondary syphilis than the second. If these considerations be applied to the subjected and unsubjected districts, and if it be borne in mind that the former disclose a lower rate of primary syphilis than the latter, it will appear that while, of course, the unsubjected stations import a certain proportion of secondary disease from the subjected, the latter import a larger proportion from the former, and that the statistics attribute to places under the Acts an amount of secondary syphilis exceeding what was contracted in those places. The fewer the primary sores contracted in a given district the less secondary disease it will export, and the more of the secondary disease appearing against it in the Tables it will have imported. It would follow from this that in the subjected districts the primary sores being greatly reduced, and the excess of importation over exportation being considerable, the proportion of secondaries to primaries recorded should be high, and should not show signs of diminution proportionate to the real diminution of disease, primary and secondary, taking place under the Acts.

" GONORRHEA.

" 42. The rate of admissions per thousand for unsubjected stations from 1861 to 1866 was 108·2; from 1867 to 1872, 105·4, a reduction of 3 per cent. The ratios for the same periods in the subjected districts were respectively 125·1 and 114·6, a reduction of 8 per cent.; attributing 3 per cent. of this to the causes outside the Acts, the latter are to be credited with a reduction of 5 per cent.

" 43. The contrast of 1860-63 and 1870-73 shows ratios in the unsubjected stations of 116·1 and 95·0, proving a general reduction of 18 per cent. The corresponding ratios in the subjected districts were 134·6 and 100·6, involving a reduction of 25 per cent., and leaving as the result of the Acts, after the subtraction of the general reduction, a reduction of 7 per cent.

" 44. Comparisons as to the change of condition with respect to primary venereal sores and gonorrhœa in the above periods were also drawn at an early stage in the inquiry of your Committee between the 14 subjected stations and 14 above-mentioned unsubjected stations, each of which contain 500 men, or upwards. Secondary syphilis was not included in this contrast, because although the information in the possession of the Army Medical Department at the time would have enabled tables to be constructed for the purpose of a comparison as to secondary syphilis, the statistics were not set in order for that purpose until a later date, when they were utilised for the purposes of the contrast of changes of condition between the 14 subjected and all the unsubjected stations. The object of the comparison between the changes in the 14 unsubjected and the 14 subjected stations was not to contrast any one unsubjected with any one subjected station at a given period, but to contrast the condition of the stations of each class at one time with their condition at another, and by juxtaposition of the changes to distinguish as in the case of the more general comparison above described, the results of fluctuations and ordinary causes from the results of the Acts. The conclusions deducible from these comparisons as to primary syphilis and gonorrhœa were even more favourable to the effect of the Acts than those derived from the broader comparison drawn between the 14 subjected and all unsubjected stations as to those diseases, and showed a considerable reduction in the case of the former disease, and a moderate one in the case of the latter effected by the Acts.

COMPARISON OF SUBJECTED AND UNSUBJECTED DISTRICTS, FROM 1873 TO 1878.

"45. From 1873 to 1878 the ratio per 1,000 of admissions to hospital for primary syphilis in the subjected districts was 39·3; in the unsubjected, 71·2. The corresponding ratios of secondary syphilis were 22·0 and 30·2.

"46. The per-centage of secondary on primary sores in the subjected stations for this period was 56·0; in the unsubjected, 42·4. Your Committee is obliged to attribute the higher per-centage in the subjected stations to their greater importation of secondary syphilis already noted, the apparent effect of which on the relative proportions of primary and secondary syphilis was increased by the concealment of primary syphilis, in consequence of Lord Cardwell's Order.

"47. The subjected districts show a reduction in the ratio of admissions per 1,000 for secondary syphilis from 24·6 in the period 1867-72 to 22·0 in the period 1873-78. This is equivalent to a reduction of 10·6 per cent. The unsubjected districts disclose as the corresponding figures 29·2 and 30·2, showing an increase of 3·4 per cent.

"48. The mean rate of death from syphilis all over England from 1870 to 1873 was 80 per million; from 1873 to 1878 it rose to 86 per million, an increase of 7·5 per cent. on the former rate. This fluctuation told on the army as well as on the general population. But the comparison of its effects on the statistics of constitutional disease in the subjected and unsubjected stations deserves to be noted. Constitutional disease rose in both classes of districts from 1873 to 1878, but in different degrees. The ratio of admissions per 1,000 for secondaries from 1870 to 1873 were, in the subjected districts, 20·3; in the unsubjected, 27·5. The corresponding figures for 1873 to 1878 were 22·0 for the subjected, and 30·2 for the unsubjected districts. The fluctuation produced in the subjected districts an increase of 8·4 per cent. on the low ratio of 20·3, against an increase of 9·8 per cent. on the higher ratio of 27·5 in the subjected.

"49. For gonorrhœa the ratios of admissions per 1,000 for 1873 to 1878 were in the subjected districts, 69·3; in the unsubjected, 73·3. The difference at first sight seems trivial, but it is to be remembered that the subjected stations, in the period previous to the passing of the present Acts, from 1861 to 1866, show a ratio of 125·1 against a ratio of 108·2 in the unsubjected. Passing to the first sexennial period during which the Acts were in operation, the subjected, notwithstanding a considerable reduction of gonorrhœa, show a ratio of 114·5, while the unsubjected, though little improved from their former condition, show a smaller absolute ratio than the subjected, namely, 105·4. Even during the period from 1870 to 1873, although the effect of the Acts in reducing the disease is visible, the subjected stations have not overcome the disadvantage under which they started, and show a ratio of 100·6 against 95·0 in the unsubjected. But the period 1873-78 reverses the situation, and shows the subjected districts with not merely a greater reduction in gonorrhœa than that disclosed by the unsubjected, but with a smaller ratio of admissions per 1,000, instead of the larger ratios which prevailed in them before, and to a lesser degree during the previous history of the Acts.

"50. The average ratios per thousand of cases of gonorrhœa from 1867 to 1877 in the 14 protected, and 14 unprotected districts were compared and showed higher figures in the case of certain of the former than certain of the latter. But on applying the test of comparing each class of districts in the period 1867-1877 with itself in 1861-1866, and contrasting, as has been done in the case of primary syphilis, the change of condition, it appeared that the ratio in the 14 stations not under the Acts, was, in the earlier period, 109·0; in the latter it was 101·0, showing a reduction of 7, while the corresponding figures in the 14 subjected districts were 125·1 and 92·2, showing a reduction of 26 per cent. The 14 subjected districts, therefore, taken together, show a reduction of 19 per cent. over the others.

"51. It has been stated above that the classification of venereal diseases adopted by the Army Medical Department has been the subject of controversy. It is complained that the enumeration under one head of sores which do, and sores which do not produce secondary syphilis, deprives the Army statistics of all value. Your Committee received evidence showing that there are two schools on the subject of syphilis in the medical profession. One asserts that the sore which produces constitutional disease (called "infecting or hard sore"), and that which does not affect the constitution (called "pseudo-syphilitic" or soft sore), are different in kind. This view is called the dual theory. The other school, whose adherents are called Unicists, holds that the same primary sore may, under different circumstances, remain merely local, or develop into constitutional syphilis. It seems, however, to be admitted by both parties that it is in a very large number of cases impossible in the earlier stages of a sore to say whether it will lead to secondaries or not. It might, indeed, be inferred from the evidence of some witnesses that in some instances the precise nature of the primary sore can only be determined ex post facto according according as it does or does not produce secondaries, and that in such cases whether a sore is, in the true sense, pseudo-syphilitic or infecting can only be ascertained by the ultimate event. Mr. Macnamara, a surgeon of great experience, stated, with reference to this subject, that he had seen 'as bad secondaries result from soft as hard sores, and that he had seen a man with a hard chancre without any treatment whatsoever, never have secondaries, and that it was a chancre (i.e., a hard sore) was proved by his communicating the disease in a very severe form to his wife, and he was not what is termed a 'syphilitised' man (i.e., a man protected by previous inoculation from true syphilitic contagion) for he never had had previously any kind of venereal sore.' The Army Medical Department being obliged to give returns of primary sores as they arise, without waiting for their development, is under the necessity of classing in its returns all primary sores under one head for statistical purposes. This does not pledge it to either of the theories described, nor does it appear to your Committee to interfere with the value of the departmental statistics as to the disease.

" 52. Some of the medical opponents of the Acts have urged as an argument against the value of the examination that it is difficult to ascertain the presence of syphilis in the female. One of these witnesses, Dr. Routh, went so far as to say that out of a given number of diseased women coming to a competent medical man, the examination would prove abortive, and the medical man would not be able to ascertain the traces of disease in about one-half these cases. It must be remarked that most of the medical witnesses who insist on the difficulty of ascertaining the presence of the disease, stop far short of this opinion. Your Committee, taking into account all the medical evidence given on this subject, have come to the conclusion that while, undoubtedly, cases may occur in which the traces of disease escape notice, they are unusual, and that an experienced surgeon will rarely fail to detect venereal.

" 53. Your Committee examined carefully into the question how far the Acts have operated to influence the efficiency of the Army. Their effect in this respect was considered from several points of view, and it appears that they have augmented the available strength of the Army to an extent proportioned to that which the statistics show that they have diminished disease. Applying the plan adopted for measuring the true effect of the Acts in reducing disease, your Committee contrasted the changes of condition as to efficiency (so far as the diminution or increase of efficiency resulted from a greater or lesser number of men being in hospital in consequence of venereal disease) in unsubjected with corresponding changes in subjected districts. This comparison involved considerable difficulty, but after carefully eliminating all discoverable inaccuracies and sources of error, your Committee were satisfied, contrasting the 14 subjected with all unsubjected stations, that during the period between 1870 and 1873, when the Acts were in full operation, unaffected by Lord Cardwell's Order, they saved 5·38 men per 1,000 daily to the Army. The daily loss from venereal disease in the 14 subjected stations from 1860 to 1863, was 24·01 per 1,000; in the unsubjected stations 19·75 per 1,000, or 4·26 less than in the subjected. This last number constitutes $\frac{1}{303}$ of the rates at the unsubjected stations. Starting with this disadvantage, the subjected stations showed in 1870-1873, a daily loss of 11·31 per 1,000, against a daily loss in the unsubjected, of 13·73. The difference, 2·42 per 1,000, does not show all that has been effected in the way of saving by the Acts, because it does not take into account that at the period 1860-1863, previous to the operation of any of the Acts, the subjected districts were in a worse position, as regards diminution of efficiency, than the unsubjected by $\frac{1}{303}$ of the amount observed in the latter. In order to make up for the advantage possessed by the unsubjected districts in the period before the Acts, and thus to show the real improvement effected under and by virtue of the Acts in the subjected districts, it is necessary to add to the ratio of daily loss per 1,000 from 1870 to 1873 in the unsubjected districts, an amount corresponding with the relative advantage as to daily loss they possessed over the subjected from 1860 to 1863, namely, as has been stated, $\frac{1}{303}$ of their amount of daily loss. Adding, therefore, to 13·73 $\frac{1}{303}$ of itself, namely, 2·96, a sum of 11·69 is obtained, and subtracting thence 11·31, the ratio of daily loss per 1,000 in the subjected districts, a difference of 5·38 per 1,000, representing the true saving effected by the Acts is the result. This, it is to be borne in mind, means that out of 16·69 per 1,000, who would probably have been daily withdrawn from the efficient strength per 1,000 of the Army in the subjected districts, if they had not been under the Acts, 5·38 per 1,000 have been daily saved to the efficient strength of the Army by the operation of the Acts.

" 55. In a general sense, as has been said, the effect of Lord Cardwell's Order has been uniform on all districts, subjected and unsubjected; but it is to be borne in mind that the concealment to which it led resulted in the neglect of primary disease, and consequently in an increased virulence of secondary disease. Now the more virulent secondary disease is, the longer time it will require for treatment, and the more it will diminish the efficiency of the Army by keeping men in hospital. But it has been shown that while both subjected and unsubjected districts are charged with an amount of secondary disease, contracted outside their respective limits, the subjected districts have been charged charged with a greater proportion of secondaries contracted outside them than the unsubjected. Lord Cardwell's Order increasing the virulence of this excessive proportion of secondary syphilis, unduly charged to the subjected districts, has added to the disadvantage at which the excessive importation of secondaries has placed the subjected districts as to the number of men in hospital, and the diminution of the daily efficiency per 1,000 of the Army.

"56. Your Committee have had evidence tending to show that the Acts have diminished venereal disease in the civil population in those parts of Great Britain where they have been in operation. In dealing with the statistics of mortality from syphilis it must be borne in mind that, as already stated, many deaths primarily due to syphilis are set down to other causes. All the subjected stations in Great Britain, save two, are in the second and fifth divisions of the Registrar General; the exceptions are Colchester, which is in the fourth, and Woolwich, which is in the first, or Metropolitan division. The variations in the number of deaths from syphilis in the second and fifth divisions were contrasted with the variations in the other divisions which were almost entirely, as in the case of the first and fourth, or altogether as in the case of all the others save the first and fourth, outside the region of the Acts. The second and fifth divisions for the three quinquennial periods, 1865-9, 1870-4, 1875-9, showed a reduction from first to last, of 14 per cent. in the deaths from syphilis in the civil population. The third, fourth, and sixth divisions immediately north of the second and fifth, showed over the same period an increase of 16 per cent.; proceeding still northward, the seventh and eleventh showed an increase of 37 per cent., while the most northern part showed an increase of 15 per cent. The Metropolitan division showed a moderate decrease of about 9 per cent. over the whole period. Your Committee do not attribute its exceptional position to the fact of its containing Woolwich, which, compared with the entire division, is too small to be an important factor; but your Committee are of opinion that the general figures show that the Acts have diminished mortality from syphilis among the civil population to a considerable distance around them. They have also received evidence showing that the number of cases of venereal disease presented for treatment from the civil population to practitioners in several subjected districts, has fallen off considerably, a circumstance which points to a general diminution of disease outside the Army in subjected districts.

"57. The extent to which the Acts have diminished primary and constitutional or secondary syphilis in the subjected districts appears of itself, to your Committee, to establish the hygienic utility of the Acts. The diminution of gonorrhœa in the subjected districts attributable to the Acts in the same period is less considerable but substantial.

"58. In connection with this part of the subject, your Committee cannot overlook the very general opinion of the medical profession, both in and outside of the subjected districts, who on hygienic grounds strongly advocate the maintenance of the Acts.

"59. Your Committee is of opinion that the Acts have successfully served the two objects to which they were directed—the diminution of venereal disease, and the increased efficiency of the Army. It is to be remembered that the Acts have had in reality but an inadequate trial. In the earlier years, from 1866 to 1869, they were not in full efficiency. The three following years were not a sufficiently long period to develop their full influence, and their utility thenceforward has been diminished, up to 1879, by the action of Lord Cardwell's Order. The benefit conferred since 1866 is great, but it is only an earnest of what the Acts may be expected to do hereafter for the health and efficiency of the Army.

"60. Your Committee now proceed to deal with the second branch of their inquiry, namely, the operation of the Acts as regarded in their constitutional, moral, and social aspects, a subject involving considerations of great delicacy and difficulty.

"OBJECTIONS (ON OTHER THAN HYGIENIC GROUNDS) TO THE ACTS.

"The main objections raised against the Acts from these points of view may be stated as follows:—

"(1.) That they involve the recognition and regulation of vice by the State, and are therefore an outrage upon public morality.

"(2.) That they violate the first principles of constitutional law.

"(3.) That, in practice, they tend to increase sexual vice, by creating an impression on the minds both of soldiers and civilians that it may be indulged with impunity.

"(4.) That they subject women to restraints and penalties from which men are free.

"(5.) That under them virtuous and respectable women at the instance, and even on the mere caprice of the police, may be, and, as a matter of fact, are, brought before a magistrate, classed as prostitutes, and subjected to a painful and degrading examination.

"(6.) That they have increased what is called 'clandestine prostitution.'

"It will be convenient to discuss each of these objections under a separate head.

Oshorne, 4807.
Gillett, 5046.

" 61. The two first objections to the Acts are objections of principle. The opponents urge that, whether hygienically successful or not, and whether well or ill administered, they violate principles of paramount moral and constitutional value. This argument has been pressed to such an extent, that some witnesses have not hesitated to declare that the more successful the Acts have proved from a sanitary point of view, the more objectionable they are from a moral point of view.

" 62. It is said that they regulate prostitution, and offer it in return for obedience to the regulations of the State, a definite toleration. Your Committee have afforded the exponents of this view ample opportunity of explaining their opinions, and have endeavoured to learn the position which, in their judgment, the State, apart from these Acts, does maintain, and also the position which, according to them, the State ought to maintain in reference to the social evil. It is not denied that the State permits prostitution to exist. The prostitute is punishable if she carries on her trade in such a manner as to outrage public decency, or violate certain laws and regulations not directed against the habit of prostitution, pure and simple, but against the habit, under certain aggravating circumstances of disorder. Simple prostitution is at present, not connived at, but openly tolerated. Women known to be engaged in it are permitted to appear in public, notoriously with a view to applying their trade, provided they abstain from solicitation and indecent and disorderly conduct. If there be any law prohibitory of prostitution, pure and simple, it is a dead letter. As to the position which the State ought to take up, it has not been seriously argued that it would be prudent to attempt the total suppression of the evil. It has not been contended that its suppression by the State is practically possible. Now it appears to your Committee that if the State tolerates this evil, it is under a certain obligation to mitigate, as far as possible, the grave injuries resulting from it. Further, if it is admitted that the State cannot suppress the evil, it is difficult to see how those who make this admission, and thus absolve the State from the obligation of suppression, can consistently deny the State the right to take effective measures for the purpose of minimising the injurious results of the evil. The Acts do not give prostitution more toleration than it enjoyed before their existence, or than it now enjoys, where they are not in force. It is not the Acts, but the administration of the ordinary law that gives it toleration. All the Acts have done is to insist that the toleration permitted by the institutions of the country shall be exercised with less detriment to public health.

" 63. It is alleged that the Act involves in principle the encouragement of vice by offering safety to its indulgence. It has not, however, been seriously argued that the Acts were passed with this object. In subsequent paragraphs your Committee give their reasons for the belief that they have not, as a matter of fact, done so. If then, it is admitted that their object was not to encourage vice, and if your Committee are right in the belief that as a matter of fact they do not operate in that direction, it seems to your Committee unreasonable to charge them with a violation of moral principle which was not intended in framing the system, nor produced in the course of its administration. The argument founded on the alleged encouragement of vice by the Acts is, in principle, available against any State institution or system devised to cure disease in the known prostitute, because such institution or system must diminish the chance of the infliction of disease on men who consort with her after her cure. If the State encourages vice by insisting on submission to examination and treatment, and by thus inducing men to believe they can sin with impunity, it would also encourage vice by offering the prostitute special facilities for cure, and inducements to avail herself of them. Some opponents of the Acts, conscious of the force of this view, object to the endowment of Lock hospitals by the State. They are, however, willing that the disease should be treated in general hospitals side by side with other diseases. It is obvious that if the argument against enforced examination and cure, founded on the impunity it offers to sin, be valid, it is in principle available against any aid being given by the State for the treatment of unreclaimed prostitutes in common hospitals, as well as for the erection of separate hospitals, and not only against the grant of such aid by the State, but against its grant from the rates, and from private individuals. Your Committee are of opinion that the objection to the system on the ground of the alleged encouragement or facilities given to vice involves fundamentally the opinion, which however the opponents of the Acts strenuously reject, that prostitutes who have no intention of leaving their calling should not be provided with the means of cure, least their freedom from disease should encourage men to associate with them.

" It has been usual for the opponents of the system to assume that the Acts are analogous to certain continental methods of dealing with prostitution, which avowedly offer facilities for vice. It seems to your Committee that the contrast between the Acts and the notorious features of certain continental systems affords strong proof that the former violate no principle of morality. The English statutes make an attempt at reclamation by moral and religious agencies an essential part of every attempt to check the evils of prostitution. The foreign systems tend to confine public women in brothels, where every good influence is avowedly excluded. The insistence on religious and moral influences make the system in principle an ally and not an enemy of religion and morality. Whether they practically work in this direction is a question of fact hereafter to be considered. But your Committee are of opinion that so far as the objection of principle is concerned, it is not well founded.

"64.—(2.) It is also alleged that the Acts violate constitutional rights by the authority they confer over the person of the prostitute. Your Committee have found nothing in the arguments brought forward in support of this view which is not in principle equally cogent against other enactments which have been passed for the purpose of diminishing disease in the community by insisting on its prevention or cure in the individual. The State insists on vaccination, and on the isolation and treatment of persons suffering from certain infectious diseases. In doing so, the State assumes a certain authority over the person of the individual for the preservation of the general health. It follows precisely the same principle in asserting its right to prevent the spread of venereal disease. It is said that the means used by the State for this object, namely, the compulsory examination of the prostitute, makes the interference of the State unconstitutional. Your Committee reject this view. The prostitute, of her own free will, makes her person a source of danger, not only to the men who consort with her, but to innocent persons. She cannot justly complain if she is compelled to submit to examination and treatment which her own deliberate act has rendered necessary for the good of the community. If it were found, as a matter of fact, that her examination and treatment had the effect of confirming her in evil, it might well be argued that the State had no right to lessen the chances of moral reclamation for the purpose of preventing physical injury. Your Committee, in subsequent paragraphs, give reasons for their belief that no such effect is produced by the system, and they are of opinion that the authority assumed by the State is not unconstitutional. The prostitute, in order to prevent the spread of a fatal disease, is compelled to submit to measures which are not in themselves indecent, and which virtuous women undergo voluntarily. The examination is not in itself, and apart from the causes which necessitate it a dishonour, and the compulsion to which the prostitute has to submit, is the result of her own misconduct.

"(3.) As to the objection that these Acts by making vice safe practically operate so as to increase immorality, your Committee from the very nature of the question feel that it is one with which it is difficult to deal. It is not easy to diagnose the various motives which impel or restrain different men to or from vicious sexual indulgence, and it is probable that these motives vary considerably according to the age, disposition, and circumstances of each individual. But the evidence which your Committee have received on the subject, as well as the inherent probabilities of the case, lead to the conclusion that, as a rule, men who indulge in irregular sexual intercourse, especially the younger and more reckless among them, gratify their wicked passions without the slightest regard to any sanitary consequence, and that the fear of disease is absolutely no check upon the gratification of what is often nothing more than a strong animal instinct. Your Committee therefore think that in this respect too the opponents of the Act have failed to make out their case. It is worthy of observation that this objection, founded as it is on the supposed tendency of the Acts to secure immunity from disease, is urged by the very persons who contend that they have, from a sanitary point of view, proved a complete failure.

"(4.) The fourth objection may be quickly disposed of. The Acts are directed not against women, but against prostitutes, i.e., against a class who, as stated in the Report of the Royal Commission (paragraph 60), 'commit the sin of fornication as a matter of gain,' and it may be added, in the deliberate exercise of their calling, and who are specially liable to contract and propagate disease in the exercise of that calling. Among the male part of the population no corresponding class exists, and it is difficult to see to what men such legislation could be applied. To extend it to the whole male population of the country or of any particular district would be almost as absurd as to extend it to the whole female population, while the medical examination of soldiers, if thought desirable from a sanitary point of view, might be, and in certain cases is, carried out as a matter of military regulation without the need for any actual legislation. It may be observed, in passing, that since the cancelling of Lord Cardwell's Order already referred to, there is not the same inducement to soldiers to conceal venereal disease of any kind.

"(5.) The fifth objection to the Act is of the gravest kind, and if it could be sustained would be, in the opinion of your Committee, fatal to their maintenance. They have, therefore, thought it their duty to spare no labour in probing it to the utmost.

"Before proceeding further with this branch of the inquiry, your Committee would call special attention to the fact that in the course of 16 years not a single case has been brought before your Committee in which any woman alleged to have been wrongfully brought under the operation of the Acts has brought an action or taken legal proceedings against the police authorities in respect of any act done by them under the Contagious Diseases Acts. Considering the large funds at the disposal of the various associations for the repeal of the Acts—the zeal and activity with which their operations have been carried on, and the opportunities for the exposure of the alleged vices of the system, which such proceedings, even if unsuccessful, would afford, your Committee cannot but regard this fact as a significant testimony to the conduct of the police. The explanation given by Mr. Shaen in his evidence (Q. 7137—49), that under the 42nd section of the Act of 1866, the defendant to such an action 'might plead generally that the act complained of was done in pursuance or execution, or intended pursuance or execution of the Acts, and give the Act and the special matter in evidence at any trial to be had thereupon,' seems to your Committee singularly insufficient. It must be obvious to anyone acquainted with legal procedure that such a plea would in no way protect any person acting under the Acts from the consequences of such misconduct as has been imputed to the police.

"Various cases have, however, been brought before your Committee in which it was alleged that an attempt had been made by the police charged with the administration of the Acts improperly to bring women under their operation. Many of these cases were defended by the agents of the societies for the repeal of the Act, and in some cases such defences were successful. Considering, however, the number of years during which the Acts have been in operation, your Committee cannot but think that, especially of late years, these cases have been very rare, while the evidence by which it has been sought to substantiate them, has been anything but satisfactory.

"On the whole, therefore, your Committee are not satisfied that in a single case the action of the police has been marked by the carelessness and misconduct recklessly attributed to them. Even where the summonses have been dismissed by the magistrates the cases appear to have warranted reasonable suspicion, or to have been surrounded by doubt, the benefit of which was naturally given to the women summoned. On the other hand, many of the most strenuous opponents of the system have testified to the great care and discretion with which the police have acted. In a recent case, however, alluded to as the Dover case, which was dismissed by the borough justices without hearing the defence, the charges brought against the police (who, it is only fair to state, were not professionally represented before the magistrates) were so grave and specific that your Committee felt it to be their duty to sift the case thoroughly, not with a view of reviewing or contesting the decision of the justices, but in order to see whether the police acted with reasonable discretion. For this purpose they called not only those witnesses who were examined before the magistrates, but several other witnesses who were in a position to throw light upon the case. The evidence of these witnesses (who were examined on oath) occupied more than three whole days, and will be found in the printed Evidence. Your Committee think it unnecessary to make any comment on this evidence, except to say that they think that the conduct of the police charged with the administration of the Act was not open to censure.

"In connection with this part of the subject, it should be borne in mind that one of the charges brought against the Acts is, that they are administered with so much laxity that almost any prostitute who chooses can evade their operation. It is hardly necessary to point out that this objection, which will be hereafter considered, is, on the face of it, scarcely consistent with the theory, that they have introduced a system of espionage fatal to personal liberty, or even that they have been carried out with undue severity.

"Your Committee therefore are of opinion that the charges of misconduct brought against the police have broken down, and they desire to record their concurrence in the opinion unanimously expressed by the Royal Commission (para. 23 of the Report) "That the police are not chargeable with any abuse of their authority, and that they have hitherto discharged a novel and difficult duty with moderation and caution."

"(6). It is charged that the Acts have increased clandestine prostitution in the subjected districts. This allegation is disproved, in the opinion of your Committee, by the evidence, not only of trustworthy officials, experienced in the condition of those places, but also by that of persons unconnected with the administration of the system who have watched closely its effect. The evidence as to Aldershot, the largest military centre, showed that when the Acts first came into operation, clandestine prostitution was common in its neighbourhood, and that since then, both in the opinion of the residents, and in that of the experienced physician in charge of the Lock Hospital, it has largely decreased. In Plymouth, Devonport, Woolwich, Deal, Cork, and other districts, which may be regarded as typical subjected stations, it has been proved to your Committee that a similar decrease has taken place, and a consideration of the scope of the Acts show that their general tendency is to diminish clandestine, as well as open, prostitution. Your Committee wish to call special attention to the evidence on this subject as to Cork, one of the Irish subjected stations. A general assertion of the increase of clandestine prostitution amongst a class of girls of respectable position in that district was made by one of the witnesses, who founded his opinion on, amongst other things, the alleged admission of members of the constabulary engaged in administering the Act in Cork. It was met in the first place by denials from each of the constables so employed that he had made such an admission; in the second place, by clear testimony that clandestine prostitution had not increased, given by clergymen intimately acquainted with the condition of the town, and by the surgeon of the Lock Hospital, who had special opportunities for knowing the real state of things; and, thirdly, by the fact that illegitimate births, which are an ordinary result of extensive clandestine prostitution, had become far fewer than in former times, and that attempts to procure abortion, an equally clear index of this form of vice, were quite exceptional. The deterrent influence of the Acts tends to restrain persons who are not committed to a life of prostitution, public or clandestine, from entering on it, and exposing themselves to the supervision of the police. Women are thus deterred, or if not deterred, rescued at an early stage of vice from that more private kind of prostitution, which they resort to before going regularly on the streets. In this way the Acts of necessity cut off one great source of clandestine prostitution. Again, the police diminish the tendency to clandestine prostitution by seeking out and warning women whom they find likely to enter such a career, and by giving information to their relatives, a subject which will be hereafter more fully considered. Of course, the desire to escape registration will lead prostitutes who consort with the richer classes of men to practice increased secrecy, in order to escape the notice of the police. There is no doubt that some women who in the subjected districts before the Acts would have practised prostitution openly, now endeavour, and in comparatively few cases with success, to carry on their trade in private. But your Committee are of opinion that owing to the vigilant administration of the police, this does not take place to any great extent, and that on the whole the deterrent effect of the Acts, and their judicious administration, have diminished the number of clandestine, as well as public prostitutes.

“ADVANTAGES (OTHER THAN HYGIENIC) CONFERRED BY THE ACTS.

“65. On the other hand the advocates of the Acts claim for them that they have,—

“(1.) Diminished prostitution in subjected districts.

“(2.) Almost entirely suppressed juvenile prostitution.

“(3.) Rescued fallen women from the frightful state of filth and disease in which they had previously lived, and thus placed them under conditions in which they for the first time become amenable to humanizing and reforming influences.

“(4.) Contributed to promote public order and decency in the districts in which they are in force.

“66. (1.) There can be no doubt that in the subjected districts the number both of prostitutes and brothels has, since the Acts, largely decreased. On this point your Committee would refer to the evidence given by the Rev. Prebendary Wilkinson, by Mr. W. Luscombe, and Inspector Annis as to Plymouth, Devonport, and Stonehouse; by the Rev. H. Reid, the Rev. T. O'Reilly, the Rev. Canon Hegarty, and Mr. Curtis as to Cork; by the Rev. E. P. Grant as to Portsmouth; by the Rev. T. Tuffield as to Woolwich; by Mr. Adam Stigent as to Chatham, and by Mr. Piddock as to Deal, as well as to the returns published under Captain Harris's direction. Indeed this diminution has been admitted by the opponents of the Acts, though they attribute it to other causes. But without pushing the argument post hoc ergo propter hoc too far, your Committee feel that they are justified not only by a comparison between the condition of the subjected districts before and after the Acts, but by a comparison between the present condition of these districts and that of other large towns, in setting down a main portion of these good effects to the credit of the Acts.

“(a.) By the deterrent effect of the Acts in preventing many women, especially young girls on the border-land, as it has been called, between levity and immorality, from embarking in a career of vice. This question was partially discussed in the paragraphs dealing with clandestine prostitution, and will be further considered when the question of the decrease of juvenile prostitution is discussed.

“(b.) By the excellent spiritual and moral influences brought to bear on the women while in hospital, and the successful efforts made by the superintendents and chaplains of these hospitals to place them in the way of obtaining a decent and respectable livelihood after their discharge.

“(c.) By the intimate knowledge which the police charged with the administration of the Acts obtain, both of the houses of ill-fame in their districts, and of the inmates of such houses, and the consequent opportunities which they have of suppressing the one, and of tracing, and, in many cases, reclaiming the other.

“68. Your Committee think that all these three agencies have been proved to be instrumental in producing the beneficial results above referred to.

“(a.) That the Acts should exercise a deterrent effect upon women, a point strongly insisted upon by every witness called in defence of the system, seems almost self-evident. The point was virtually admitted by some of the witnesses on the other side who spoke of prostitutes as removing from the subjected to the unsubjected districts for the purpose of escaping the yoke of the police. Indeed, it would seem that the more irksome that yoke was, the stronger would be the deterrent influences of the Acts.

“(b.) Your Committee are satisfied, on the evidence placed before them, that the moral and religious influences brought to bear in the certified hospitals are largely productive of reclamation. Some witnesses spoke of the registered women who became patients as altogether hardened and unwilling to submit to good influences. The Rev. Flavel Cook, Chaplain of the London Lock Hospital, is of this opinion. But his views were controverted by Mr. Seaton Carr, Vice-chairman of the Hospital, who was able to point to a large number of registered women, patients in the institution, who were reclaimed through its agency. Your Committee desires to call special attention to the statements on this subject of Miss Webb, the Lady Superintendent of the Chatham Lock Hospital, and to the numerous testimonies which she produced as to the good effects of hospital detention upon the women under her charge, and the success of her efforts to bring them back to a virtuous and respectable life.

Reid, 6183 et seq.
Annis, 3686 et seq.

“It has been said that the beneficial results above referred to are only the indirect consequences of the Acts. This argument is disposed of by the 12th section of the Act of 0.75.

1866, and as a large portion of the women reclaimed would, but for the system created by the Acts, never have been subjected to the influences in question, it is only fair to credit that system with these results. On the other hand, it is contended that the examination hardens the prostitute in vice and shamelessness. The evidence given in this direction has been, in the opinion of your Committee, overborne in the first place by the evidence of opinions to the contrary held not only by respectable officials connected with the administration of the Acts, but also by clergymen and other benevolent persons who have watched the operation of the system and utilised it for reclamation. Again, the number of reclamations which take place among women who have been placed on the register is, in itself, a proof that the examination system has not the deteriorating effect attributed to it. In connection with this subject, it is to be borne in mind that the examination is conducted with a scrupulous decency, and that when disease is discovered, its cure is accompanied by moral and religious efforts to effect conversion. These facts are calculated not to harden the registered women, but to assure them that the State is still hopeful and desirous of their return to a decent life.

“(c.) Your Committee cannot lay sufficient stress on the means which these Acts afford the police charged with their administration for tracking out the keepers of brothels, and for following and rescuing the unhappy women who have been enticed into them, and who, there is too much reason to believe, are often detained in them against their will. Such a practice (which Mr. Lownes, the eminent surgeon, of Liverpool, believes to be very common) could hardly be carried on in the subjected districts, where the police know every brothel and inmate of a brothel in the place. The result is that to smuggle away girls into houses of ill-fame, and immerse them there against their will, becomes practically impossible. Indeed, it is a very general practice in these districts for the parents of girls who have been decoyed, or have run away from home, to apply to the police charged with administering the Acts for information respecting their missing daughters, and when this is done, only a very few hours usually elapse before the girl is found and restored to her relatives. Several instances of this kind were mentioned to your Committee by Inspector Anniss and other witnesses.

“69. In the same way, these police being, from their occupation and duties, necessarily made acquainted with the brothels in their district, are enabled to use the machinery of the law and other agencies for the purpose of suppressing them. Inspector Anniss has, in his evidence, detailed the various ways in which this has been effected in Plymouth and the adjoining district, and the Rev. H. Reid (Answer 6213) and the Rev. Canon Hegarty (Answer 11006 et seq.) have admitted, in the fullest manner, the assistance which they obtained from the Cork police charged with the administration of the Acts in a crusade which they some years ago instituted against these houses. It is no answer to this contention to say that the Acts give the police no power to suppress or even to enter a brothel as such. The 36th section of the Act of 1866 subjects every person inducing or suffering a prostitute whom he has reasonable cause to believe diseased to resort to his house for the purpose of prostitution to very severe penalties, the enforcement of which rests practically with the police. The knowledge that they possess this weapon as well as the opportunities which they have of watching and checking such nefarious traffic, practically place the brothel-keepers in the subjected districts in the power of the police to an extent unknown in other localities.

“70. (2.) The returns of the department of the metropolitan police, which administers the Acts, have shown, since the introduction of the system, a continuous and great decrease in the number of juvenile prostitutes in the subjected districts. This evidence is borne out by the testimony of persons well acquainted with the condition of many of those places. As juvenile prostitution is the principal source by which the supply of fallen women is kept up, it is evident that the Acts, in diminishing the number of youthful prostitutes, are operating effectually to diminish the number of adult women abandoned to an evil life. Many cases were detailed to your Committee in which young girls who were either on the point of falling, or had already fallen, were rescued by the intervention of the metropolitan police, and restored to their families. But cases of this kind are few in comparison with the numerous class in which the deterrent influence of the Acts frightens young girls from vice. It is to be remarked that while a constant decrease in juvenile prostitution has gone on in the subjected districts, the Committee of the House of Lords appointed to consider the subject and other kindred topics in 1881, states in its Report, dated 10 July 1882, that ‘juvenile prostitution, from an almost incredible early age, exists to an appalling extent in England generally, and especially in London.’ Their Lordships attribute its prevalence mainly to certain specified causes. Every one of these causes has been proved to your Committee to be vigorously and effectively counteracted by the administration of the Contagious Diseases Acts, so that the alleged reduction of juvenile prostitution in the subjected districts, is borne out by the fact that the influences stated by the Committee of the House of Lords to be its principal source are deprived of much of their strength, whereon the administration of the Acts is brought to bear against them.

“1. The want of parental control. This is remedied by the information which the police give parents as to the dangers of their daughters, and by the authority which the police exert for the reclamation of young girls.

“2. Residence

"2. Residence in brothels. As shown hereafter, it has been proved to your Committee that the police exert their power with excellent effect to prevent brothel-keepers from harbouring young girls.

"3. The example and encouragement given by girls slightly older. The deterrent influence of the system acts effectually against the temptation.

"4. The state of the streets "in which little girls are allowed to run about and become accustomed to the sight of open profanity."

"72. It is not disputed that the Acts have much improved the condition of the streets, and repressed public disorder and indecency among fallen women, thus removing much of the bad example which was formerly to be seen in subjected districts.

"73. (3.) Upon the third point raised by the advocates of the system, there seems scarcely room for serious doubt. Before the passing of the Acts women of this class were sunk in a state of disease and misery which baffles description. They are represented as living "like wild beasts," in woods and in drains, without shelter, and almost without clothing, and without the slightest regard to, or conception of, ordinary decency. To speak of persons in such a bodily plight, as capable of moral reclamation, would seem little short of an absurdity; and it is clear that, so far as the Acts have tended to improve the physical state of fallen women, and of this fact your Committee have had abundant proofs, they must of necessity have helped to place them under conditions in which their moral reclamation becomes, for the first time, possible.

"74. (4.) That the subjected districts have since the passing of the Acts greatly improved in point of outward order and decency, is denied by very few even of the opponents of the Acts. It is possibly to this fact that the steady decline of the popular agitation against the system in these districts, as its operation came to be better known and understood, is to be attributed. Your Committee cannot doubt that the great majority of the more intelligent and respectable classes in these districts would be strongly opposed to the repeal of the Acts, a circumstance to which, in their judgment, sufficient importance has not yet been attached. Indeed, it may be stated generally that the strength of the opposition to them in each locality is proportioned to its distance from the places where they are in operation. It may be added that a very large proportion of the witnesses called by the opponents of the Acts admitted either that they had never visited those places, or that they were very imperfectly acquainted with them.

"75. Several of these witnesses, while admitting that the improvement above referred to had taken place in these districts, maintained that the same results might be, and even were, obtained in other places by the vigorous enforcement of ordinary police regulations. The case of Glasgow was especially relied upon as showing that without the exceptional legislation of the Acts prostitution might be greatly diminished, and order and decency established in a large town, simply by means of stringent police regulations vigorously enforced by the local authorities. But assuming all these assertions to be true, your Committee doubt whether the rigid police interference, by which it is stated that such good results have been obtained in Glasgow (which, it may be remarked, is not a great military station), would be tolerated in the large towns of England or Ireland. Indeed the social conditions of the great centres of population in the United Kingdom vary so much that it would be unsafe to predict that local regulations for the suppression of vice which have proved effective in one town would be equally successful in another. With regard to the assertion that the gradual improvement in general morality may safely be trusted to lessen and exterminate this great social evil, your Committee would only refer to the evidence of Mr. Macnamara, of Dublin, and Mr. Lowndes, of Liverpool, as to the prevalence of vice and disease in those cities at the present moment.

"RECOMMENDATIONS.

"76. Your Committee having thus reviewed the various arguments which have been urged against and for the Acts, and dissected the evidence by which those arguments have been supported, now proceed to consider the several questions specially referred to them, viz., whether the Acts should be repealed, extended, or maintained, and if so, with any and what amendments.

"I.—SHOULD THE ACTS BE REPEALED?

"77. Before dealing with this question, your Committee would draw attention to a passage in the Report of the Royal Commission, in which, after attributing to the Acts most of the good results which, in the opinion of your Committee, may be traced to them, they say, paragraph 43 of Report, "If such results have been attained, either wholly or partially, through the operation of the Acts, those who demand their absolute repeal are bound to show that they have produced evils to counterbalance the good which, after all reasonable deductions have been made, may be fairly attributable to them." Your Committee desire emphatically to endorse this opinion.

"78. But, apart from this consideration, it is most important that Parliament and the country should clearly understand what the simple and absolute repeal of the Acts, including including the abolition of police surveillance and of State-aided Lock Hospitals would mean in districts where they have been in operation for 13 years and more,—

“(1.) Full license for venereal disease of all kinds, to disseminate itself unchecked, either by police control, or by hospital treatment.

“(b.) A serious diminution in the effective strength of our army and navy, which would be especially felt in the event of their services being suddenly called into requisition.

“(c.) The relegation of numbers of these unhappy women to the state of hopeless misery, squalor, and disease, in which they lived before the system was introduced.

“(d.) The letting loose of increased crowds of abandoned and diseased women and girls of all ages upon streets and thoroughfares swarming with soldiers and sailors, with little or no practical check or control over their behaviour.

“79. It is scarcely surprising that such a prospect should excite feelings of dismay in minds of the more intelligent and thoughtful inhabitants of subjected districts.

“80. Your Committee are aware that it is urged by the opponents of the system that if the Acts were repealed Lock Hospitals would spring up in the subjected districts, supported by voluntary contributions, which, it is assumed, would then flow in in sufficient abundance to take the place of State aid. Your Committee believe this prediction to be perfectly illusory. The reluctance of the public to subscribe to hospitals for the cure of venereal diseases is well known, and has been abundantly illustrated in the course of this inquiry. Your Committee can place no reliance on a bare assertion, which is contradicted by past experience.

“81. The other argument that the last 12 or 14 years have produced such a change for the better in the moral and sanitary condition of the subjected districts, that they have ceased to stand in need of exceptional legislation, is directly opposed to the whole gist of the arguments directed against the Acts.

“82. For these reasons your Committee cannot recommend the repeal of the Acts.

“II.—SHOULD THE ACTS BE EXTENDED?

“83. The hygienic and other benefits conferred by the Acts in their present narrow application appear to your Committee to warrant the belief that if extended to the United Kingdom generally they would become still more effective for the diminution of venereal disease, and for other beneficial purposes. Diseased persons coming from unsubjected to subjected districts interfere with the efficiency of the Acts in the latter. If the system were generally applied, this element of weakness would be diminished, and the whole country would be served to a greater extent than the best administered subjected district can be at this moment. It would be unreasonable to predict the extirpation of venereal diseases, because they would continue to be imported from foreign countries, or to elude in a certain number of cases the vigilance of the administration. Allowance being made for these elements of danger, your Committee are of opinion that if practical results were alone to be considered, the Acts might be extended with excellent effect. But the results of the Acts are not the only questions which demand the attention of the Legislature. However intrinsically useful any system may be, it is often unwise hastily to press its extension while any considerable body of opinion, even though that of a minority, condemns it. There is no doubt that although the Acts on the whole, approved of in the subjected districts, large numbers of persons in various parts of the country whose convictions are entitled to respect, object to them. Many of the opponents rest their hostility on religious grounds. This is especially observable with regard to several important Nonconformist bodies, which have protested in their corporate or quasi-corporate capacity against the system. It is true that to a large extent the agitation against the Acts appears to your Committee to have arisen and been promoted among classes and persons who have had no opportunity of seeing their practical working, and who have mistaken the objects at which the system aims. But making allowance for this, your Committee cannot, having regard to the character rather than to the extent, of opinion hostile to the Acts, at present recommend their extension.

“84. It has been argued that a recommendation of repeal ought, logically, to be the consequence of a refusal to recommend extension. Your Committee cannot accept this view. The sole ground on which your Committee decline to recommend extension is that the public opinion of a part of the community, which it would be unwise and unjust to neglect, is unprepared for such a step. But this does not apply to the districts where the system is in operation. There the Acts are, on the whole, approved of, and their repeal would be a subject of regret. Besides, while it seems to your Committee to be the duty of Parliament to abstain from any step calculated to wound the conscientious religious convictions of any considerable body of people, it would be unfair to soldiers and sailors, and unwise from the point of view of the efficiency of the service to abolish a system which in localities favourable to its maintenance has been found effective for rescuing men of both services from diseases to which they are especially exposed by the prevalence of celibacy and the habits and temptations of their career.

III.—SHOULD

“III.—SHOULD THE ACTS BE AMENDED.

“85.—In considering this question, the three main features of the system are to be borne in mind. They are,—

“(1.) Registration and Police Supervision.

“(2.) Periodical Examination.

“(3.) Detention in Hospital.

“(1.) Registration and Supervision.—Registration in some form and the supervision which follows it, are necessary if public women are to be placed under any kind of supervision for hygienic purposes. Without them no system could work with regularity. Your Committee cannot, therefore, recommend their abolition. The method of registration in force under the Acts appears to be free from defects. The registration takes place after and in consequence of the voluntary submission to examination, or the judgment of the magistrate rendering the prostitute liable thereto. It has been said that the system tends to the unfair procurement of registration, because, it is alleged, the so-called voluntary submission is obtained by compulsion. It is quite true that prostitutes would be glad to escape the operation of the Acts if they could, and in this sense their submission is not voluntary. But this is not the sense in which the Legislature meant the words ‘voluntary submission’ to be used. The Act of 1866 gives a woman alleged to be a subject for its application the choice of two courses, to submit to examination, or to appear before a magistrate and have his decision on the charge of prostitution made against her. Her adoption of the former course is called ‘voluntary submission’ because it excludes the element of magisterial compulsion. Your Committee are satisfied that the police before taking the voluntary submission, explain the meaning of the step, and inform the women that the alternative of attending before a magistrate is open to them. It has been said that the fact of being on the register throws difficulties in the way of women who, being converted, seek employment. Your Committee are satisfied that in theory the regulations afford women every facility for the removal of their names; that in practice the police habitually, without requiring any formal application, remove from the register the names of those women who give up a life of prostitution, and finally that in many cases they and the Lock Hospital authorities exert themselves to obtain for such women shelter or employment in order to secure them against the temptation to relapse. Under all these circumstances your Committee does not recommend any alteration in the system of registration and supervision.

“(2.) Periodical Examination.—The opposition to the Acts assails the whole principle of sanitary supervision of prostitutes by the State, but beyond doubt the periodical examination is the feature of the Acts that has caused most offence, and has been especially selected for attack. Your Committee are of opinion that if abandoned women could be induced by any method to submit themselves to medical supervision and care, it would be unjust and unwise to continue the system of compulsory periodical examination. But while the medical witnesses who support the Acts and understand their administration assert that the proceeds is necessary, the opponents, when asked to suggest any other means by which prostitutes in subjected districts could be induced to submit themselves with regularity and promptness to the supervision and treatment necessary for their health, have failed to do so. If any such means could be devised and brought into operation, your Committee would not hesitate to recommend the abolition of compulsory periodical examination. No such means being shown to exist, they recommend its maintenance. The Royal Commission of 1870 recommended the abolition of periodical examinations, and the resumption of the main provisions of the Act of 1864. This Statute, while not insisting on periodical examination, subjected to compulsory examination prostitutes reasonably suspected of being infected with venereal disease. It appears to your Committee that the principles of the objections taken to the examination, under the Act of 1866, apply equally the Act of 1864, and that while the course recommended by the Royal Commission would deprive the system of its chief means of detecting disease and preventing its diffusion, it would not satisfy the opponents of the system. It would be rejected as a half measure, and would lead to renewed agitation. Your Committee for these reasons cannot assent to the recommendation of the Royal Commission of 1870, that the main principles of the Act of 1864 should be substituted for the periodical examinations required by the Act of 1866.

“(3.) Detention in Hospital.—Your Committee consider that compulsory detention in hospital is absolutely necessary for the effectual cure of disease, and they recommend its maintenance under the restrictions and regulations at present in force.

“ADDITIONAL RECOMMENDATIONS.

“86—(1.) Your Committee recommended the institution, in some of the unsubjected districts, of female Lock hospitals supported by State aid, and by such charitable contributions as may be obtained, to which entrance shall be voluntary. Unsubjected stations, in which venereal diseases are at present most prevalent among soldiers and sailors, should be selected for this purpose. The adoption of this course would afford an opportunity for testing the value of the opinion so freely expressed by the opponents of the Acts, that an adequate system of voluntary treatment would be efficacious from a hygienic point of view.

“(2.) Your Committee further recommend that additional and more absolute powers should be given to the police within subjected districts and elsewhere, to enter houses of ill-fame for the purpose of taking steps to diminish prostitution and its attendant evils.

“(3.) Your Committee further recommend that powers analogous to that given by Act of 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 5, to householders, to institute proceedings for the prosecution of brothel-keepers, should be given to the police.

“87. Your Committee consider that the following Recommendations made by the Committee of the House of Lords which considered the subject of juvenile prostitution, and reported on the 10th July 1882, would help to diminish the evils against which the Acts are aimed, resulting from prostitution, and they therefore recommend their adoption.

“(4.) That the age up to which it shall be an offence to have or attempt to have carnal knowledge of, or to indecently assault a girl, be raised from 13 to 16.

“(5.) That the age of unlawful abduction (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 55), with intent to have carnal knowledge unlawfully, be raised from 16 to 21.

“(6.) That it shall be a misdemeanour for any person to receive into any house or into or on to any premises occupied or possessed by him or of which he has the management or control, any girl under the age of 16 years for the purpose of her having unlawful sexual intercourse with any person, whether such intercourse is intended with any particular man or generally.

“(7.) That a police magistrate shall have power, on application of a police inspector, and on his affidavit that he has reason to believe that some girl has been so received and is then in such house or premises, to grant a warrant to such inspector to search the house or premises, and to bring before him any person offending as aforesaid, and also the girl, and if the magistrate shall commit any person for trial for such offence, he may also bind over the girl to appear as a witness on such trial.”

“(8.) That the soliciting of prostitution in the public streets be made an offence, and the police authorised to act accordingly, without proof that it is done ‘to the annoyance of inhabitants or passengers.’

“(9.) That the police be authorised to make applications under the Industrial Schools Amendment Act, 1880, as to the children therein mentioned, and that any magistrate before whom a girl under the age of 16 is convicted of soliciting prostitution may, if it shall appear that she has no friends able to provide a suitable home for her, remit her to a refuge or industrial home until she attains the age of 16.”

DRAFT REPORT, proposed by Mr. Stansfeld, read the first time, as follows:—

1882. Min. March 21.

“THE evidence taken by your Committee has been limited to the operation of the Acts in the United Kingdom, the Committee having determined not to receive evidence as to British Colonies or other countries. Such evidence has been mainly directed, in the first place, to the consideration of venereal disease among the forces composing the home army, and of certain sections of such forces; and also among the women affected by this legislation. In the second place, the social and personal condition of the subjected women; and also the method and results of the administration of the Acts by the several classes of officials engaged therein, have been investigated.

“The voluminous evidence taken by the Committee may be conveniently considered, with reference to the principal subjects, as follows:—

“I. As to Venereal Disease in the Home Army.

“II. As to Venereal Disease among Prostitutes in the places to which the Acts apply.

“III. As to certain alleged social improvements claimed by advocates of the Acts as the beneficial effects of their administration.

“IV. As to certain evil consequences alleged to have resulted from the operation of the Acts, and other objections to this legislation.

“I.—AS TO VENEREAL DISEASE IN THE HOME ARMY.

“1. The official Returns which furnish the statistical evidence on this subject comprise a total period of 19 years—i.e., from 1860 to 1878, inclusive. Of this period the first seven years (1860–1866) may be considered as anterior to the existing legislation. The first Act prescribing the periodical medical examination, although passed in June 1866, came came into operation at a few stations only towards the end of that year. The remainder of the total period, i.e., 1867—1878, comprises two equal terms of six years each, viz.: 1867—1872, and 1873—1878. In the former of these periods the Acts were applied successively to the 'protected' stations, in all of which they were in full operation early in the year 1870. During the latter period, i.e., 1873—1878, the Regulation (generally known as Lord Cardwell's Order) stopping the pay of soldiers in hospital for venereal disease (except secondary syphilis) was in force, with the result of induced concealment of disease; a fact which is acknowledged by both Sir William Muir and Mr. Lawson to vitiate the Returns for such period. Consequently the period of application and operation of the Acts, i.e., 1867—1872, is the only one which can fairly be compared with the period preceding the Acts, 1860—1866, for the purpose of ascertaining what effect on venereal disease may have been produced by those means among the protected forces.

"The Returns originally adduced by Sir William Muir purported to show the results of the Acts, by 'contrasting' the ratios of disease at the 14 Military Stations which were successively brought 'under the Acts' with those at 14 selected stations 'not under the Acts,' during the entire period 1860—1878. Mr. Lawson also adopted those Returns as the basis of his original calculations given in evidence in the Session of 1879. Strong objections to the method of those Returns were, however, made, principally by Dr. Nevins, who contended that they presented an 'entirely fallacious comparison for statistical purposes,' for these reasons—first, that the respective characters of the two classes of Stations were essentially different; and, second, that the given unsubjected Stations were unfairly selected, many having exceptionally high ratios of disease, while the majority of the unsubjected stations with little disease in the aggregate was left out of the comparison. In fact, the 14 Military Stations brought 'under the Acts' are large camps, dockyards, and arsenals, some of them having only a 'small fringe' of civil population; on the other hand, the stations 'not under the Acts,' in number about 100, comprise the largest cities (i.e., London, Dublin, Manchester, &c.), in which comparatively small bodies of soldiers are placed amidst dense populations, and wherein the ratios of disease are exceptionally high, as well as small garrison places, in which there is often no such disease at all; e.g., in 1878 the ratio of admissions for primary venereal sores in London was 250 per 1,000 of force, while 'no admissions' for this (primary) disease were returned at 31 stations having an aggregate annual strength of 2,141 men.

"In deference to these objections Mr. Lawson furnished, in 1881, new tables compiled from further returns supplied by Sir William Muir in 1880, and showing the ratios of disease respectively at 'stations which came under the Acts,' and at 'all stations never under the Acts' during the entire period 1860—1878. Although these new tables are in the same form as the original returns, 'contrasting the results' at the given two sets of stations, Mr. Lawson explained that he did not intend thereby to 'compare one [set] with the other for the purpose of the Acts,' and added, 'I never have done so.' This witness acknowledged that the new tables gave lower rates of disease in the unsubjected stations than the original tables, and were therefore not so advantageous as evidence in favour of the Acts.

"An additional objection to the original returns was also raised to the effect that they showed only the average annual strength of force at the several stations which were successively brought under the Acts, instead of the actual forces for the time being under the 'protection' of the Acts. In consequence of this criticism a further Return was furnished by Sir William Muir, which forms Appendix No. 2 to the Minutes of Evidence, 1881. On comparing this return, however, with the other official statistics, serious discrepancies between them became apparent, which were admitted by Mr. Lawson. It is important, therefore, to notice the circumstance as furnishing a preliminary caution in dealing with the statistical evidence.

"2. The classification of venereal diseases adopted in the official statistics is the following:—

- "(a) Primary Venereal Sores.
- "(b) Secondary Syphilis.
- "(c) Gonorrhœa.

"The Returns also comprise an aggregate heading:—

- "(d) All forms of Venereal Disease combined.

"3. (a) Primary Sores.—The official evidence includes under the term 'primary sores' venereal cases which cannot be classed under either of the other distinctive heads. This class, therefore, comprises cases of true primary syphilis which subsequently develop 'secondary' symptoms, as well as cases of a non-syphilitic character, which have no secondary or constitutional consequences. The former species form about one-third of the whole class. It is objected to this method of classification, by the medical witnesses on behalf of repeal, that it is both unscientific and misleading, inasmuch as it does not distinguish the cases of true syphilis (chancres) from those cases of local sores which are not syphilitic in character (chancroids). It is consequently impossible to ascertain from the official statistics with the requisite exactness, the history of the course of true syphilis, even in its primary stage, among the forces 'protected' by the Acts. The authorities quoted by the objectors to the official classification, leaves no doubt that the two different kinds of sore comprised in the one class are now generally regarded by the medical profession at large as the respective products of two distinct kinds of virus; and this theory or doctrine of the 'duality' of this disease may therefore be assumed to have superseded the opinion formerly held as to the 'unity' of the poison, which might produce either form of sore according to determining circumstances. Two of the official witnesses, however, defended the 'unity' theory, but Mr. Lawson thought that 'the evidence is rather in favour of duality,' and he was 'inclined to admit' the doctrine. The result of the evidence on this point may therefore be taken to be, that the two kinds of sore are essentially different in their nature and consequences, and that only those which are syphilitic, and capable of being followed by secondary symptoms affecting the constitution, can properly be termed 'primary' sores. It is evident therefore that the term 'primary' should be applied only to the cases of true syphilis in its first stage, and that some other and more appropriate term (such as 'local venereal sore,' as used by Professor Lee) should be adopted to describe the non-syphilitic species. It appears indeed that it was at one time the practice in making out the Army Hospital Returns to classify venereal sores under the two distinct headings (1) 'Primary Syphilis,' and (2) 'Local Venereal Ulcer;' but that practice seems to have been superseded by the form of return at present in use. The only reason for this alteration by the Army Medical Department is an alleged difficulty in accurately diagnosing some sores (such as those of compound character termed by Professor Lee 'mixed chaneres') upon the admission of the patients to hospital—but it appears that a correct classification is undoubtedly practicable in every case within a short period after admission. If therefore it were necessary, for the purpose of the regular weekly returns, to group originally all venereal sores in the manner at present adopted, it is manifest that more accurate classification might have been made in subsequent Returns which would have enabled the Department to give a correctly classified summary in each annual report.

* The Acts were applied successively to the several Stations at different dates, between 8th October 1866 and 21st January 1870.

" It appears from these figures that during the period preceding the existing legislation (1860—66), the amount of so-called 'primary' disease declined regularly and continuously in the stations subsequently subjected to the Acts, while in the never subjected stations collectively, a final reduction was effected after considerable intermediate fluctuations. These figures are important as evidence that quite anterior to the operation of the Acts, some cause, or causes, produced a reduction in this combined class of venereal diseases, in both groups or sets of stations; but while the fall in the afterwards subjected stations was continuous and regular, that in the non-subjected stations was fluctuating and irregular, besides being less in degree. An essential difference in character between the two sets of stations is thus indicated at the outset, and prior to legislative interference. It should be observed that during this period, 1860—66, Windsor is not included in the 'subjected' stations, for the reason that the returns for that station during this period are not separable from London, and it is therefore included with London in the 'unsubjected' group. In 1867 and subsequently, however, Windsor is properly comprised in the group of 'subjected' stations, a fact which probably accounts for the sudden apparent increase of ratios in that group from 87 (in 1866) to 91 (in 1867). So far therefore as any proper comparison can be made between the two entire groups of stations in respect of venereal sores, it obviously commences with the year 1867, when the respective ratios of admissions were, in the 'subjected' group, 91, and in the 'unsubjected' group, 101 per 1,000 of force respectively.

"In the succeeding period (i.e., 1867—1872), which witnessed the gradual application of the Acts, and their complete operation in the 'subjected' stations, before Lord Cardwell's Order was made, there was a further reduction of disease, both regular and continuous (until the last year of the series), in the 'subjected' stations, contemporaneously with an ultimate fall, after intermediate fluctuations, in the 'unsubjected' districts. It is to be observed, however, that while the reduction during this period in the 'subjected' districts is approximately a continuation of the average diminution throughout the previous period, the contemporaneous improvement ultimately effected in the non-subjected stations is less than in the former period before the Acts.

"In the final period (1873—78), the same respective characteristics are observable, although, as before seen, the effect of Lord Cardwell's Order renders the figures unreliable. The general increase of disease in the last year (1878) was consequent on the calling out of the Reserve Forces, the rise being greater in the unsubjected stations.

"A diagram, furnished by Mr. Lawson, illustrates the figures given in the Returns, and shows that in the period before the Acts (i.e., 1860—1866) the course of 'primary sores' in the two groups of stations was practically parallel during the years 1860—62, and about identical in the following years 1863—66. In the period of successive application of the Acts, 1867—1869, inclusive, marked divergencies occur, and the unsubjected stations, which originally held the lower place, are thereafter represented by the upper line. These divergencies, therefore, exactly synchronised with the successive steps of legislation, and they individually denote a sudden rise in disease in the free stations, contemporaneously with a fall in the subjected stations, which fall was, on the average, a continuation of the pre-existing reduction throughout the period before the Acts, as calculated by Dr. Nevins. But during the final period of complete operation of the Acts (1870—1877, excluding 1878 as abnormal) the respective courses of disease continued parallel in both groups. This yields a comparative advantage to the subjected stations represented by the lower line of ratios.

"The return of the 'number of men in hospital daily' for 'primary sores' (also presented by Mr. Lawson), affords generally the same conclusions, viz., that although an ultimate reduction in the amount of such disease has been effected in both sets of stations upon the average, the fall in the subjected districts has been, on the whole, uniformly regular and continuous throughout the entire period, 1860—1877 (excluding 1878), while the diminution in the unsubjected districts has been accomplished by reductions more irregular and intermittent in character, as well as less in amount, particularly during the period of the gradual application of the Acts to the subjected stations. In that important epoch (1867—1869, inclusive), the figures of the 'constantly sick' show, like the return of 'admissions,' a sudden increase of disease in the unsubjected districts, contemporaneously with a continuance in the subjected districts of the original fall, which up to 1866 was common to both sets of stations. Again, during the period of complete application, 1870—1877 (excluding 1878 as before), the figures show a reduction in both classes of stations, which is approximately parallel.

"The two returns, therefore, of the 'admissions' and the 'constantly sick,' agree in demonstrating these results as to 'primary sores,' viz. (1), that the reduction of this disease which has been effected in the subjected stations since the Acts were applied thereto has not exceeded the diminution in the same stations before the application of the Acts; and (2), that since the complete operation of the Acts (i.e., 1870—1877), the reduction of disease in the group of stations not subjected thereto has been, upon the whole, practically parallel with the abatement in the stations under the Acts, resulting in a comparative advantage to the latter.

"On further comparison, however, of these two returns as to 'primary sores,' it becomes apparent that the reduction in the ratios of 'constantly sick' in the subjected districts during the period of complete operation of the Acts has not been equivalent to the diminution of the ratios of admissions. This fact denotes that the average duration of the cases under treatment in hospital in the 'protected' districts has gradually increased. In this respect the returns disclose a difference between the two groups of stations which is unfavourable to the districts under the Acts. Dr. Nevins put in a table compiled from the original returns, showing the comparative duration of cases of 'primary sores' in the 14 'protected' and 14 'unprotected' stations, and proving that the average duration of those cases in the stations under the Acts had increased from 26·85 days in 1874 to 28·58 days in 1878; while in the stations without the Acts it had decreased during the same years from 28·57 days to 24·80 days. This incident undoubtedly indicates that, on the average, the cases of 'primary sores' are of greater and increasing severity in the 'protected' ected' stations compared with the 'unprotected' stations; and that fact in turn affords ground for the presumption that, in the stations under the Acts, a larger proportion of 'primary sores' is of syphilitic character than in the unsubjected stations.

"6. The returns of 'constantly sick' for 'primary sores' form the basis of the evidence as to the saving in efficiency, which is claimed by the Army Medical Department to have resulted from the operation of the Acts in respect of that class of disease. Sir William Muir's original table, produced in 1879, related only to the two groups of 28 selected stations, and showed the comparative ratios therein during the period 1870-1878. The inference drawn from those figures was, that the average rate of the subjected group is less than half that of the other. The table shows, however, that the average difference throughout the period of complete subjection is in fact nearly the same as the original difference in the first year, 1870. The initial ratios then were 4.46 and 9.74 (or 1: 2.18), the average ratios were 3.47 and 7.99 (or 1: 2.30). The 'protected' stations therefore started with the advantage of a ratio 'less than half that' of the unprotected stations, and the extent to which the former class increased that original advantage, or in other words, the difference between the two sets of ratios, is the only result apparently attributable to the protected stations in respect of this comparative saving in efficiency. For it is clearly not the gross difference, but only the net difference, after taking into account the original or initial disparity, which can properly be claimed on behalf of the stations 'protected' by the Acts. Another inference was drawn by Sir William Muir from a series of similar ratios for the five years 1868-1872; viz., that the actual saving effected in the 'protected' stations on the average of those five years was 190 men, which was equal to a possible saving of 300 men, if calculated for the entire army. As to this inference, it was subsequently shown by Mr. Lawson that the basis of Sir William Muir's calculation was the absolute difference between the averages of the two sets of ratios, and not their comparative or net difference. Such calculation therefore appears to us to be unsound in two essential particulars (1.) It compares the ratios of actual inefficiency in the two groups of stations again without taking into account their initial difference, and estimates the saving accordingly at 190 men. (2.) It assumes that an extension of the Acts to 'unprotected' stations would reduce their inefficiency to the same ratio again without regard to the same initial difference, and thus adding an hypothetical saving of 110 men. It is quite clear to us that no saving can be shown approaching these figures, and that the alleged saving of efficiency affords no sufficient reason for the Acts.

Among other various official calculations as to the daily saving in the efficient strength of the army attributed to the operation of the Acts, it is calculated by Mr. Lawson to amount to 5.17 men per 1,000 of force, which, on the average strength of 50,000 in the protected districts would yield a total of 258 men. This saving, even assuming it to be effected by, and to be attributable to the Acts, is gained at the total expense of 30,000 £. per annum, which is equal to 116 £. a year for each man saved.

"7. Regarding, however, as a simple fact, the greater reduction which has actually been effected in 'primary venereal sores' since the introduction of the Acts in the subjected stations, the question remains whether such reduction has taken place alike in the syphilitic and non-syphilitic sores, or, if unequally, in what relative proportion. From the form of the official returns, it is impossible to decide this question otherwise than by way of deduction from the statistical evidence as to secondary syphilis.

"8. (b) Secondary Syphilis.—In considering the evidence as to the effect of the Acts upon this form of venereal disease, the most important part of the whole enquiry, considerable difficulty arises from the fact that while discrepancies exist between the official returns in all respects, the most serious are involved in the statistics furnished to the Committee on this particular subject. This statistical evidence consists principally of the following returns:—

"(1.)—The ratios given in evidence in 1879 by Sir William Muir and Mr. Lawson (Evidence 219, 600-603).

"(2.)—The return of Sir William Muir, forming Appendix No. 3, 1880.

"(3.)—The further return of Mr. Lawson, forming Appendix No. 2, 1881.

"Sir William Muir and Mr. Lawson gave in evidence in 1879 total ratios of this disease in the entire home army during the whole period 1860-1878; and similar ratios are contained in Sir William Muir's and Mr. Lawson's new tables, furnished in 1880 and 1881. But these latter returns present wide differences from the figures of 1879, which discrepancies have been tabulated by Dr. Nevins. It is apparent from his table that the ratios originally given (1879) showed a great reduction of secondary disease in the period before the Acts 1860-1866, which reduction reached its lowest point in the last year, and that the ratio for that year was in fact lower than the average of the entire subsequent period of legislation, i.e., from 1867 to 1878. The ratios afterwards furnished (1880-81) all differ from the original figures down to the year 1872, and show a smaller reduction, but the most important alteration is in the year 1866, the ratio for which in the new returns is higher than the average of the succeeding years; thus showing a fall in the average amount of this disease during the period covered by the Acts, instead of the increase indicated by the original ratios.

"The explanation of these discrepancies is that the original ratios were computed in accordance with the rule of the Army Medical Department, of excluding from returns of secondary secondary syphilis all forces which had been in the United Kingdom less than one year—the excluded section being about one-tenth of the entire home army—while the new ratios comprise all men who may have been at home stations any time within the year. The original rule was adopted to prevent the inclusion of secondary disease which was due to primary infection at foreign stations, and thus to restrict the returns to disease contracted within the kingdom. That such rule was regarded by the authorities as a good one is sufficiently testified by the fact that it was uniformly followed in all departmental returns from 1860 to 1880, in which latter year the new method was for the first time adopted in a return furnished expressly for the purpose of this inquiry. The fact, however, would not have been material, if the additional forces thus included had been affected with only the average amount of syphilitic disease throughout the entire period; or if the exported disease balanced the imported, as Mr. Lawson assumed; but Dr. Nevin's Table demonstrates that the newly included forces must have had not only a total ratio of disease far exceeding the average—since the practical effect of adding them has been to raise the average of the whole to a remarkable extent—but also that the 'imported' disease was greatest in the years before the Acts, particularly 1866, in which the new ratio is more than 11 per cent. higher than the original figure. To have produced this effect, the added section (say one-tenth) must have had more than twice as much syphilis per 1,000 men as the residue of the whole home army. After the year 1866 these differences gradually disappear, with the result already indicated. In the face of these remarkable and inconsistent features, it is obviously impossible to regard the new method of these returns as satisfactory themselves, or the returns as reliable. It was admitted, indeed, by Mr. Lawson that the statistics originally furnished were not only 'more trustworthy,' but also that they afforded greater facilities for verification.

Ev. 1881 : 2953-54.

Ev. 1881 : 2197. App. No. 8.

Ev. 1881 : 1900-62.

"But a further difference, of even greater practical importance in this inquiry, exists between the original and later returns in the fact that the original ratios were furnished only for the entire home army, without apportionment between the two groups of stations, while the new figures are apportioned to show the incidence of secondary disease in the two classes of stations respectively, and thus are designed to represent the comparative effect of the Acts. The reason assigned for the original mode of return was that any such apportionment as that now made would be fallacious, on account of the transfer of troops in the course of the development of syphilis between one station and another. Nevertheless, although such reason remained untouched, the apportioned returns (which include the 'imported' cases as already observed) were subsequently furnished, on the theory that the transfers of men between the two sets of stations may be taken to balance; yet Mr. Lawson, who furnished the returns, admitted that the statistics cannot be accepted as being an exact representation of the case, and warned the Committee that the figures must be received 'with caution.' No return showing the apportionment of 'secondary' disease without including the 'imported' cases has been produced.

Ev. 1881 : 2191.

2205.

"On proceeding to consider the two returns which show the apportioned amount of secondary syphilis, even further discrepancies become apparent. The only particulars in which the two returns are comparable are the yearly average ratios of men 'constantly in hospital' in the two classes of stations; but although the apportioned forces after 1870 are the same in each return, the respective ratios differ more or less in nearly every year. It is therefore impossible to regard these statistics as absolutely and reliably accurate, but taking them for what they may be worth, Mr. Lawson's Table furnishes the data for the following calculation:—

Average ratios during years 1870-78 -	1.72	2.15

"These ratios for 1869 conclusively disprove the exaggerated ideas as to the amount of syphilis in the home army which were prevalent before the passing of the Acts, and which have furnished reasons for their enactment and continuance. On comparing the average ratios during the subsequent period of complete operation of the Acts (1870-1878) with the initial ratios for 1869, it appears that in the 'protected' stations the average rate of reduction in secondary syphilis has exceeded, to a slight extent, the contemporaneous diminution in the unprotected stations. If the reduction in the ratios of constantly sick had been equal in both groups, the average rate in the unsubjected stations would have been 2.00 instead of 2.15. In other words, the difference in favour of the protected stations is equal to 0.15 of a man per 1,000 of force. But the advantage thus apparently attributable to the protected stations is subject to an important qualification, which is disclosed by Mr. Lawson's Table, showing the proportion between cases of 'secondary syphilis' and 'primary venereal sores' in the two groups of stations respectively, viz., that such proportion is gradually increasing in the subjected districts, as compared with the unsubjected stations. The average ratios furnished by Mr. Lawson are as follows:—

Periods.				Percentage of 'Secondary Syphilis' on 'Primary Sores.'
				Protected Stations.	Unprotected Stations.
1861—66	-	-	-	34·1	29·8
1873—78	-	-	-	56·0	42·4

"These figures show that the proportion of the cases of syphilis to the general class termed 'primary sores' is increasing to a greater extent in the stations under the Acts, than in the free stations; and, moreover, that this comparative increase distinctly attaches to the period of the complete operation of the Acts. In short, the figures represent the fact admitted by Mr. Lawson, that a soldier has comparatively more chance of contracting syphilis in the 'protected' stations than in the 'unprotected' stations, i.e., to the extent of 36 against 33 out of 100 cases of 'primary sores' in each case. This fact denotes, as Mr. Lawson also admits, that there is 'a little more syphilis' among prostitutes in the 'protected' districts than in the 'unprotected' districts.

"It follows as a consequence from these deductions that the reduction which, as before shown, has been effected in the subjected districts since 1870 in the general class of disease termed 'primary sores,' must have been mainly in the non-syphilitic sores, and not in cases of real primary syphilis.

"The statistics on this subject, moreover, show that the cases of secondary syphilis in the subjected districts are also more severe in character than similar cases in the 'free' stations, as proved by the comparative times occupied in effecting their cure respectively. Dr. Nevins's Table, compiled from Mr. Lawson's data, shows that since 1870 the average duration of cases of secondary syphilis in the subjected districts has exceeded that of similar cases in the unsubjected districts, in every year, by periods of time extending from less than one day (in 1872) to more than six days (in 1877), the maximum period in either case not exceeding one calendar month.

"Upon the whole, therefore, the evidence adduced by the official witnesses upon this subject may be fairly stated not to have succeeded in establishing the conclusion that the Acts have had any beneficial effect on true syphilis, either 'primary' or 'secondary,' although (as Sir William Muir admitted) the suppression, or at least the reduction, of such disease was distinctly the main, or real, object of the legislation.

"9. (c) Gonorrhæa.—The Return showing the number of cases of this kind of disease admitted to hospital, in the two entire groups of stations, during the entire period 1860 to 1878, proves that an ultimate general reduction has been effected, after considerable fluctuations common to all stations, both 'subjected' and 'unsubjected.' The annual ratios give the following average results:—

				Subjected Stations.	Unsubjected Stations.
Average ratios per 1,000 for years 1860—69	-	-	-	126	112
Ditto - ditto - for year 1869	-	-	-	106	108
Ditto - ditto - for years 1870—78	-	-	-	82	81

If, therefore, the ratios for 1869 be adopted as fixed points of comparison between the average amounts of this disease in the respective groups of stations, before and after the complete operation of the Acts, it appears that in the earlier period, the rate of reduction was greater in the afterwards subjected stations, but that in the latter period the average rate of diminution in the stations without the Acts has exceeded the average fall in the stations having the benefit of 'protection.'

"Mr. Lawson's further Table showing the numbers "Constantly in hospital" for gonorrhœa and sequelæ, gives the following ratios for three equal periods for comparison:—

App. No. 1, Table 3.

Periods.	Average Ratios per 1,000.
	Subjected Stations.		All Unsubjected Stations.
	Ratios.	Percentage of Improvement.	Ratios.	Percentage of Improvement.
1861—66 - - -	10·44	- - -	8·35	—
1867—72 - - -	6·83	34·6	5·78	30·8
1873—78 - - -	3·83	43·9	3·34	42·2

"These figures also show that the relative rate of improvement effected since the complete operation of the Acts has been somewhat greater in the unsubjected districts than in the subjected stations.

"The period of complete operation of the Acts thus manifests—in respect of gonorrhœa—a comparative disadvantage to the 'protected' stations.

"Moreover, in respect of the duration of cases of gonorrhœa, the 'subjected' stations compare unfavourably with the unsubjected class. The figures given in Mr. Lawson's Tables yield the following results on calculation:—

App. 1, Nos. 1 and 3.

Periods.	Average duration of Cases in Hospital.
	Subjected Stations.	Unsubjected Stations.
1861—66 - - -	30·4 days	28·1 days
1867—72 - - -	21·7 "	20·0 "
1873—78 - - -	20·0 "	16·6 "

"Here, therefore, the rate of improvement in respect of duration of cases in the stations under the Acts is manifestly less in the period of complete operation than before, as well as absolutely less than in the free stations during the same period. The fact thus denoted must undoubtedly be the greater severity of this form of disease in the 'protected' stations.

"It is of course assumed, as Mr. Lawson does with regard to the figures for the period 1873—1878, that whatever effect Lord Cardwell's Order may have had in inducing concealment of this disease, the result affects alike (or proportionately) both classes of stations.

Ev. 1881: 1705 to 1706.

"Upon the whole, therefore, it is proved that the stations having the benefit of the Acts have not only a larger amount of this kind of venereal disease, as well as greater virulence thereof, than the free stations, but also that the rate of reduction effected therein, under the operation of the Acts, is not comparatively equal, either to the previous reduction in the same stations without the Acts, or to the contemporaneous decrease in the non-protected class of stations.

"Consequently, the opinion expressed by the Army Medical Department in their Report for the year 1872, with respect to the inefficiency of the Acts in reducing this form of disease up to that time, may be considered as equally applicable to subsequent experience.

Ev. 1879: 729.

"10. So far, therefore, the general results of the evidence as to the several kinds of venereal disease in the two entire groups of subjected and unsubjected stations, during the period of complete operation of the Acts, may be shortly stated thus:—

"(1.)—Venereal sores not syphilitic have been reduced in the 'protected' stations at a greater rate than the contemporaneous reduction in the 'unprotected' districts collectively, although not exceeding the average rate of decrease effected in the same stations before the application of the Acts thereto.

"(2.)—Syphilis, in its two (primary and secondary) forms, has (so far as the Returns can be accepted as reliable) decreased in the 'protected' stations to a slightly greater extent than in the unprotected stations (i.e., equal to 0·15 of a man constantly in hospital per 1,000 of force), but with a comparative increase in the proportion of syphilitic to non-syphilitic sores in the 'protected' stations; and, moreover, with greater (and increasing) severity of disease in those stations.

"(3.) Gonorrhœa has been reduced at both sets of stations, but with a larger amount and greater virulence of disease, and with a lower relative rate of improvement in the 'protected' group, compared with that effected in the 'unprotected' stations.

"11. The fact of the actual reduction of venereal disease in general, and of 'primary venereal sores' in particular, in the 'protected' stations, during the period of complete administration of the Acts, raises the principal question on which the supporters and opponents of the Acts are at issue, viz., to what cause is such reduction attributable? The official witnesses assert that the result is entirely, or mainly, the effect of the Acts, and rely on the fact of such reduction as a sufficient proof, per se, of their allegation. They moreover adduce such alleged result of the hygienic benefits effected by the Acts as sufficient reason, not merely for the maintenance of the system as at present established under the Acts, but for the extension thereof throughout the kingdom, or at least to all places wherein any of the national forces may be located, including London. The witnesses on the other hand who are in favour of repeal, deny the alleged efficiency of the Acts, and base such denial on the twofold fact, that the causes which effected a general reduction of venereal disease before the legislation have continued in operation during the subsequent period of administration of the Acts; and that the rate of improvement in the subjected stations during that period has not exceeded the previous average rate of reduction, even in the case of primary sores, while in the other classes of disease, viz., syphilis and gonorrhœa, it has been less.

"Dr. Nevins' calculations indeed show a close average approximation between the actual annual ratios of 'primary sores' in the stations under the Acts during the period of 'protection,' and the computed ratios representing the theoretical course of that disease, on the assumption that the average rate of diminution in the preceding period would have continued subsequently independently of the Acts. Mr. Lawson, on the contrary, contends that, but for the interposition of the Acts, the course of disease in the subjected stations would have retrograded, probably until the average of the second period equalled that of the first; but this is inconsistent with the history of the disease in those stations during the previous period, as well as with the fact that in all the 'unsubjected' stations a reduction of disease was contemporaneously effected without the aid of the Acts. The 'incidence of disease' independently of the Acts evidently, on the whole, denoted a general decrease throughout the Army. The official Returns, as already observed, show a characteristic difference between the two classes of stations in the aggregate, in respect of the regular and continuous decrease of 'primary sores' in the subjected districts, contemporaneously with the intermittent and lesser reduction in the unsubjected group. But on comparing together the ratios of the unsubjected stations individually, it is apparent that the reduction was very unequal in the several districts; and, moreover, that several of the subjected stations had ratios continually higher than any of the unsubjected stations, except the largest cities and chief towns; while as many as 31 'free' stations with 2,141 men had no such disease at all returned in the given year 1878.

"The official Returns show, as demonstrated by Dr. Nevins, that from 1867 to 1877 (inclusive), the average ratios of 'primary sores' were lower in two of the 14 selected unsubjected stations than in any of the 'protected stations,' and that two of the subjected stations (viz., Windsor and Maidstone) had higher average ratios of such disease than any of the unsubjected stations, except the large towns and cities, viz., Preston, Sheffield, Manchester, Dublin, and London. One unsubjected city (Edinburgh) had, moreover, an average ratio less than Aldershot and Colchester, and far below that of Windsor and Maidstone, all 'protected' stations. The case of Windsor is the more remarkable, because according to the Police Returns, that station has fewer prostitutes than any subjected station, except Winchester and Deal, the average number since 1876 being only 14, and that during the same period there have been no brothels of any kind in that district. Nevertheless, in 1877 and 1878 (the last years comprised in the Army Returns) the total ratios of venereal disease of all kinds at Windsor considerably exceeded those of any other subjected station. It is stated, indeed, by the Regimental Surgeons of the Infantry (the Guards), periodically stationed at Windsor, that the majority of the admissions to hospital there for 'primary sores' and gonorrhœa are cases contracted out of the district (principally in London). But as these troops are regularly examined, wherever they are located, located, once a fortnight (and sometimes every week), the amount of disease possibly thus 'imported' would form only a small part of the total amount debited to Windsor during the entire stay of each battalion there, i.e., nearly six months. Moreover, the hearsay evidence on which the statement is founded is obviously uncertain and unreliable.

"It is evident that the mere fact of the presence or absence of the Acts in any station, or set of stations, will not, per se, account for high or low ratios of disease; and this inference is remarkably illustrated and confirmed by a fact proved by Mr. Lawson, viz.: that in Aldershot Camp in 1868-9, while the Acts were in full operation there, the ratios of 'primary sores' in different regiments varied from 142 to 23 per 1,000 of force—the higher ratio being more than six times that of the lower—a difference considerably greater than that which in the same years existed between the highest unsubjected station and the lowest subjected station. This fact, indeed, indicates that the amount of disease in different army stations is dependent, to a great extent, upon the character and habits of the men composing the forces at such places respectively. Mr. Lawson said, 'It depends vastly upon the customs which exist among the men in the regiment.' The disparity shown by the Army Medical Reports between the annual ratios of disease in the Household Cavalry and Foot Guards, both stationed in London, is a further illustration of the same axiom.

"12. The allegation of the official witnesses who support the Acts, as to the beneficial effects of the statutory operations on the health of the forces in the 'protected' districts rests upon the assumption that the only material difference between the two groups of stations consists of the operation of the Acts in the one set and not in the other; and that in all other particulars the respective conditions as to venereal disease are equal. It appears, however, from the evidence adduced, that in addition to the essentially different character of the two sets of stations in the aggregate, and of the various kinds of stations grouped together in the 'unsubjected' class, as already observed, there are certain other important circumstances which must fairly be taken into consideration in forming a sound judgment upon the subject. The first is, the fact that all soldiers entering a 'subjected' district—even after a short absence—are individually examined with the special object of detecting and preventing venereal disease being 'imported' by them into the district; while in the unsubjected districts no such examination is made. The declared intention of this practice (which is a Departmental and not a statutory regulation) is to secure a fair trial of the 'great experiment' in legislation, by preventing the importation of disease into the 'protected' stations only. The immediate effect of the examination is to debit each of the subjected stations with the cases of disease detected thereat, although such disease may possibly have been contracted in 'unsubjected' stations. But the ultimate effect is undoubtedly to diminish the total amount of disease which would otherwise have been returned at such station. The result of the experiment is therefore to prevent propagation of disease in the subjected stations, but to allow it without interference in the unsubjected stations, with a proportionate effect on the respective Returns. Thus, if a badly diseased regiment (such as that instanced by Mr. Lawson, in which one-half of the men had venereal sores on the average within twelve months) were sent to a subjected station, their disease would be arrested on the threshold, and propagation prevented; the result in such case being the increase of disease returned at that station, to the extent only of the number of men at once sent to hospital, and no more. But, if the same regiment were sent to an unprotected station, the same amount of disease would be multiplied enormously by the spread of the disease through the women of the district, and the returns would be increased accordingly. The fact that this method of examination has been adopted in the protected districts, as auxiliary to the system of the Acts, is a sufficient proof not only of its practicability, but also of its value. Moreover it supports the recommendations to that effect of the Army authorities generally, as well as the Medical Committee, on whose Report the present legislation was based, and who, in recommending the periodical examination of public prostitutes, added, 'However efficiently the regulations as regards women may be carried out, their success in arresting the spread of disease must be very imperfect unless similar precautions be adopted for preventing the men from carrying infection to the women. These health inspections should be universal throughout the Army. Without such a regulation the proposed periodical examination of women must lose half its value.' The Select Committee of the House of Commons, in 1869, also recommended the periodical examination of soldiers, with the exception of non-commissioned officers and married men of good character. It is clear to us that the limitation of such a successful and valuable method of preventing disease to the stations in which the Acts are applied is utterly inconsistent, not only with that essential condition of equality between the two groups, which is necessary for purposes of fair experiment, but also with those principles of humanity and economy, on which the whole legislation was ostensibly founded.

"Another fact which materially affects the comparison between the two sets of stations, as furnishing reason for the greater fluctuations and slower reduction of disease in the unsubjected districts, is the transmigration of prostitutes from the subjected stations. That this legislation had a very disturbing effect upon prostitutes who successively became subject thereto, is conclusively proved by the Annual Reports of the Assistant Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police relative to the Acts, which show that, since the operation of the Acts, and more especially since the complete enforcement of the periodical examinations, a large proportion of the registered prostitutes in each district 'left the district, independently of others who 'married,' 'entered homes,' 'returned to friends,' or died.'

died.' During the years 1865—1870 inclusive, the number of women who 'left the districts' gradually and steadily rose from about 8 per cent. to 28 per cent. of the total number on the register. Since that year that proportion has remained about the same. There is no positive evidence of the reason for this fact, but there is little room for doubt that they went away to avoid the Acts; and those most likely to depart would be diseased women, who became thus liable to be at once committed to hospital. Being soldiers' prostitutes, they would naturally resort to other military stations not under the Acts; and the result of their ingress would be a proportionate increase and multiplication of disease therein. Some evidence was adduced that diseased women from Portsmouth went to the Isle of Wight and Winchester, and others from Plymouth went to Exeter, with injurious consequences in each case. Besides the registered women, the same reasons would influence the movement of prostitutes who desired to avoid registration; but of such there is no record, nor, indeed, any accurate information. It appears, indeed, on the other hand that considerable numbers of diseased women annually come into the subjected districts for the purpose of getting medical treatment in the Government hospitals, which they cannot obtain elsewhere, in which case they are at once brought under the Acts and sent to the certified hospitals. The propagation of disease by such women is thus prevented, or at least speedily arrested. On considering, however, the figures in the police reports above referred to as to the departure of registered prostitutes from the subjected districts, with the Returns showing the fluctuations and less reduction compared with the protected stations of 'primary sores' in the unsubjected districts, during the entire period covering the application of the Acts, it appears evident that the relation between the facts denoted by these statistics may reasonably be regarded as that of cause and effect.

"A third circumstance which undoubtedly affects the comparative amount of disease in the two classes of stations is, that in the subjected stations there is ample hospital accommodation for women with venereal disease, while in the unsubjected districts in the aggregate there is scarcely any; London, Dublin, Glasgow, and Liverpool being the only unsubjected stations where Lock hospitals are established, and in the two first-mentioned places only to an insufficient extent. At a few other places a small number of such patients are admitted to ordinary hospitals. The total number of beds appropriated to the registered women under the Acts in England alone is 645, which, on the 31st December 1880 were available for the total number of women then on the register, i.e., 1879, being equal (nearly) to one bed for every three women, although they were then occupied by only 242 patients, viz., nearly three beds to each woman for the time being actually diseased. Those proportions of accommodation and use had existed for several years previously, as shown by the figures for preceding periods in the Police Reports. The number of beds available for female venereal patients in places not subjected to the Acts is not exactly ascertained according to the evidence, but it is certain that the total hospital accommodation for unregistered women venereally diseased is not only far less than that afforded to registered women under the Acts, but also is quite inadequate to the demand. The inequality of conditions denoted by these facts is very striking. In the subjected districts every diseased prostitute can ensure medical treatment and be prevented from communicating disease by placing herself under the Acts (if she be not already registered), while in all other places (except a few) a diseased woman in poor circumstances has no means whatever, except entry to the workhouse, of obtaining cure, and, therefore, continues to ply her avocation, and to spread disease so long as physically able. Even in the few places having Lock hospitals, except Glasgow, such woman has no chance of admission until her case becomes severe. That a considerable portion of the disease in unsubjected districts is attributable to these facts is unquestionable; indeed, so great is the advantage of the subjected districts in this respect, that according to Mr. Lawson 'many women from stations not under the Acts come into the stations where the Acts are in force to be cured, they being unable to get medical treatment outside.' This statement is supported by Captain Harris' Reports e.g., in 1880 as many as 612 prostitutes 'are known to have come into the several (protected) districts from unprotected places; 404 (or 66·01 per cent.) of these were found to be diseased on their first examination.

"A further advantage has been afforded to the subjected stations in the preference which, according to the Army Medical Reports, has been practically shown to them, as being 'Barracks of magnitude and importance,' in the gradual application since 1859 to Army Stations in general of various physical, social and educational improvements having a beneficial sanitary effect on soldiers generally; such improvements having been introduced in the subjected stations earlier in time, and on a larger scale, than in the unsubjected stations. The great practical benefit of these various salutary innovations and regulations on the physical, moral and intellectual habits and condition of the soldiers is abundantly testified by all persons of experience.

"It is of course impossible to decide to what extent the several circumstances above-mentioned may have affected the comparative ratios of disease in the two groups of stations, but that they have had considerable effect apparently favourable to the subjected stations, not even the most ardent advocate of the Acts can deny.

"13. (d) Loss of Efficiency in the entire Home Army from all forms of Venereal Disease combined.—On comparing the two official Returns which afford information on this head, during the entire period 1860—1878, it appears that although the 'Strength' for each year in the first table agrees exactly with the 'Force' stated in the second, yet the number of cases, and consequently the ratios of disease, differ considerably. The following Reserves called out.

"These figures prove that there was a regular and continuous decrease of the loss of efficiency from all forms of venereal disease throughout the entire period before the Acts from 1860 to 1866, at the end of which year the first existing Act came partly into operation. The ratios for the following years, 1867 and 1868, show a rise, but thenceforth until 1873 a further reduction ensued, with a slight intermediate fluctuation. After 1873 the 'concealment of disease,' presumably induced by Lord Cardwell's Order, is apparent in suddenly lower ratios, with a further rise in the final years, 1877 and 1878; the great increase in the latter being probably due to the inclusion of the Reserve Forces. It is evident, therefore, from these figures, that the improvement in efficiency in the entire Home Army, which was effected throughout the years 1860-66, before the operation of the Acts, was continuous and without fluctuation, and has never been exceeded in any like period during their administration; while the improvement effected subsequently to 1866 has been intermittent and fluctuating.

"None of the Returns furnished to the Committee show the ratios of the annual loss of efficiency from all forms of venereal disease combined, in the two complete groups of stations respectively, during the entire period, 1860-1878, comprised in the general Returns.

"Upon a general review of the statistical evidence of venereal disease in the entire Home Army during the entire period from 1860 to 1878, it is apparent, therefore, that whatever the real effect of the Acts may have been, the rate of improvement in the health of the entire body has not increased since their administration. Nor does the sanitary condition of the portion put under the 'protection' afforded by the Acts, as proved by the official Returns, show any substantial advantage over the 'unprotected' forces,—except in the one particular of non-syphilitic sores,—even under the several unequal conditions already remarked, which afford comparatively, and practically, considerable advantages to the stations under the Acts.

"II.—AS TO VENEREAL DISEASE AMONG PROSTITUTES.

"14. The evidence as to such disease among the registered women under the Acts is comprised in the Annual Reports of the Assistant Commissioner of Metropolitan Police, supplemented by the testimony of Dr. Barr, the medical officer at Aldershot. Captain Harris's last Report (1880), Return No. 1, shows that although the number of registered women has decreased almost regularly in the period of complete administration, 1870-1880, yet the annual per-centage ratios of disease have inversely increase; and that since 1875 such increase has been regular and continuous, from 148 per cent. in the former to 176 per cent. in the latter year. The significant fact denoted by these latter figures is, that on the average every woman was sent to hospital nearly twice in each year. More accurately, the total number of cases of disease was 3,316, representing 1,849 individual women out of the total number of 3,268 on the register. The several kinds of disease are not distinguished in the Reports. It is certainly remarkable that notwithstanding the vigilance of the police and the examining surgeons, aided by the liberal, and even lavish, hospital accommodation, as shown by the excessive number of beds provided for these women, as already observed, the per-centage of disease among them has for several years past steadily increased, and, according to the latest Reports, is still increasing. If the average duration of the cases admitted to hospital be calculated from Captain Harris's Returns, it appears to have been in 1880 nearly 30 days per case, so that on the average each individual woman spent about 52 days (or about one-seventh) of that year in hospital at the expense of the public.

Report, p. 2, par. 7.

Report, p. 6-13.

"On examining the records of the several stations comprised in Return No. 1 as to venereal disease among registered women, it appears that in 11 of the largest stations the per-centage of such disease was higher in 1880 than in 1870, after 11 years' working of the Acts, contemporaneously with the reduction in the number of women, viz., in Portsmouth, Devonport, Chatham, Woolwich, Aldershot, Windsor, Shorncliffe, Colchester, Greenwich, Canterbury, and Maidstone. In some of these stations disease has been progressively rising for several years past. The other six stations (there being 17 in the Police Statistics which are grouped as 14 in the Army Returns) show an actual decrease in disease, although in only one case (Sheerness) is the fall considerable. At Devonport the disease among the registered women has risen continuously from 102 per cent. in 1875 to 171 per cent. in 1880 notwithstanding that the police there employed special means to detect disease, auxiliary to the periodical examinations by the medical officers, by obtaining information from men in hospital, upon which the particular women indicated are dealt with. This practice may possibly be followed in other districts. The case of Aldershot is very remarkable. The average number of women on the register increased from 135 in 1867 to 326 in 1870, while the ratio of disease decreased from 325 per cent. in the former year to 206 per cent. in the latter. Between 1870 and 1880 the average number of women declined almost regularly from 326 to 150, while the ratio per cent. of disease inversely rose from 206 per cent. in the former year to 356 per cent. in 1880. During the whole of this latter period a large number of women annually 'left the district,' amounting on the average to nearly one-third of the total number on the register. The per-centage of cases of disease to the actual number on the register in 1880 was higher than it had ever been before, i.e., 194.55 per cent.

"These figures, therefore, show comparatively a high, average rate of disease at Aldershot than at any other station, and Dr. Barr admits that such is the inevitable consequence of the reduction in the number of prostitutes,—or, as he expresses it, 'one reason for the want of greater success of the Act has been the small number of women, comparatively, to the large number of troops.' This increase of disease has also been effected in spite not only of the most careful administration of the Acts in the examination of all registered women, but also of certain precautionary measures against contagion, in the use of which Dr. Barr has gratuitously instructed the women; and, moreover, with the valuable aid of the examination of all troops entering the district, to prevent importation of disease by them.

Ev. 1881 : 4635. 4665. 4666. 4677.

"Dr. Barr's testimony supplements the Police Returns in one important particular, i.e., the classification of disease among the prostitutes. He stated that during the 13 years in which the Acts have been administered at Aldershot he had conducted 54,848 individual examinations, which resulted in the detection of 7,981 cases of disease, about 15 per cent. of the number of examinations. Of these, 314 cases were sent to London unclassified, leaving 7,667, which were respectively, as follows :—

Gonorrhœa	-	-	4,941 cases = about 65 per cent. of the cases of disease.
'Primary' sores	-	2,085	" " 27 " "
Secondary syphilis	-	641	" " 8 " "

"It is evident, therefore, that it is only in a small proportion of the entire number of cases that the disease is of a constitutional character, and that the operation of the Acts is mainly upon non-syphilitic cases.

"15. Considerable further light was thrown upon the subject by the evidence of Professor Lee and other medical witnesses in favour of repeal, who argued the necessary failure of the system, on the following grounds, viz. :—

Ev. 1881 : 483. 506-508. 2498-2524. 4714-6.

Ev. 1881 : 776-82. 663-4. 904. 823-9. 903-922. 1030-52. 920.

"(1.) That a woman once infected with syphilis remains protected against reinfection for a considerable period, and that prostitutes are generally so infected early in their career. That the secretions of a syphilitic woman may be contagious and communicate constitutional disease, although the woman present no objective symptoms of such disease. (This has been demonstrated by inoculation.) That such a woman may remain for a long time in an infectious condition through her secretions, even if she be regularly examined and passed as 'free from disease.' (Dr. Lee ascribed 'more than half' the cases of syphilis in men to contagion from women in such condition.)

Ev. 1881 : 91-101. 475-8. 549-62. 951-53.

"(2.) That even the infecting chancre—the characteristic symptom of syphilis in its 'primary' stage—is often difficult, and sometimes impossible to discover in women, and in practice frequently escapes detection.

Ev. 1881 : 485.

"(3.) That the relative success of any system of periodical examination of women being proportionate to the frequency of inspection, the intervals of individual examination under the Acts (i.e., 14—21 days) preclude the possibility of detecting much disease in its inception, and before propagation thereof.

"(4.) That

"(4.) That the disease of one man may, by 'mediate contagion,' be communicated to other men having connection successively with the same woman without even infecting herself. This particularly applies to the old and hardened camp prostitute. Ev. 1881: 924-929. 928.

"(5.) That no system of registration can prevent clandestine prostitution, which is a distinct source of disease. Ev. 1881: 68-70.

"(6.) That no system of examination designed to prevent the propagation of disease common to both sexes can be successful when applied to members of one sex only. Venereal Com. 1866: p. xxxi.

"As to these propositions, (1) and (2) Dr. Barr denied the probability (and indeed almost the possibility) of the existence of disease in the women who have been passed by him as 'free from disease,' notwithstanding the testimony given by other witnesses of the difficulty, and sometimes impossibility, experienced in practice, in discovering the evidence of existing disease in women; and this after examinations of greater length than Dr. Barr's, which average 30 women in three hours. He acknowledged, however, that a woman 'syphilitised' is protected against contagion, while she remains herself infectious to any man consorting with her. 'She may appear to be free from syphilis, and still this sore (in her) may produce syphilis.' The small proportion of syphilitic cases discovered on examination at Aldershot is thus accounted for. Ev. 1879: 1719. Ev. 1881: 4726-4728. 4646. 4714. 4718. 4748.

As to (3) the possibility of contagion and propagation of disease between successive examinations of individual women, it is obvious; especially as, according to Dr. Barr, 'a large number of these women afford intercourse to an almost incredible number of men.' Mr. Lane admitted that disease might be so propagated 'to a certain extent' as a matter 'of course,' but that practically the examinations could hardly be made 'more frequent than fortnightly.' Ev. 1881: 6524. Ev. 1879: 1609. Ev. 1881: 2744-6.

"(4) The danger of 'mediate contagion' is fully admitted by Dr. Barr, not merely as a theory, but as a fact:—'I believe in it from actual proof,'—and he mentions a case of 'a woman having had intercourse with 20 different men' in the course of 'the afternoon and evening,' the women remaining unaffected while disease is communicated between the men. He admits also the increased danger of this kind arising from the excessive use of the women individually in consequence of their reduced number and assuming the same amount only of indulgence on the part of the men. If, as alleged on the other hand, male indulgence is stimulated by the Acts, this danger is still further increased. Ev. 1881: 4738. 4742-5.

"Dr. Barr also admits (5) the existence of clandestine prostitution even at Aldershot, in which district the practice must be comparatively far more difficult than in garrison towns and seaports. Ev. 1879: 1608.

"As to (6) the co-ordinate examinations of male profligates, Dr. Barr admits the advisability thereof, although he thinks there would be practical difficulty in effecting it. The regimental surgeons also support the view of necessity, but they disprove the idea of impracticability, so far as soldiers are concerned. Other Army authorities also agree, as before observed. Ev. 1879: 1686-1688. 2105-10. 2605. Report Ven. Com., 1866, p. xxxi.

"Upon the whole, therefore, the grounds upon which the medical witnesses in favour of repeal base their opinion of the necessary failure of the Acts as hygienic measures, designed principally for the suppression of syphilis, may be regarded as established, and as being confirmed by Dr. Barr's evidence as to disease of that kind among the Aldershot women. The fact of such failure was also practically admitted by Mr. Lowndes—a strong advocate for extension of the system—who said, 'The present partial application of the compulsory system, while it may cure a very few, does, in fact, nothing more than scratch the surface of a great evil.' Ev. 1881: 6866. Ev. 1882: 12512. 12265.

"16. Dr. Barr, however, claimed one distinct advantage in favour of the Acts, in dealing with venereal disease among the women at Aldershot, in that the severity of such disease has been mitigated by means of the system of treatment; in proof whereof he contrasted certain severe cases, which he asserted were ordinary in 1867-8, with the present prevalent milder type. It appears, however, that the severity of the earlier cases was certainly aggravated, if not caused, by the miserable circumstances of the women at that time—many of whom were homeless vagrants. The provision of hospital accommodation and treatment for such wretched outcasts would, under any circumstances, have been attended with beneficial results, both immediate and permanent. The mitigation of disease, therefore, so far as it has been the result of medical skill and care, could have been effected in a voluntary hospital as well as in a compulsory one; provided, of course, that the requisite co-operation on the part of the patients was secured. On this point hinges the important question, whether the machinery of the Acts affords any real advantage over an adequate system of voluntary hospitals. Ev. 1879: 1365-1368. 1322-5. 1563.

"The principal hygienic benefit alleged by the official witnesses to have resulted from the operation of the Acts, and which, as before observed, induces them to advocate, not merely the continuance, but moreover, the extension of the Acts, is thus expressed by Dr. Barr; 'The good that we do is positively this, that we restrict them (the women) from acting as prostitutes when they are diseased, by keeping them in hospital.' The practical question therefore in this respect, is, whether results equally beneficial as regards the prevention and cure of disease can be attained, without the compulsory periodical examinations and the restrictive hospital system imposed by the Acts. The evidence furnished on this subject relates to the four principal voluntary Lock Hospitals in the United Kingdom, viz., at London, Dublin, Glasgow, and Liverpool and also two smaller 0.75. 1 smaller smaller hospitals of that kind, one instituted in 1876 in London, by the Society for the Rescue of Women and Children in connection with their homes, and the other in Bristol.

Ev. 1881 : 2319, &c.

"The information as to the London hospital was furnished by Mr. Lane. Part of that institution is appropriated to Government patients (under the Acts), who are sent from subjected districts (especially Aldershot), and paid for out of Government funds. The other part is allotted to voluntary patients, the expenses being defrayed by public subscribers which are only sufficient to maintain about 40 or 50 beds out of about 180 which might be available in better circumstances for such cases. The Government patients are always admitted compulsorily; the voluntary patients only when there is room; but as the beds allotted to the latter are 'generally full,' the worst cases only are selected, and the others refused. Upon these facts Mr. Lane instituted three comparisons—1st. That the cases of disease on the voluntary side were more severe than on the Government side; 2nd. That the voluntary patients took longer to cure than the Government ones; 3rd. That the Government patients were received in the early stage of disease, and remained until completely cured, while the voluntary patients did not come in until badly advanced, and could not be detained sufficiently long to complete their cure. It is manifest, however, that the essential difference in the conditions of admissions of the two classes—the Government cases, however slight, being always admitted, while the voluntary cases are not generally admitted unless and until severe—precludes any fair comparison between them in any respect, except the length of stay. As to this, the figures furnished by Mr. Lane show that without any coercive measures the unsubjective women voluntarily remained in hospital for various long average periods, gradually diminishing from 86 days in 1873 to 37 days in 1880. That remarkable diminution in duration denotes a corresponding mitigation in severity. It is true that this is qualified by the fact that, on the average, 20 per cent. of such patients left hospital before being completely cured; but there is no proof that these prematurely discharged women were prostitutes, and if they were not, they would naturally be anxious to return home as early as possible, especially if they were married. In confirmation of this inference, it appears from the return that the number discharged for misconduct was less than 2 per cent. in 1878, under 4 per cent. in 1879, and only 5 per cent. in 1880. The residue thereof of the 20 per cent. prematurely discharged were orderly, and perhaps respectable, persons—such as married women diseased by dissolute husbands, &c.—whose departure did not necessarily imply prostitution. A return subsequently put in by the chaplain of the hospital showed that in 1881 the total number of voluntary patients was 502, of whom 270 were avowed prostitutes, 120 domestic servants, and 24 married women living with husbands. It was afterwards stated in evidence by the deputy chairman of this hospital (Mr. Seton-Karr) that 'the Government patients are more difficult to manage than the others, because we cannot control or dismiss them; on the other (the voluntary) side, we can control and dismiss them, and that makes a great difference.' This implies that premature dismissal is, in fact, regarded by the voluntary patients generally as a punishment, and not a boon.

"The evidence as to the Dublin Lock Hospital was furnished by Mr. Macnamara, surgeon of that institution. The hospital is supported by a grant from Government of (at present) 2,600*l.* per annum, and is worked on the voluntary system. In 1879 there were 874 patients, of whom 60 per cent. were professional prostitutes, and about 13 per cent. were married women diseased by husbands. Disease was severe in character; the voluntary system had failed to secure the mild cases. The majority also left the hospital before completely cured, in the absence of powers to restrain them; but no detailed or statistical information on this point was furnished. Of those, however, all who were not prostitutes—i. e., 40 per cent. of the whole,—especially the married women having homes to attend to,—would naturally be anxious to depart. This witness considered that Dublin was at a disadvantage, compared even with London, with regard to facilities for admitting women patients into hospitals for venereal diseases. 'In Dublin the law of almost all the hospitals is not to admit venereal cases, but occasionally females slip in under some other name of a disease,' who would not be admitted if the governor knew 'the real disease.' This witness supported the Acts on humanitarian principles, 'for the sake of the women alone,' and 'not with the view of protecting men.' He, moreover, expressed his personal preference for a complete system of free Lock Hospitals, in substitution for the system under the Acts, with every possible inducement to women affected with venereal disease to remain voluntarily, but with the super-added power of detention when necessary.

Ev. 1881 : 7478.

"The evidence furnished by the reports of the Glasgow Lock Hospital (produced by Mr. McCall, chief constable of that city, and subsequently supported by the personal testimony of Dr. Patterson, surgeon to that institution), is, on the contrary, entirely in favour of the voluntary system. In their report for 1880 the managers testify to the reduction of venereal disease, and the mitigation of its severity, and add:—'Various causes are in operation which help to bring about these results. One of the more prominent causes is that there is no restriction placed upon the admission of patients, and no case suitable for treatment is now ever refused on the ground of want of accommodation. Every encouragement is afforded; and as the patients are seen early in the disease they are more readily cured, and their period of residence in hospital shortened.' Other reports show that no difficulty is experienced in inducing patients to remain till cured.

"This documentary information was verified and illustrated by Dr. Patterson's. The accommodation prior to 1870 having been found insufficient for the demand, was in that year increased from 35 beds to 60 beds; but all of them had never since been occupied at one time.

The

The number of admissions had greatly decreased, while the population had largely increased; and the severity, as well as the amount, of venereal disease in both sexes in Glasgow had diminished in recent years. The admission of patients was entirely free, and since 1870 no case had been refused. The local cases came in the early stages of disease, and earlier now than formerly; but occasionally aggravated cases, due to delay in treatment, came from rural districts. No power of detention existed, nor was any needed. Very few cases were now discharged irregularly before being cured. There is no trouble in inducing prostitutes to remain, 'some of the older ones would stay all their days.' In 1871 the directors prescribed that an undertaking to remain should be signed by incoming patients, but the regulation was found to deter them from entering, and was soon abandoned. Students are not admitted to the wards.

"The evidence of Mr. Cooper, the Secretary of the Rescue Society, showed that out of the total number of patients in that Society's Lock Hospital about 13 per cent. left uncured. Of these, however, a large proportion did not return to an evil course of life, but were reformed. The per-centage of the inmates of the small Lock Hospital at Bristol who left prematurely was about 12 per cent.

"In both these latter cases the proportion of irregular discharges was less than in the London Lock Hospital. In the Rescue Society's Hospital the average sojourn of all the patients amounted to 74 days, which is even a longer period than the average length of stay of the voluntary patients in the London Lock Hospital.

"As to the Liverpool Lock Hospital, it appears from the evidence of Mr. Lowndes—surgeon to that institution—that it provides 25 beds for female patients, and the same number for male sufferers. It is supported by subscriptions to the Royal Infirmary, of which it is a branch. The female wards have not always been well filled; but now is so. Since 1877 there has been a 'remarkable increase,' in consequence of new rules forbidding students attending the female wards, and abolishing the performance of menial work by the patients. The place has also been made more attractive in other respects. In 1880 there were 291 women patients, and 280 in 1881. Nearly all were prostitutes; but 10 or 12 were married women. The number discharged uncured was in 1880 about 12 per cent. of the total; but this probably included the married women who desired to return home. The difficulty of detaining uncured patients, especially at holiday times, in Liverpool, appears to resemble the like circumstances at Glasgow; but Mr. Lowndes adduced the facts as a sufficient reason for having the compulsory powers of the Acts extended to the former seaport, in opposition to Dr. Patterson's opinion, founded on his experience in the latter maritime city, with about an equal population. It does not appear why persuasive methods, which have proved so effectual at Glasgow, should not succeed at Liverpool if seriously tried.

"However, upon the whole, the interesting evidence afforded on the subject of voluntary hospitals for female Lock patients furnished sufficient proof that the system of free hospitals when attractively equipped and well officered, as advocated by Mr. Macnamara, is quite practicable, and completely successful; even without the compulsory power of detention, which he deemed expedient, at least in Dublin. It is remarkable, also, in contrasting the evidence as to the Glasgow Hospital with that of London, that the rule of 'no case being refused for want of accommodation,' is evidently the secret of that complete success in the former, which is wanting in the latter institution.

"In all other parts of the Kingdom the scanty provision which exists for venereal patients is principally furnished by workhouse hospitals and infirmaries. In some few of the general hospitals such patients are received, but in small proportions only to the general body, varying according to the prejudices of the managers or of the charitable subscribers to the respective institutions. It is therefore to the workhouse that the majority of such patients, who are unable to pay for medical treatment at home, ultimately go. Workhouse authorities are empowered by the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 106, s. 22, to detain, when necessary, paupers suffering from contagious disease, if not in a fit state to leave without danger to themselves or others. It would therefore be important to know the general experience of workhouse medical officers as to the necessity of exercising such power. With the view of ascertaining this, Dr. Nevins obtained as many as 80 returns out of 160 applications to such officials; and 'with scarcely an exception,' they all say that the patients can easily be induced to remain in the hospital as long as they think necessary without the employment of compulsory detention. The witness was not allowed, however, to give further information on the subject, nor to put in a summary of the returns which he had compiled, in consequence of a decision by a majority of the Committee, that a witness who had collected evidence should not be permitted to state the general result of the information so received.

"Taking the evidence as it stands, it appears certain that the number of actual prostitutes who would in any circumstances under the voluntary system discharge themselves prematurely from hospital for the purpose of resuming prostitution is proportionately small, and probably does not exceed (even if it equal) the number of those who, in places subjected to the Acts, now actually evade registration. These 'clandestine' prostitutes are consequently precluded from local hospital treatment altogether, for workhouse authorities in subjected districts, where hospitals certified under the Acts are established, no longer receive female venereal cases, except occasionally from such hospitals.

"17. It was strongly objected to several witnesses in favour of repeal, who advocated the substitution of voluntary hospitals (either as distinct institutions or as part of general hospitals) hospitals) in lieu of the system of State Hospitals established or subsidised under the Acts, that funds adequate for their provision and maintenance would not be obtained from the public, whose total subscriptions at the present time to the few existing Lock Hospitals do not suffice to support them in full efficiency. It is certain, however, that the apathy of the benevolent public in the present circumstance is no criterion of their probable action in the event of a necessity arising for supplying, by voluntary effort, curative means equal in extent and efficiency to those now provided by the State under the Acts. Indeed it seems clear that some at least of the present indifference on the part of the public is due to the intervention of the State, which discourages and deters individual effort, and tends to reduce, and in some cases destroy, private enterprise. A Return put in by Mr. Lowndes shows that in London alone only 57 beds in all London Hospitals (except the Lock Hospital) are now available for females with venereal disease, in lieu of 211 beds, which were formerly provided. Moreover, subscriptions were refused to the London Lock Hospital on account of their connection with the administration of the Contagious Diseases Acts. As a practical matter, the witnesses to whom the objection was addressed, considered that no insuperable difficulty would be experienced in obtaining the necessary funds, especially if the plan of seeking to reclaim and reform the unfortunate women, were combined with the benevolent work of healing them, according to some such system as that adopted in the hospital founded by the Rescue Society (of London), which forms part of their general establishment of Reformatory Homes.

" In that event it is evident that the same amount now spent, equal to 30,000 £. per annum, might be more economically and usefully applied so as to deal efficiently with a much greater number of cases than those now treated in the districts subjected to the Acts, where, on the average, only one out of every three beds provided is, for the time being, occupied. That the present system as administered is excessive and extravagant is further made evident by Mr. Lowndes' calculations respecting Liverpool, i.e., that, taking the number of prostitutes there at 2,500 to 3,000, from 400 to 500 beds would be required for the women diseased at one time, that is, one bed to every six women, instead of one to every three, as provided under the Acts. Moreover, he assumed the diseased women there to amount to 25 per cent. of the whole, a proportion nearly double that existing in the subjected districts. On the present scale of provision the cost of extension of the Acts to Liverpool, advocated by Mr. Lowndes, would exceed the total current expenditure in all the now subjected districts; while the application of the system to London, as recommended by Mr. Bond, would entail an enormously greater expense.

" We do not, however, understand the opponents of the Acts to object in principle to public provision for the treatment of venereal in common with other diseases out of public funds, as, in fact, at present happens in the case of Workhouse Infirmary provision for such cases.

" 18. The entire evidence on the hygienic branch of the inquiry as to both the men of the Army and the women affected by the Acts appears, therefore, to establish the following conclusions :—

" (1).—That a reduction of non-syphilitic sores has been effected in the stations under the Acts, but such reduction, although greater than the contemporaneous decrease in the unprotected stations collectively, has not exceeded the average rate of decrease effected in the same (now subjected) stations before the application of the Acts thereto.

" (2).—That so far as the Returns can be accepted as reliable, syphilis has decreased in the 'protected' stations to a slightly greater extent than in the unprotected stations, but with a comparative increase in the protected stations of the proportion of syphilitic to non-syphilitic sores.

" (3).—That no improvement in respect of gonorrhœa has resulted from the operation of the Acts.

" (4).—That any comparison of the 'protected' stations with the unprotected stations in the aggregate is unreliable, on account of the essential difference in the character of each group of stations, and that, in fact, greater differences in the amount of disease may and do exist between different regiments in the same 'protected' station than between the least diseased protected station and the most diseased unprotected station. Moreover, that such comparison is absolutely vitiated by the vital difference that the protected stations have the twofold advantage of ample hospital accommodation for the women, and a system of examination of troops entering the district, while in the unprotected stations there is little (and in some places no) hospital accommodation for women, and no similar examination of soldiers.

" (5).—That, after eleven years complete operation of the Acts (i.e., 1870—1880), the annual ratio per cent. of cases of disease among the registered women was higher in 1880 than in any previous year of such period, and had been steadily increasing since the year 1875.

“19. These alleged results are comprised under the following heads :

“(1).—Reduction in the number of brothels, and other houses used for sexual immorality.

“(2).—Reduction in the number of prostitutes generally, and particularly young girls.

“(3).—Improvement in character and conduct of prostitutes.

“(4).—Reclamation of prostitutes generally, and particularly juveniles.

“Evidence on these several subjects has been given by several witnesses on behalf of the Acts, supported by the statistics of the annual Police Reports ‘on the operation of the C.D. Acts,’ as proving the advantages resulting directly and indirectly from the system. In this respect the whole of such evidence, both statistical and oral, is absolutely delusive, and calculated to mislead public opinion upon the subject. It is obvious at once, that even if, and to whatever extent, such results as alleged have really been effected, there is no section of the Acts directed to their accomplishment, and therefore the evidence thereon can properly enter the present enquiry only so far as may concern or relate to the system of administration of the Acts. In addition to the statistical evidence as to all the stations, collectively and individually, contained in the Police Reports, personal testimony both in favour of and in opposition to the Acts, has been given respecting a few of the subjected districts, viz :—Plymouth, Portsmouth, Chatham, Woolwich, Deal, Maidstone, and Cork. Evidence has also been furnished as to the state of prostitution in two unsubjected cities, viz., Glasgow and Liverpool.

“20. (1).—As to the Reduction of Brothels, &c.—Captain Harris’s Report for 1880 states that the total diminution effected under ‘the operation of the Acts’ in the number of brothels (including public-houses and beerhouses used as brothels) within the protected districts, since the Acts were put in operation, amounts to 781. (The process of computation is explained in the foot-note, Return, No. 3.) This statement is, however, open to the immediate objection that the duty of repressing brothels does not form any part of the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts, nor of the appointed work of the officials employed under those Acts. These Acts in fact do not in anyway interfere with or amend the pre-existing legislation on the subject, which practically leaves the matter entirely to the discretion of local authorities. The only enactment in the present Acts touching brothel-keepers is Section 36 of the Act of 1866, which imposes a penalty for harbouring a diseased prostitute. The special police under the Contagious Diseases Acts have, therefore, no legal power to ‘reduce’ brothels; and the only practical aid they can give is by furnishing evidence to the local authorities, for the purpose of prosecution. Such evidence could, however, always be obtained before the Acts, and no sufficient reason is suggested why it could not still be furnished independently of the police engaged in their administration. Mr. Shaen stated that he had prosecuted dozens of cases in London with the aid of the ordinary police, and never experienced any difficulty in obtaining sufficient and conclusive evidence.

Pars. 1 and 6.

p. 19.

Ev. 1881 : 6736.

“As to dealing more especially with public-houses and beerhouses used as brothels, the same remark applies. Such cases are, in fact, prosecuted under the Licensing Acts, and the Contagious Diseases Acts police have no part in such proceedings, except as witnesses, and their assumed place in that respect could still be supplied, as it formerly was, by the local police officers, or by other persons.

“Passing, however, from this preliminary objection to the actual facts, the subjected stations in respect of which evidence on this point has been furnished which is comparable with the official Returns are Devonport, Portsmouth, Woolwich, Chatham, and Maidstone. As to the Devonport district, the three superintendents of local police in the three towns, Plymouth, Devonport, and Stonehouse, comprised in that district, unanimously denied that the C. D. Acts police had any part whatever in the closing of public-houses and beerhouses used as brothels, which had been effected entirely by the local police by proceedings under the Licensing Acts, and that the C. D. Acts officers had only occasionally given assistance as witnesses in prosecutions of private brothels by the local authorities under the ordinary law. Inspector Annis was subsequently re-called to controvert some of these statements, but it is clear that whatever he may have done in such matters was beyond the scope of his duties under the Acts. He admitted that he never interfered with a brothel, however disorderly it might be, so long as the keeper thereof did not harbour diseased prostitutes, or children, or obstruct the C. D. Acts police. The Chief Constable of Portsmouth proved that the reduction of brothels in that town was entirely the result of local street improvements, coupled with measures taken by the local police with respect to the renewal of public and beerhouse licenses, and the prosecution of bawdy-house keepers, which had been conducted by the local police without any assistance from the C. D. Acts officers, except in one case. As to Woolwich, an experienced witness whose avocation as a town missionary afforded special opportunities for observation, stated that the number of brothels had not much decreased within the last five years, which is confirmed by the official Returns, showing that in 1876 the total was 48, and 44 in 1880. But the witness proved that this fact did not imply any real reduction in the amount of prostitution, which, after all is the essential matter, for that existing brothels are not only much more frequented now than formerly, particularly by young men, but also that much illicit intercourse is practised in other houses, and in fine weather in open places about the district, by prostitutes both registered and clandestine.

"In Chatham the number of brothels, according to Captain Harris's Returns, has continuously increased from 64 in 1876 to 84 in 1880, although the number of soldiers there has been contemporaneously reduced. The number of brothels of all kinds in Maidstone is "returned" as only eight; but a witness residing in that town declared from his own observation that there were considerably more. In Cork (which is not included in Captain Harris's Report) all the brothels are said to have been suppressed, but that was effected by the personal action of the Roman Catholic clergy in 1876 after the C. D. Acts had been for several years in operation there.

"That the ordinary law under the administration of the local police is able to effect reductions both of brothels and also of prostitutes in an 'unprotected' place, even greater in number than the decreases respectively claimed in the subjected districts, is conclusively shown by the evidence of the Chief Constable of Glasgow. This witness proved that between 1870 and 1879 the number of brothels in that city known to the police had been reduced from 204 to 22, and the number of known prostitutes living in brothels from 559 to 37. The number of persons prosecuted during the same period 'for harbouring prostitutes for purposes of prostitution' was 990. The beneficial results of these proceedings was shown by the fact that the number of informations for thefts in brothels during the same period was 808, while the comparatively number during the previous decade (1860-69) was 3,804. Moreover, the number of informations of theft by prostitutes in the streets during the same period (notwithstanding the current repressive action against brothels) was 2,887, as compared with 5,067 in the previous period, 1860-69. These proceedings, moreover, had resulted in many advantages to the community, both social and moral; and had not produced any mischievous results: 'While the reduction in the number of brothels has been so considerable, and the streets have been to a great extent cleared of the loose and abandoned women who used to frequent them, I am at the present time without one single complaint from any respectable citizen, that prostitution has gone into more secret or private channels,' &c. Such was the report of this witness made in 1872 to the authorities, and confirmed by his testimony given in 1881. He was satisfied that prostitution by prostitutes not living in brothels had not increased in Glasgow, and that solicitation there was less than in any other large city. He had also deduced from the Returns of the Registrar General evidence that the per-centage of illegitimate to legitimate births had not increased, but had, in fact, materially decreased during the period (1870-1879) in question. There had not, moreover, been any 'complaints against the police for the way in which they had exercised their powers.' Upon the whole, therefore, Glasgow furnishes, in respect of prostitution, as remarkable an example of police administration as it does of hospital operation, without any of the auxiliary powers of the Contagious Diseases Acts, and with results more beneficial in all respects.

"21. As to (2), the reduction of prostitutes, it appears from Captain Harris's Report, 1880, that the average number of registered women in the several districts under the Acts has been largely reduced during the period of operation, particularly among the younger prostitutes. The total decrease is 2,973. In 1880, however, there was an actual increase of 84. This return is supported, so far as the Devonport (Plymouth), district is concerned, by the testimony of Inspector Anniss, which station may be regarded, in respect of police administration, as the 'model' station under the Acts. The accuracy of this witness's figures (from which the Return for Plymouth was compiled), has, however, been challenged, and it is evident that serious discrepancies exist between them and the Judicial Statistics published by the Home Office from Returns made by the local police. These latter Returns ceased after 1865, in consequence of the subsequent publication of the Reports of the C. D. Acts police, but evidence as to the approximate number of women and girls actually practising prostitution at the present time in many of the subjected districts has been furnished to the Committee by the local police and other witnesses. The result of their testimony presents an important objection to Captain Harris's Returns, viz., that the register is not conclusive proof of the fact of diminution in the number of prostitutes, because (as is alleged), there is a large and increasing class of 'clandestine' prostitutes, particularly young girls, who evade registration. It should be observed that only persons actually on the register on the 31st December in each year are returned, although others may have been entered and removed therefrom during the year. This particularly affects the registration of young girls. The subject of 'clandestine' prostitution is obviously one of which accurate knowledge is difficult to obtain, especially for the police, who are bound to register every known prostitute; i. e., known to them. In the case of Devonport, the inspector stated that there were not more than 40 clandestine prostitutes in that district, and his Returns show not one girl under 17 years of age on the register. The evidence of the three superintendents of local police leaves no doubt, however, that such figure is far below the real number of unregistered prostitutes; that such number is, perhaps, even equal to that of the registered women, and that the official estimate is 'quite absurd.' They comprise, also, many very young girls. It appears, indeed, from the evidence, that the attention of the C. D. Acts police there is confined to women and girls who resort to brothels, or solicit men publicly, methods of prostitution which the real 'clandestines' would carefully avoid avoid. Mr. Shaen put in a tabulated statement proving that since 1870 a total number of 173 unregistered prostitutes, i. e., women who confessed themselves to be prostitutes, were rescued and reclaimed by a charitable society in that town, of which number 39 girls were under 17 years of age. A Return subsequently made by the Secretary of the Rescue Society of London, showed that during the 12 years, 1870–1881, that society had received from all the subjected districts a total number of 358 fallen women and girls who were not registered, and of whom 123 were under 17 years of age, and many of these were venereally diseased. The experience of this society is that more than half the number of fallen females go astray under the age of 18 years. The majority of fallen women who are not registered or ‘avowed’ prostitutes, but who practise prostitution clandestinely to a greater or less extent, are domestic servants and girls in factories and workshops.

“Further evidence was given by other witnesses from their own observation as to the prevalence of clandestine prostitution by both adults and juveniles, at specific subjected stations, viz.:—

“Chatham.
“Maidstone.
“Southampton.
“Cork.

“All this evidence explicitly controverted the official statistics as to the numbers of common known women in these several places.

“It is true that some of this evidence was subsequently contradicted by the C. D. Acts police and other witnesses, who had not observed the facts alleged, and therefore did not believe them to exist. But the positive testimony to the contrary has the comparative advantage that it is the result of actual observation of acts and persons when not under the eye of the police. It must of course be assumed that the register itself represents the total number of prostitutes ‘known’ to the police, and therefore their additional testimony that they do not believe that any prostitution, or ‘not much,’ beyond that so represented and ‘returned’ by them really exists, leaves positive evidence to the contrary quite untouched. In short, therefore, while the fact of clandestine prostitution is admitted by the police, the extent of it will evidently be better discovered by unofficial observers. The comparative inefficacy of police observation is remarkably illustrated by the astonishing evidence given by Mr. Krause, as to the proceedings in the examination room at Woolwich being observable from the public footpath—a fact never discovered by the official eye.

“The actual reduction of registered women has also been quoted as proving that the amount of sexual indulgence of men—more particularly soldiers and sailors in ‘protected’ districts—has diminished. If this, however, be the fact, the credit for such diminution must be undoubtedly given to the many improvements in the barrack life of soldiers, and to the institution of homes for sailors, and other means and regulations devised for their protection from ‘crimps’ and ‘harpies,’ as well as to the numerous benevolent agencies now happily in increasing operation for promoting intellectual and moral improvements in the national forces.

“On the other hand, it is conclusively proved by the evidence as to Glasgow, already noticed, that a substantial reduction in the number of ‘known’ or avowed prostitutes may be effected by ordinary police action, and without the means of the periodical examination under the Acts.

“22. As to (3), the alleged improvement in character of the registered prostitutes, it is advanced as a proof of the beneficial administration of the Acts that the women who are now registered under the Acts are more decent in appearance and conduct, as well as in domestic circumstances, than formerly, and that solicitation in public has diminished. Taking Woolwich as a specimen case, and comparing the testimony of Mr. Tuffield with that of Mr. Krause upon the subject, it is undoubtedly the fact that the women are now better dressed and more decently lodged than formerly, and also that there is but little solicitation in the public streets. But these results indicate the possession by the women of more money than formerly, and as that can only be derived by this class from their evil avocations, Mr. Krause’s opinion that prostitution in Woolwich is a prosperous and attractive pursuit is evidently well-founded. There is consequently, as he says, ‘no need’ now for public solicitation; men visit the registered women in increased and increasing numbers, and although each woman now has a separate room, he has himself discovered in the course of his ministerial visits as many as eight men in a bedroom with one woman. According to his observations the demand for prostitutes, owing to the increase of vicious men in recent years, is greater even than the supply. If, therefore, the improved appearance and public behaviour of the women be attributable to the Acts, it is inevitable that the proximate cause of such improvements, i.e., the increase of professional gain, must be also attributed to them, together with the fact of the increased vice among males which it denotes, as the effect of this "experiment" in legislation.

Ev. 1881: 7750.

"With regard, however, to the public behaviour of the women at Woolwich, it must be observed that Mr. Tuffield's opinion was derived from the observation of the 'better parts' of the town, which are frequented by prostitutes having the appearance of ladies; but in the lower parts of the town, where the majority of the registered women live, and with which Mr. Krause's vocation renders him exceptionally familiar, scenes still occur (according to his statement) which for indecency and disorder can scarcely have been exceeded, if indeed equalled, at any previous time. The most serious part of the matter is that some of the worst misconduct is connected with the journey to and from the periodical examinations. On this point his evidence stands unquestioned, as Mr. Tuffield was ignorant even of the locality of the examination room. That the registered women are in fact a violent and lawless class, whose better conduct is influenced solely by motives of self interest, was subsequently fully proved, by the incident of a personal attack by some of them upon this witness, in consequence of the evidence given by him, some report whereof having been communicated to them by (as they said) their 'inspector,' who was 'possibly' one of the police engaged in the administration of the Acts at Woolwich. In point of fact the informant can scarcely have been any other person.

"Evidence was subsequently given by Mr. Wheeler, of Chatham, showing that the registered women of that town were frequently disorderly and indecent, and sometimes drunk, in their progress to and from the examination room. The medical officer had not observed this public scandal, but admitted that the women sometimes came up for examination in a drunken state.

"The official witnesses, in attributing to the C. D. Acts the general improvement in the order of the streets of the subjected towns which taken place contemporaneously with the operation of the Acts, ignore the fact that the maintenance of street order is entrusted by the Legislature entirely to the local police, and that in recent years greatly increased efforts have been made by these officers to effect this public improvement by a more vigorous exercise of their powers. The evidence on that subject given by the head officers of local police at Plymouth, Devonport, Stonehouse, and Portsmouth, and the returns put in by them, afford good reasons for that improvement in the public behaviour of prostitutes which is testified by witnesses on behalf of the Acts. Similar activity of the local police in Chatham and other subjected towns has produced similar beneficial results.

"23. (4).—As to the rescue and reclamation of prostitutes.—The witnesses in support of the Acts allege two practical advantages in respect of reclamation afforded by the operation of the Acts:—

(a.) That the process of bringing women under the Acts affords means of warning them, which in many cases results in their abandoning the immoral life they have commenced.

(b.) That the system of administration of the Acts presents opportunities of moral instruction and influence, which in many instances result in reclaiming the women from vicious habits.

"The first of these allegations concerns the action of the police; the second that of the hospital authorities. As to the former, neither the Acts nor the official instructions to the police appointed under them contain any directions upon the subject, but the practice is alleged in Captain Harris's Report (1880) to be this:—'Whenever a chance exists of reclaiming a woman, every effort is made before she is brought under the operation of the Acts: and after she has signed the voluntary submission form, the opportunity is still given her of her returning to her friends.' In addition to this, 'young persons' (i.e., not exceeding 18 years of age) are 'cautioned by the police,' and if they thereupon abandon the immoral life they have commenced they are not registered. Other girls found in bad company and improper places are 'rescued.' The method employed in these proceedings is fully stated by Inspector Annuiss, from whose evidence it appears that the action of the police in the matter is confined to the discovery of these women and girls, and that the substantial work of rescuing and reclaiming willing subjects is effected by benevolent persons, who seek or accept the aid of the police for effecting their charitable purposes, and without whose efforts and means there would be no rescue or reclamation at all, although the police assume the credit for the entire work. The method employed by the police for this discovery is the daily domiciliary visit to all known brothels, a fact which is evil in itself, and in its consequences, according to the views of the opponents of the Acts. Moreover, such visits are made not for the purpose of rescuing or reclaiming, but only of discovering persons qualified to be brought under the Acts, and consequently of subjecting them to periodical examinations—a fact which induces one of the strongest supporters of the Acts to acknowledge a preference for any other method of attaining the same results. It is evident that the rescue of young girls from vicious circumstances and the initiatory stages of an immoral career does not require the machinery of the C. D. Acts, nor the special powers of the police employed under them. As a matter of fact, such benevolent work is often performed by the local police to the extent of of their opportunities (which might easily be increased), and without the objections which attach to the procedure under the Acts.

"As to reclamationary efforts of hospital authorities, the only provision of that kind made by the Acts is for the 'moral and religious instruction' of the women detained. Instruction of a similar kind is in fact provided in all hospitals for the moral and spiritual benefit of the patients. There is no presumption that such instruction, whether received from an appointed chaplain or from benevolent volunteers, has any better effect in a hospital certified under the Acts than it would have if given in an equally well managed voluntary hospital. Indeed, assuming the periodical examinations to have the hardening effects which are attributed to them by opponents of the Acts, and which are in fact proved so far as the evidence of actual experience on the subject has yet gone, and taking into consideration also that each patient in a certified hospital is compulsorily sent to and detained there, the greater chance of effecting reclamation by means of such instruction manifestly lies among the voluntary patients. On this point there is a consensus of opinion of all witnesses who have had practical experience in rescuing and reclaiming both registered and unregistered women. Rescue societies, in fact, prefer to rescue unregistered women on account solely of the greater difficulty in reclaiming registered women. Dr. Cook, the chaplain of the London Lock Hospital, in contrasting the two classes of patients in that institution, said, 'The ordinary patients (the majority of whom are known London prostitutes) are very mixed, . . . but the Government patients are brutalised beyond description in appearance and manner. The probability and hopes of reclamation would be greater in the ordinary than in the case of the Government patients.' It is agreed on all hands that the longer a woman remains in a career of prostitution the less chance there is of her reclamation. One of the undoubted effects of the system of registration and periodical examination is that the normal average term of prostitution is increased, and is continually increasing in the case of registered women. Capt. Harris's Return (No. 2) shows that while the number of young prostitutes registered in all the districts has decreased, the average ages of the women remaining on the register has steadily increased; the number of women above 30 years have risen from 202 in 1870 to 398 in 1880, contemporaneously with a reduction in the total number. From these figures it is evident that the prostitutes remaining on the register are a confirmed professional class, growing old in the service of vice, whose reclamation consequently becomes more and more hopeless. The actual results of the reclamationary efforts in hospital under existing circumstances are therefore certainly not greater, and are probably less, than might have been attained without the machinery of the Acts. Regarding the facts, however, it appears from Capt. Harris's Report that in 1880 the total number of admissions of registered women to hospital in all districts was 3,316; and the total number of cases of such women who 'returned to friends,' &c., was 453, i.e., rather more than 13 per cent.; all the rest, 'the great majority,' returned to prostitution. In Plymouth the proportion is about the same on the average. At Chatham it is on the average about 17 per cent. There is no positive evidence as to what proportion of the women who 'returned to friends,' &c., were permanently reclaimed, and there is great difficulty in obtaining such information; all that even Inspector Annis can say on the subject is that the reclaimed women did not return to prostitution within his district; and that in a 'large number of cases, but not all,' he knew they were permanently reclaimed, but no particulars of this knowledge were given. However, even in this case the ultimate operation and results are effected by charitable people, by whose aid the repentant women are really rescued when they leave the hospital, and by whose efforts alone they are, if at all, permanently reformed, although the administrators of the Acts now take credit for the whole work; in addition to the unproved assumption that all women not known to return to prostitution are necessarily reclaimed.

"The proportions of women reclaimed from voluntary Lock Hospitals furnish a remarkable contrast to the Government institutions. In the London Lock Hospital, the number of voluntary patients who during the year 1881 entered the Lock Asylum, or were sent to service, restored to friends, or sent to other homes, was about 75 per cent. of the total admissions, while the number of Government patients similarly disposed of was only about 19 per cent. of those admitted for the first time, and only about 10 per cent. of the total number of registered women admitted. The Government women are admitted to hospital over and over again, many of them several times in the course of a year; the voluntary patients from the hospital wards are only admitted once. The Government women admitted to the Lock Asylum are of the 'better class,' and enter after a probationary training and testing.

"In the voluntary Lock Hospital of the Rescue Society, the permanent reclamations amount to about 70 per cent. of the admissions. As already observed, that hospital is worked as a part of their general establishment of homes for rescue and reclamation of fallen women.

"The actual result of reclamationary efforts in Lock Hospitals under existing circumstances, therefore, clearly shows that the proportion of fallen women reclaimed without the machinery of the Acts is much larger than that effected with such aid—or, in other words, the system of the Acts is proved to have greatly increased the normal difficulty of rescuing and reclaiming women who have entered upon a career of prostitution. That appears to be the inevitable result of such system, superadded to the ordinary debasing influences of that course of life.

"Upon the whole, therefore, it appears, on a review of the evidence as to the beneficial effects alleged to have resulted from the operation of the Acts, that the only social or moral improvement which is attributable to the action of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police, is the incidental rescue of young girls from a probable career of vice; but that such result have been effected without the aid of the essential, machinery of the Acts (viz., registration and periodical examination), and might have been accomplished by other means entirely independent of the police employed under the Acts.

"In all other respects, the positive evidence on this branch of the subject clearly negatives the allegations as to the beneficial results of the operation of the Acts, for it is clearly proved that their tendency is neither to diminish vice nor to reclaim the vicious, but that in fact they have had the contrary effect.

"IV.—AS TO CERTAIN ALLEGED EVIL CONSEQUENCES OF THE OPERATION OF THE ACTS, AND OTHER OBJECTIONS MADE TO THIS LEGISLATION.

"24. The principal allegations and objections made against the Acts are the following:—

"(1.) That the Acts, and the statements of their administrators, have induced a popular belief that the system of controlled prostitution thereby established affords protection against contagion of venereal diseases; which belief has stimulated and increased sexual indulgence on the part of men.

"(2.) That under the Acts prostitution has become a more lucrative, and therefore a more attractive, avocation for girls and women, whose reclamation has consequently become more difficult.

"(3.) That the system established in the administration of the Acts amounts practically to a license of prostitution and brothel keeping, which is scandalous in itself and injurious to public morality.

"(4.) That the Acts violate the principles of morality and true legislation, and of constitutional law.

"(1.) As to this point, the only positive evidence appears to us clearly to establish the allegations. The medical witnesses who gave evidence against the Acts furnished actual instances within their own professional experience. The increase of vicious habits among the male population at Woolwich—particularly young men—is also fully proved by other witnesses whose professional duties afford special opportunities for observation. On the contrary there exists only opinion; which in the case of official witnesses is based on the theory that soldiers are neither deterred from fornication by fear of contagion, nor induced to indulge their passions by the prospect of immunity from disease. In the case of unofficial witnesses, such opinion rests upon the assumption that facts which they individually have not observed, necessarily do not exist. If the official theory be sound, it denotes that the majority of soldiers have lost in their military education the ordinary instincts of civilised and reasonable men. But the evidence shows that soldiers do think about the matter, with the deplorable conclusion, that 'as the girls were provided for them,' there was no harm in visiting the brothels; 'they thought it was intended to visit them,' and 'they did not think it a vice;' and that they act accordingly. Soldiers resort with prostitutes more generally and more openly than formerly, and without shame or concealment, 'on account of the provision which they consider is made for them,' and the men take note of the discharge of particular women from hospital. Such incidents are now the common talk of barrack-rooms, and the effect, especially on young recruits, is deplorable.

"As to the male civil population, it is proved that many men actually utilise the periodical examination for their own vicious purposes. At Woolwich and Chatham men wait near the examination place for the return of the women. Even at Plymouth, as Inspector Annis admits, 'that women not knowing the regulations,' bring men with them. The practice there, at some time, must evidently therefore have been sufficiently extensive to be made the subject of regulation; and, is probably now modified only so far that the meeting takes place beyond sight of the officer stationed at the door. There had not been such a case for 'two months.' It is clear, therefore, from the evidence given on the point, that the system of the Acts is appreciated by some men, at least 'cautious' ones, as affording a practical assurance of safety in sexual indulgence, which could not otherwise be so easily obtained. To the woman the incident of examination presents the opportunity of exacting higher payment, which the man whose caution induces him to await the result of the examination is doubtless willing to make, in consideration of the certificate of fitness implied by her re-appearance; and the total gain results to the woman, inasmuch as the work of examination is performed by the State gratuitously. The approval of the Acts by the registered prostitutes and brothel keepers is therefore quite intelligible; and the opinion that similar feelings prevail among the same class of persons persons in other subjected districts is only reasonable. Inspector Anniss also says his experience is that 'men prefer women who are supposed to be free from disease. . . . It is generally known the women are more free from disease where the Acts are in operation. If, therefore, it be true, as alleged by the supporters of the Acts, that while the present conditions of the community exist, prostitution will inevitably continue; it appears equally true, that so long as the Acts remain in operation, viciously inclined men will regard those measures as affording the approved means of self indulgence, and will act accordingly. An actual and continuous increase of the class of vicious men is therefore consequently insured by any such legislative scheme as that presented by these Acts. Moreover, the practical effect is to introduce sexual vice to the knowledge of youth at an earlier period than they might otherwise acquire it, and thus to facilitate the inception of vicious practice. It is a sad but indubitable fact, that juvenile depravity is alarmingly increasing in subjected districts, whether it be confined to such places or not.

"(2.) It is clear, also, that prostitutes registered under the Acts have consequently, by reason of their 'status' as 'protected' women, the means afforded to them of exacting larger gains, both from better paying customers, as well as an increased clientèle. The apparent improvement in personal appearance and domestic circumstances, effected by the money thus gained, must certainly prove attractive to girls of the industrial classes, from whose crowded ranks the body of professed prostitutes is mainly recruited. It is undoubtedly the fact that benevolent efforts to reclaim fallen women are rendered more difficult by the apparent success of prostitution as an easy and pleasurable means of livelihood; and consequently any system of regulating or dealing with this immoral trade which results in making the practice thereof more lucrative, will inevitably have the effect of attracting into that life the idle and vain who might otherwise avoid it, in addition to the vicious, who would probably adopt it under other circumstances.

"(3.) It appears from the evidence of Inspector Anniss, that under the administration of the Acts a systematic method of co-operation is practically established between the police on the one hand and the prostitutes and brothel keepers on the other. A system of regular diurnal domiciliary visits to all the known (or registered) brothels is carried out, by permission of the brothel keepers, as the police have no legal right of entry; by which means fresh prostitutes are discovered, and put (after caution) upon the register. To the brothel keeper the system is welcome, as affording an easy and cheap method of protection, so far as the Contagious Diseases Acts' police are concerned; for it is only when a brothel keeper criminally infringes the Acts—i. e., by knowingly harbouring a diseased prostitute, or indiscreetly offends the administration (or the administrators) of the Acts—i. e., by disobeying police requirements—that penal proceedings ensue. Then, and then only, the delinquent is at the instigation of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police either placed out of 'bounds'—which, being interpreted, means deprived of the military and naval customers—or prosecuted by the local authorities. A threat of such proceedings is generally sufficient to compel compliance with the requirements of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police. Thus the law designed for suppressing vice is used by officers of the Executive as an instrument for regulating vice in open co-operation with systematic law-breakers. There is no pretence of legality in such proceedings; 'it is matter of discipline.' Even the official instructions only sanction such domiciliary visits for the purpose of making 'the necessary communications' to the women at home, instead of in the streets. But it is clear from the evidence that to a zealous officer the legal power of enforcing a woman upon the register, at his discretion, is sufficient for all practical purposes; and that his actual achievements by such means are approved and adopted by his superiors in the public service. To the community, however, the scandalous spectacle is afforded of open co-operation between the administrators of the law and those who are in contemplation of law offenders against law and morality. For, while every brothel keeper is an offender, and every brothel an offence against the law, a certain number of brothels and brothel keepers in each of the subjected districts are practically under the protection of the law, and are utilised by the administrators of the law as instruments for preventing, not vice itself, but certain physical consequences of vice. The registered prostitutes are also comprised in this scheme of co-operation, for practically they act on behalf of the police as spies upon women and girls engaged clandestinely in prostitution, and furnish information which, in some cases at least, is the undoubted invention of malice. It is remarkable that while the police invariably refuse to believe the assertions of any prostitute regarding herself, they seem ready to credit her statements respecting other women. The legal position is therefore at once both inconsistent and scandalous. And the system of toleration and co-operation thus established amounts in reality to a 'license' of brothel keeping and of prostitution. To the public, especially in the neighbourhood of these operations, the result of the whole system is necessarily demoralising. The frequent domiciliary visits of the police to the brothels, the regular concourse of women on examination days, escorted or accosted by men, and sometimes accompanied by open exhibitions of indecency both of action and speech, and the occasional forcible removal of an unwilling woman to hospital, all necessarily exercise a demoralising influence among the poor and ill-educated in the vicinity, especially the younger persons of both sexes, and familiarise them with vicious ideas, which have their legitimate consequences in scenes which are a public scandal, and disgraceful to civilisation. It is true the police do not appear in uniform (except at Aldershot), but they soon become known in the neighbourhood. Moreover, the default of uniform induces impersonation, for purposes either of indecency or fraud, in one case apparently with both objects. Even Inspector Anmiss himself has been the subject of impersonation, although he nevertheless defends the practice of appearing without uniform (which was condemned by the Royal Commission).

"25. (4.) The various objections urged by the opponents of the Acts, on the general ground of the violation of moral legislative and constitutional principles involved therein, are fully stated in the evidence, and may be briefly summarized under the following heads of particulars in which such violation is principally alleged, viz. :—

"(a.) In making provision on the subject of sexual vice, not for its suppression or punishment, but only for preventing the physical consequences of vice.

"(b.) In dealing, with such object, unequally with the two parties concerned in such vice, by imposing an obligation—in itself immoral, and therefore illegal—upon one class (i.e., certain women) of the community, for the benefit of another (vicious men, particularly of the national forces); and for the purpose of carrying out such enforced obligation, subjecting the servient class to penal consequences, involving the loss of personal liberty, and imposing obstacles to the abandonment of their career of vice.

"(c.) In entrusting the officials charged with the administration of these measures with arbitrary discretion unprecedented in law, irresponsible in practice, and mischievous in results.

"As to (a.) It is proved by Captain Harris's returns, that out of the total number of 504,607 examinations actually made, the women in 457,243 cases were found free from disease, and accordingly dismissed; in the remaining cases, about one-tenth of the whole, the women went into hospital. Therefore, on the average, in about nine-tenths of the whole number of cases, the examinations were practically made for the absolutely immoral purpose of ascertaining that the women were in a condition physically fit to carry on their immoral trade of prostitutes.

"(b.) It is impossible to deny, from the evidence adduced on the subject, that some weight is to be attached to these objections. And it is indeed remarkable that the scheme of legislation should have been strictly limited to the examination of women, in face of the strong recommendations for the co-ordinate examination of soldiers expressed by the Army authorities and Medical and Parliamentary Committees, on the result of whose investigations the Acts were framed.

"(c.) There can be no doubt that very large discretionary powers are vested by the Acts in the police and other officials engaged in their administration, which are practically capable of abuse beyond the extent of any allegations yet made against those officers. The mere fact of watching in plain clothes the coming and going, and making notes concerning young women, many of whom they admit to be respectable, is an exercise of discretion evidently liable to serious objection and considerable abuse. The Acts leave the police free to institute proceedings against any woman whom they may believe to be a 'common prostitute,' and to institute proceedings against such person, with a view to her registration, without having actual proof of any specific act of prostitution. It is clear from the evidence adduced, that, notwithstanding the abundant caution on their part which is prescribed by the authorities, and stimulated by the vigilance of public observation, the police are liable to error in laying informations, which may in fact prove to be unfounded when properly tested by judicial investigation.

"In cases of 'voluntary submission' the police are free to exercise any influence or representation to induce the suspected woman to sign the document; and are, moreover, at liberty to insert any term, not exceeding 12 calendar months, as the period of submission. In practice it appears that in many cases the signature of this document is the result of representations which amount to threats of a magistrate's order in the event of refusal; indeed, the official instructions to the police imply that this is the established order of procedure, viz. :— 'It is desirable that all common prostitutes should be brought under the Acts by voluntary submission, but if any refuse to submit voluntarily, the Commissioner's authority is to be applied for to bring them before a magistrate.' In these circumstances it is not surprising to find that cases have occurred wherein the women declared that they did not know the nature of the document they signed; some even denied the signature; others that they did not understand the nature of the examination; and others that they did not realise the obligation of continued and periodical examination. In the majority of cases, moreover, the full term of 12 months is inserted by the police, without consulting the women; indeed, at Southampton, formerly, that term was printed in the form of submission.

"The police at Aldershot appear to have a special coercive method of procedure. The documentary evidence furnished by Mr. Shaen, as to the cases of Mrs. Percy (who was found drowned after being threatened with a summons), and Ellen Vokes, show that they commenced proceedings in those cases by warning persons who employed the suspected women against continuing such employment; and followed that step by a summons to the police station, and there trying to induce her to sign; on refusal, the statutory summons was taken out.

"The

"The case of Mrs. Percy was not further investigated, but with respect to Vokes' case the police inspector was called before the Committee, and stated that he personally had not adopted the irregular course complained of. But he was not aware whether any subordinate officer had done so, and as the constable who alone is alleged to have committed the act was not called, the charge is practically unanswered.

Ev. 1882. 9155.

"At Dover other methods of compelling a 'voluntary submission' are adopted. In one case two police officers even pursued a suspected girl (named Burley) through the streets; until she threw herself into the dock, when they withdrew while she was rescued from drowning by some civilians. In a more recent case, a written direction or order 'to attend' at the examination room was served by the Dover police on a girl named Southey, suspected by them of prostitution. She did not obey this illegal order, whereupon the statutory summons was taken out. On hearing the case for the prosecution the magistrates dismissed the summons. The incident was reported to the Committee, who then fully investigated the matter. The evidence given by the Contagious Diseases Acts police before the magistrates was repeated by them (on oath), but it was supplemented by other evidence which was not adduced before the bench, although it was at that time fully known to the Contagious Diseases Acts police. The evidence on the part of the girl fully confirmed the view taken by the magistrates, that no case whatever had been made out against her as being a 'common known prostitute.'

Ev. 1882: Min. 16, 19, 23, and 26 May.

"At Chatham, in the case of Caroline Wybrow, a series of unauthorised acts was committed by the officials. The police 'warned' her up 'for examination' before she had signed any submission, accompanied by the intimation that she would be sent to Maidstone (gaol) if she did not attend. She attended, but on her refusal to be examined, she was sent unlawfully into hospital for detention, although there was no evidence nor any reasonable ground for belief (according to the Home Secretary) that she was diseased. On further refusal she was, moreover, illegally punished by being put on low diet. On her ultimate submission to examination under protest, she was found to have no disease. The medical officer admitted, indeed, that she might possibly be a virgin.

Ev. 1882: 9793.

"The illegal practice of 'warning' or directing, either by oral or written order, suspected women to attend at the police station or the examination place for the purpose of being induced to sign the voluntary submission is apparently still the current practice in all districts, although it was condemned by the Home Secretary in 1876, and instructions to the contrary directed. All that has been done is to issue a new regulation quite recently, that the submission form shall be signed by the woman and attested by the police in the presence of the visiting surgeon. That regulation is now followed at Chatham, and at Plymouth, 'if practicable.'

Ev. 1882: 11959-64.

10054.

"The effect of Section 6 of the Act of 1869 is to make the so-called 'voluntary submission,' which is undoubtedly in many cases obtained by procedure which practically amounts to compulsion, as binding as a magistrate's order. It is not, therefore, a voluntary submission, for if voluntary it would necessarily be revocable at will.

Ev. 1881: 6804-8. 6830-34.

"The abuse of discretionary power is not, however, confined to the police, for some magistrates also have, in their discretion, made orders against women under the Acts, notwithstanding that the allegation of prostitution has not been substantiated by evidence; and there is no appeal from such decisions. The magistrate may sit alone; he may appoint any place for the hearing, and such place is not even to be deemed an open court, unless the accused demand it; but no duty is imposed on any person to inform her of her right in this respect. It is a remarkable and objectionable fact that three visiting surgeons appointed under the Acts have been made magistrates, in accordance with recommendations to that effect officially made, and as such are legally qualified to adjudicate in all cases. It is remarkable, also, that while the police are authorised voluntarily to institute proceedings which result in putting a woman on the register, neither they, nor even the magistrates, have any power spontaneously to remove her name from the register, even although the woman has in fact 'ceased to be a common prostitute.' If such a woman absent herself from, or refuse to submit to examination, she ipso facto infringes the Act, and is punishable accordingly. If she desire to be relieved from examination, she must apply in writing to a justice (or visiting surgeon), who will 'hear the application,' and at his discretion make, or refuse, an order for relief. The police have no duty imposed on them by the Acts of instructing the women in the process of getting off the register; and, indeed, they are shown in some cases to have withheld such information.

"Although a woman discharged from hospital is then legally free from the Acts, she is generally practically within the sphere of their operation, and the usual result is formal re-submission.

Ev. 1882: 4439-45. 5350-5.

"In answer to the objections made by the opponents of the Acts to the statutory provisions on the subject of relief from examination as practically opposing obstacles to the voluntary relinquishment of a career of prostitution, Inspector Anniss stated that, as a matter of fact, if a woman in his district wishes to leave her immoral life, or gets married, or goes to service, she merely applies to him, and he immediately removes her name from the register; she never makes a written application unless she continues living in a brothel. This summary procedure is not only a clear infringement of the Statute, but it also amounts to a confession that the provisions of the Acts do in fact constitute obstacles which are better avoided. But the substitution of a police code of discretion for the requirements of the law is in itself a dangerous innovation.

Acts and the form of submission, and also the magistrate's order as a 'periodical medical examination,' is left entirely to the individual discretion of each visiting surgeon. But in every case the examination is surgical, and, in nearly all cases, instrumental. The official witnesses indeed regard the inspection as similar in every respect to the examination of virtuous women, by an ordinary medical practitioner; thus overlooking entirely the essentially different object and intention in each case, which have been already noticed by the Report of the Royal Commissioners. 'Assuming that in either case the operation is conducted with an equal regard to decency, the object with which it is performed makes all the difference. In the one case the examination is voluntary, occasional, and may never be repeated. In the other, the examination is compulsory and regular, and instituted, not because the woman is diseased, or even suspected of being diseased, but because she may be diseased.'

"The Regulations for the management of the Hospitals certified under the Acts appear, so far as disclosed to the Committee, to render the detention in hospital practically an imprisonment during the period of cure. Without express permission, patients are not allowed communication, even by letter, with persons outside, and no visitors are admitted to the wards; letters are opened, read, and delivered at the discretion of the chaplain or matron; and the only persons to whom complaint is allowed are the officers themselves, so that complaint of their conduct to an independent authority is quite impossible. Proof that these stringent regulations produce practical injustice was furnished by Mr. Shaen.

Ev. 1881 : 6823.

"While 'discretion' is thus practically the only limit of the authority of the various officials engaged in the administration of the Acts, the right of action of persons aggrieved by their proceedings is stringently, and even abnormally, limited. The requisite notice of action often precludes redress altogether. In any case the defendant can plead generally that the alleged injurious act was done in execution, or intended 'execution,' of the Statute. Thus, practically, discretion may not only be exercised, but may be pleaded as a sufficient answer to an action. Even in the event of success, a plaintiff must suffer pecuniary loss in costs; while the full reimbursement of a successful defendant is ensured. However, presuming that the object of this unique enactment was to afford complete protection to the administrators of the Acts in any circumstances, practically it possesses certainly the exceptional merit of having been entirely successful.

"26. The various objections entertained by a large number of persons of all classes to the legislation in question, has induced the formation of many associations throughout the kingdom for the repeal of the Acts. They include one association of women, called the Ladies' National Association, whose opinions on the essential features of the Acts have been forcibly expressed by Mrs. Josephine Butler; and one association of medical practitioners, the National Medical Association, located at Liverpool. The repeal movement also includes the systematic and continuous action of many religious bodies on the subject. The movement has resulted in the presentation to Parliament of an enormous number of petitions, and of many memorials, &c., to the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary. It appears from the evidence of the representative ministers of the principal Nonconformist Churches in England, Wales, Scotland and Ireland, that they have all passed resolutions condemning the Acts, and praying for repeal. Of the clergy of the Established Church of England, about 2,000 have signed a memorial in favour of repeal to the Prime Minister (in 1873), comprising many distinguished names, and also that 310 clergy of London alone have signed a petition to the like effect. A return proved by Mr. Bunting shows that the total number of petitions presented between 1870 to 1881 was 10,135, containing a gross total of nearly two and a quarter millions of signatures. Of these a considerable portion came from subjected districts. One of the petitions, signed by women only, had the enormous number of 248,000 signatures. On the other hand, all the petitions presented against repeal amount only to 45, with 3,579 signatures. The majority of these, containing 3,266 signatures, were presented in 1872, and included no less than 1,112 signatures of women registered 'under the provisions of the Acts.' As to the opinion of the medical profession, there is no doubt that the majority are in favour of the existing system under the Acts, and probably many reasons conduce to this result. However, in Liverpool, where the subject has been much discussed among medical men, professional opinion is divided in the proportion of 174 in favour of the system to over 100 against it. But a petition in favour of repeal has recently been presented from medical men in Belfast, signed by about two-thirds of the practitioners there.

"The general opinion of the majority of the inhabitants in the subjected districts is stated by witnesses of local knowledge to be in favour of the Acts, although that evidence is not supported by the results of public meetings in those places generally, or of the petitions therefrom. But, if the fact be as stated, some reasons are apparent for such opinion, arising principally from the connection and dependence of a large proportion of the population of such places on the naval and military establishments, with which the administration of the Acts is associated, and other circumstances, one influential consideration being that, under the existing system, the poor rates are relieved from the former burdens incident to the treatment of diseased prostitutes in the workhouse infirmaries of those places.

"25. To

"27. To sum up, the following conclusions appear to be established by the evidence:

"I. That even under the unusual conditions obtaining in favour of the stations protected by the Acts, venereal disease in the home army has not substantially diminished in those stations to a greater comparative extent than in the stations not under the Acts, except in the one particular of 'non-syphilitic' sores.

"II. That the per-centage of cases of disease among the registered women has increased continuously during several years, and is still increasing.

"III. That the only real good effected by the police employed under the Acts is entirely beyond the scope of their statutory duties, and could be better effected by other means.

"IV. That the religious, moral, and constitutional objections presented to the Acts, and the system established under the Acts, are valid in principle, and are confirmed by the practical results of their operation.

"We are of opinion, therefore, that these conclusions afford ample reasons for the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts."

Amendment proposed, That the following new paragraph be inserted in the proposed Report:—

“Great reliance was placed by the opponents of the Acts in the fact that soldiers coming into the protected districts were subjected to medical examination, whereas soldiers coming into the unprotected districts were not so subjected. Your Committee are unable to recognise this force of the argument. If valued at all, it would seem to tell unfairly against those subjected districts, as soldiers so examined and found diseased, would be at once sent to hospital, and would then swell the number of men returned as under hospital treatment in those districts, although their diseases were contracted outside of them”—(Mr.

Amendment proposed, " That the following new paragraph be inserted in the proposed Report:—

" Evidence was given showing a decrease in the number of admissions to the female Lock Hospital at Glasgow, and it was asserted that the system of police surveillance prevailing in that town had led to a considerable diminution of disease. Your Committee have observed that the administration of Glasgow aims mainly at the repression of public prostitution. It does not let the Acts provide any organisation by which women who choose to lead a life of prostitution privately, and without attracting public notice, can be brought under supervision. It is, therefore, impossible in the case of a town circumstanced like Glasgow to infer from the returns of a public Lock hospital what the extent of disease may be among women who court privacy, and therefore do not enter such institutions. Besides, no satisfactory evidence was given as to the amount of disease amongst the male population, an element without which it is absolutely impossible to measure measure the real amount and intensity of venereal disease in any locality, or the success of any system for its diminution"—(The Chairman).—Question put, That the paragraph be inserted in the proposed Report.—The Committee divided:

Amendment proposed, That the following new paragraph be inserted in the proposed Report:—

"It is alleged that disease has shown a tendency to increase among registered women, and that the cause of its increase is the diminished number of prostitutes in subjected stations. It is to be observed (1) that the actual number of women who contract and propagate the disease is admittedly diminished; (2) that though the cases are more numerous in proportion to the diminished number of prostitutes, the disease is milder in form, and is arrested before it has become virulent, and inflicted the injuries which result from neglected contagion; (3) that notwithstanding the increase in the number of admissions to hospital among a given number of registered women in a given period, venereal disease among soldiers has diminished. This proves that hygienic purposes are better served by the presence of a reduced number of prostitutes, liable to increase risks of the recurrence of disease in a mild form, but subject to careful medical treatment, than by the presence of a large number of prostitutes in a chronic state of neglected disease"—(The Chairman).—Question put, That the paragraph be inserted in the proposed Report.—The Committee divided:

Paragraph 64, amended.—Another Amendment proposed in page 54, line 8, after the word “satisfactory,” to insert the words, “In all these cases, except the Dover case, hereafter referred to, the evidence brought forward to inculcate the police was purely hearsay evidence, or did not admit of being tested by cross-examination, and was, therefore, open to all the objections which apply to such evidence. Great stress was laid on the case of Caroline Wybrow, which occurred in the beginning of 1875. In this instance a careful consideration of the entire case has led your Committee to the conclusion that although certain irregularities were proved to have occurred, neither the medical authorities nor the police are open to serious censure. Your Committee feel bound to observe that the complaints made by the girl herself of her treatment was not made for several months after the occurrence to which they related, and that her most important statements were directly contradicted by reliable witnesses”—(Mr. Osborne Morgan).—Question put, That those words be there inserted.—The Committee divided:

Another Amendment proposed at the end of the paragraph, to add the words, “The contention referred to in a previous paragraph, that the diminution in the number of prostitutes caused by the Acts has increased disease amongst registered women, virtually admits that the system has not had the effect of increasing clandestine prostitution to any considerable extent. If, as is alleged, clandestine prostitution grows in subjected districts as open prostitution diminishes, the increase in the amount of disease among registered women cannot proceed from the cause to which it is sometimes ascribed, namely, the diminished number of women consorting with the soldiers"—(The Chairman).
namely,

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE.

Friday, 10th March 1882.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.
General Burnaby.
Mr. Burt.
Dr. Cameron.
Colonel Digby.
Dr. Farquharson.

Mr. William Fowler.
Mr. Osborne Morgan.
Mr. O'Shaughnessy.
Mr. Hanbury-Tracy.
Sir Henry Wolff.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, IN THE CHAIR.

MR. FREDERICK WREFORD, called in; and Examined.

Mr. William Fowler.

Mr. William Fowler—continued.

1. I BELIEVE you are the Chief Constable of the Borough of Plymouth?—Yes.

2. And you have held that office for 19 years?—I have been chief constable for 15 years, and I was inspector for four years previously, making 19 years altogether.

3. You have read, have you not, the evidence given by Mr. Annis before this Committee last year?—Yes.

4. You will remember that there was some controversy between you and Mr. Annis with regard to the condition of Plymouth when you were examined before the Commission of 1871?—There was some difference in our figures.

5. But, after consideration, you adhere to the figures that you then stated?—Yes.

6. I shall ask you presently more particularly as to that; generally, is it not the fact that Mr. Annis put the figures higher before the application of the Acts, and lower in the subsequent year, than you did?—Yes.

7. You frame the figures, do you not, for the Judicial Statistics for the Home Office?—Yes.

8. The general result is that Mr. Annis's figures show a greater reduction in the number of brothels and prostitutes during a given period than yours did?—Yes.

9. Mr. Annis, as I understand it, attributed this reduction entirely to the operation of those Acts which we are now discussing?—Yes.

10. You consider that whatever reduction there was was owing to the operation of the police, apart from these Acts?—Yes, I do.

11. That is your general view?—Yes.

12. First, with regard to the reduction in the number of brothels in the Devonport district during the period from 1865 to 1880; as regards 0.75.

Plymouth, I think you altogether deny Mr. Annis's statement that that reduction is caused by these Acts?—Yes.

13. I will ask you to listen while I read to you a copy of bye-law No. 10 of the borough of Plymouth with reference to this subject: "Persons keeping disorderly houses. That if any person shall permit or suffer common prostitutes or reputed thieves to assemble or continue in any house, shop, room, or cellar in his occupation, whether such house, shop, room, or cellar shall ostensibly be kept for the sale of refreshments or otherwise; or if any person shall allow or encourage gaming or prostitution to be carried on in his house or premises, every person so respectively offending shall for such offence forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding 5*l*." Is that a correct statement?—It is.

14. Have you a return from 1865 to 1880, showing a large number of persons, amounting, I think, to 151, who were prosecuted by the local police for allowing prostitution on their premises and convicted under this bye-law, which I have read?—Yes, to the 29th of September 1881.

15. They were prosecuted for keeping disorderly houses and harbouring prostitutes upon their premises?—Yes.

16. And fines have been inflicted to the amount of 560*l*. in that period?—Yes.

17. Those were altogether exclusive, were they not, of any convictions under the Licensing Acts?—Yes.

18. Will you put in that return?—Yes. (The same was delivered in.)

19. Was this action taken entirely by the local

Mr. WRETFORD.

Mr. William Fowler—continued.

local police, wholly irrespective of the Contagious Diseases Act?—Yes.

20. And it would have taken place, so far as you are aware, whether the Contagious Diseases Act had existed or not?—Yes.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

21. It is practically a suppression of brothels, is it not?—Yes.

Mr. William Fowler.

22. Is it a fact that some brothel keepers closed their business and left the town in consequence of these proceedings?—Yes, a very large number.

23. Have you any idea how many?—I think I can refer to 45 during that time.

24. Have you also a return of the number of similar prosecutions under the Licensing Acts against publicans and beer-shop keepers for harbouring prostitutes and allowing prostitution?—Yes.

25. Does that show between 1863 and 1871 no less than 121 persons convicted, and fines to the amount of 204*l.* inflicted?—Yes, that is correct.

26. Will you hand in that return?—Yes. (The same was delivered in.)

27. Will you explain why it was that that return is not continued beyond the year 1871?—Because those convictions have virtually ceased since that time.

28. Do you mean that the houses that do that particular trade have ceased to exist?—Yes.

29. You made it too hot for them, I suppose?—We get one occasionally. I think I had two last year. We took away all the licenses.

30. You are aware, I suppose, that in July 1869 the new Beerhouse Act, which is known, I think, as Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson's Act, came into operation, which gave the magistrates the power of granting and refusing certificates to beerhouses as well as to public-houses?—Yes.

31. How many houses were prosecuted when the magistrates got that power, in consequence of proceeding by yourself in Plymouth?—Forty-six beerhouses; 46 licenses were taken away on the first licensing day after that Act passed.

32. By reason of their encouraging prostitution?—Not all.

33. What proportion of them?—I think 31.

34. Have you any return as to that?—No, I have no return about that.

35. They were prosecuted for what?—I objected to them solely on the ground that they harboured prostitutes, and were brothels.

36. Out of the whole 46 that you closed you objected to 31, because you considered that they were harbouring prostitutes?—Yes; some of whom have been convicted two or three times for drunkenness and other offences. I may say, while you are on that return, that in the ensuing three years, from 1870 to 1872, we had 22 more houses of the same kind shut up through similar complaints.

37. You have a return showing the convictions against brothel keepers at Plymouth from 1872 to 1880 for illegally selling liquor, have you not?—Yes.

Mr. William Fowler—continued.

38. Will you hand that in?—Yes. (The same was delivered in.)

39. All the prosecutions which are mentioned in these three returns which you have handed in, were conducted by you independently altogether of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Quite independently of those Acts.

40. And without any assistance from the police engaged in their administration?—We had no assistance. In the last return some of those are Excise prosecutions as well as police prosecutions.

41. Still the whole thing was quite independent of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Quite so.

42. There was some statement made which was not quite clear to my mind, but I understood Mr. Anniss, when he was here, to say, that certain licenses was taken away in consequence of his statement to the magistrates; was that the fact?—There were never any in Plymouth.

43. Do you suppose that he could mean that he threatened any of those men, and that that alarmed them?—I do not think so; I am not aware of anything of the kind. It has never been done before the magistrates; I do not know what he may have done privately.

44. He had no authority to proceed against them, had he?—Not at all.

45. Generally speaking, you consider that the houses which have been shut up in your borough have been shut up by the agency of the ordinary police, and not by the agency of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police?—Yes, all licensed houses. They gave evidence in three or four cases.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

46. Licensed houses charged with harbouring prostitutes, as I understand you, were shut up through the agency of the local police, and not through the agency of the metropolitan police?—That is so.

Mr. William Fowler.

47. I think you have also a return showing the number of licensed houses and the number of convictions from 1863 to 1881?—Yes.

48. Will you hand that in?—Yes. (The same was delivered in.)

49. I think you said just now that a large number of licensed houses were shut up in 1869?—Yes.

50. And you also observed that 22 more were shut up in the three following years?—Yes.

51. And that was the result of your reports to the licensing magistrates?—Yes.

52. As I read this return, the number of public-houses in 1863 was 177; and the number convicted in that year was 20?—Yes.

53. The number of public-houses in 1881 with, I suppose, a much larger population, was 155; and the number convicted was four?—Yes.

54. The number of beerhouses in 1863, which, of course, was before the Act, was 198; and the number in 1881 was 176?—That is so.

55. Then the number convicted was, in 1863, 68, and last year five?—Yes.

56. At what date did the Acts come fully into operation in your borough?—They commenced in 1865.

57. I see

10 March 1882.]

Mr. WREFORD.

Mr. William Fowler—continued.

57. I see that the beerhouses had risen before the Acts to nearly 300, and the prosecutions were something like 90 at that time?—Yes.

58. I want to ask you about particular streets, in order to show what changes have taken place in them; what sort of a street is King-street?—It was formerly one of the roughest streets in Plymouth.

59. In former days there were 36 licensed houses in King-street, and now there are only 13; is that so?—Yes.

60. In Adelaide-street there were 11 licensed houses, and now there are none?—Yes, and those 11 were all brothels.

61. And they were all put down by your agency?—Yes, every one of them.

62. In Castle-street there were 10 licensed houses; were they brothels too?—Yes, nearly all of them.

63. And now there are none?—That is so.

64. In Love-street there were 10 licensed houses; were they nearly all brothels?—Nearly all.

Colonel Digby.

65. Were they licensed beerhouses at the same time?—They were licensed beerhouses; they were the habitual resort of prostitutes.

Mr. William Fowler.

66. I see that the number of beerhouses tended to increase up till 1868, and that they have been gradually reduced since that time?—Yes.

67. And that is by reason of your activity in prosecuting them?—They have to come to the magistrates now for a certificate before they can get a license; and, if it is a disorderly house, I object to them, and the license is refused.

68. But that is not done by you under the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Not at all; it is under the Licensing Act.

69. It is rather remarkable that in 1880 the public-houses were 20 less, and the beerhouses, as we mentioned just now, very largely less, I think 144 less than in 1868, notwithstanding the increase of population?—Yes.

70. Has that been accompanied by an improved condition of the place?—Yes, there has been a very great improvement.

71. And that improvement is, in your opinion, largely due to the closing of those houses?—Yes, very much so.

72. In the evidence which we had last year there is an answer which appears to me to be very inconsistent with the evidence which you give. At Question 3939 in the Blue Book of last year, Mr. Annis was asked this question: "In other cases you applied the law, I think you told us, to a certain number of public-houses and beer-shops which you absolutely shut up, the licenses being taken away?" As I understand it, you assert that that is not correct?—That is not so.

73. The licensed houses were shut up by the action of the local police, and not by the action of the metropolitan police?—Entirely.

74. There is an absolute difference of opinion as to the facts between you and Mr. Annis?—There is no difference of opinion; it is a difference of facts, so far as I am concerned.

75. Your impression of the fact is in absolute contradiction to Inspector Annis's?—Quite so.

Mr. William Fowler—continued.

76. I do not know that I need trouble you any more on that Return; but I should like to ask you whether you have another Return, giving the number of brothels and brothel keepers in Plymouth prosecuted by the local police under the Act 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 5, from 1860 to 1881?—Yes.

77. Will you hand it in?—Yes. (The same was delivered in.)

78. I understand that in some of that particular class of cases there was some assistance given to you as to the evidence by the Contagious Diseases Acts' police?—Yes.

79. You could have obtained that evidence, if you had wanted it, by your own officers, without going to any special police?—Yes; the women themselves were summoned and examined.

80. I apprehend that, as far as your opinion goes, the evidence that was obtained by Mr. Annis in assisting you was evidence which you could have obtained with the greatest ease in other ways?—Certainly I could.

81. And, therefore, so far as that prosecution is concerned, the Contagious Diseases Acts were not in the least necessary for your carrying out the Act of the 25 Geo. 2?—Not at all.

82. In answer to Question 4249, Mr. Annis makes a curious remark. He is asked, "With regard to the borough and metropolitan police, in what respects would you contend that the metropolitan police were for the purposes of carrying out these Acts, or for the purposes connected with these Acts, superior, or likely to have or to be able to obtain better information upon the subject of the Acts?" And his answer is: "In the first place we are entirely independent of all local influence." Then he is asked: "With regard to local influence, I suppose that, as in the case of carrying out the Licensing Act, the local police are, more or less, liable to be got at by the inhabitants, are they not?" And he says: "They are under what they call a watch committee for each town." It is not very clear what that means; but then he is asked: "Therefore, as I understand you, one thing is, that the metropolitan police are more independent; is that so?" And his answer is: "Yes." You have seen that statement; what is your observation upon that?—I consider that we are quite as independent as Mr. Annis himself. The watch committee never interfere with the reports which are made. A report is made to me, and if it is a case fit to bring before the magistrates, I summon them before the magistrates without going before the watch committee in any case. None of the reports that are made go before the watch committee, except that the books are laid before them.

83. Then, so far as you are concerned, you altogether repudiate the insinuation that you can be "got at" by anybody?—I certainly do, if that is the meaning of it.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

84. How many police have you under you?—There are 90, besides myself; 91 is the strength altogether.

Mr. Hanbury-Tracy.

85. Are the police principally recruited in the town?—No, very few come from the town itself;

A 2

Mr. WREFORD.

Mr. Hanbury Tracy—continued.

self; they come from the country districts generally.

Mr. William Fowler.

86. Do you know how many metropolitan police there are in your borough?—No, I do not. I think I saw, in Mr. Anniss's evidence, that there were two men to look after Plymouth alone.

87. That would be a small number, would it not?—Yes.

88. There are, I believe, six for the whole district?—Yes; that includes Stonehouse and Devonport, and the country district. I often see two or three about Plymouth.

89. To clear up this point about the relations of the police, there is another answer which might as well be read, I think: at Question 4253, Mr. Anniss is asked, "Is there much jealousy between the metropolitan police and the local police in this district?" and his answer is, "As far as I am personally concerned there is none; but naturally there would be;" is that the case?—I am sure, as far as I am personally concerned, there is none.

90. You repudiate the idea of your being influenced by the people in the neighbourhood?—Certainly.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

91. I suppose you could hardly answer for 90 men?—No.

Mr. William Fowler.

92. There is one other point in Mr. Anniss's evidence which I think it might be as well to refer to: at Questions 3432 and 3433, Mr. Anniss was asked by Mr. Hopwood, "Will you tell me what power you have to visit the brothels, unless they allow you to do so? (A.) They have tried to disallow; but we are not beaten, and if they do not allow us, we take care to shut them up. (Q.) How do you do that; do you do it by appealing to the local police? (A.) We do not appeal to the local police; I am afraid the local police are very much more helpless than we are in this matter." Now, as I understand it, you contradict that entirely?—I say, in all cases where they are indicted, they do appeal to me, and, as chief constable, I am bound to prosecute.

93. Then I think there are special cases that he refers to as having been prosecuted by him; they were really prosecuted by yourself?—He says, "I mentioned four cases."

94. Those prosecutions were instituted by you?—Yes; those were the four that I mentioned that Mr. Anniss's people gave evidence about, as well as our own people. At the time this evidence was given, or before this evidence was given, on the 30th of May, two of those houses were opened again.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

95. I see that Mr. Anniss says in that answer to which my honourable friend referred, "I then went to the Plymouth Board of Guardians, and we got two householders to indict them, to lay an information, and I produced evidence and convicted them." I suppose the action taken was on the initiative of the householders; at least, they prosecuted in that case?—Yes, they give notice, and then I am bound over to prosecute and to produce evidence. Of course I do not know what Mr. Anniss did before it came into my hands. I know his men gave evidence.

96. But the two householders took the initiative, did they not?—Yes, I get their notices.

97. I suppose what Mr. Anniss means is, that he got those two householders to take action; would not that be so?—It is done by the board of guardians; it is not done by two independent householders.

98. Would this be the course taken; that he set the board of guardians in motion; that they set the householders in motion; and that the householders took the proceedings?—I think that is very probable.

Mr. William Fowler.

99. Did not a good deal of this prosecution arise from an accident?—It arose, in the first place, through a young girl who had left the workhouse. She went back to the workhouse without any clothing, and inquiry was made where she had been to, and it was found that she had been to a brothel. At the same time that that prosecution took place, two or three others were put in, I presume, by Mr. Anniss.

100. Did you take those proceedings?—Yes, certainly.

101. Then the original discovery was made at the workhouse, and not by the police?—Yes, it was made at the workhouse in the first place.

102. There was something said about these four houses; is it not the fact that two of those houses had been re-opened at the time the evidence was given last year?—Yes, they have been re-opened; prostitutes live in them.

103. Has another been opened since?—Yes.

104. Then those prosecutions do not appear to have had very great effect in this particular case?—There is one out of the four that is now a private house. The great reduction of 11 was in consequence of the landlord himself turning out all the prostitutes from some cottages, and letting them to labouring men. I think there were about 10 of these cottages. So far as I know, that was done by the landlord, independently of either Mr. Anniss or myself.

105. At Question 3201 there was something said about a house, and there was some discussion about the way in which that house was closed; what do you know about that particular case?—I had notice of that house, and a warrant was granted for the keeper; but they left, and no prosecution took place. It was a house of accommodation; it was not a place where women were kept at that time, but it was very shortly afterwards re-opened as a brothel.

106. Was it the fact, when Mr. Anniss gave his evidence, that this place had been re-opened?—Yes; it was not shut above three months. This occurred several years ago, in 1875 or 1876.

107. Those houses that were nominally closed, and as to which Mr. Anniss gave evidence, had been re-opened long before he gave his evidence?—Yes; this house had, which is referred to at Question 3201. I presume that is the house that is meant.

108. Mr. Anniss said something about what he called

10 March 1882.]

Mr. WRETFORD.

Mr. William Fowler—continued.

called night-houses, of which he told us that there were only two in the whole district, as I understood him; but there are more than that in your own place, are there not?—Yes.

109. How many are there?—There are four close together, within a stone's throw.

110. In Plymouth itself?—Yes.

111. He says in his evidence, in answer to Question 3298: "We have two of them now, and they give us a good deal of trouble; there are only two now instead of 50 formerly." That would not agree with your observation?—Not at all.

112. We have had a great deal of discussion at different times, as you are aware, with regard to the reduction in the number of prostitutes, and the cause of that reduction; I do not want to take up much time about that, but still it must be referred to. In answer to Question 3486, Mr. Anniss says: "When the police, 10 years ago, professed to say that there were 500 prostitutes in a certain district, I said it was not so; I said there were not 300; they said there were 500; and on inquiry they only found 180." Is that correct according to your view?—No, it is not.

113. You made a Return, I think, in 1871 to the Royal Commission, of 439 in Plymouth alone?—Yes.

114. Did Mr. Anniss ever say anything to you about the number at that time?—Only by his admission of the figures.

115. Do you recollect what they were?—I have not got them here.

116. I believe your statement was that there were 332; 298 known, and 34 clandestine?—Those were the figures.

117. And yet he says that you only found 180?—Yes.

118. That does not seem very consistent; but you adhere to the figures that you gave then?—Yes.

119. There was an investigation made in 1871 in Plymouth itself, was there not?—Yes, we had an inquiry there.

120. Did the mayor consider that your statements were substantially correct?—He did. The inspector himself, who made the Return, was had before the mayor (Mr. Woolcombe, I think, at the time), and he referred to the names on the list that the inspector put in, and he said, "I know that person to be a prostitute; she is on the quays at night with men;" and the end of it was that the Return was considered substantially correct, though there might be slight inaccuracies from removals, or from a name being perhaps taken wrong.

121. Mr. Anniss, I think, made a sort of analysis of your return, did he not?—Yes.

122. Do you think that was correctly made?—No, I do not.

123. Can you point out anything in that analysis that was incorrect?—If you look at the one Mr. Anniss put in last summer you will see, "Margaret Ward, 8, Adelaide-street." There is no No. 8, Adelaide-street in the one that he has put before the Committee, if this is a true copy. This begins, "Copy of Superintendent's Lists of Prostitutes in Plymouth, Adelaide-street, No. 13." You will not find Margaret Ward, 8, Adelaide-street, at all. Then, again, there is 0.75.

Mr. William Fowler—continued.

May Richardson, 8, Adelaide-street." Then the next two names, Fanny Adams, Flora-street, Raleigh-street, and York-street, are not entered in the list in those places.

124. You dispute the accuracy of that analysis?—I do.

125. And, if necessary, you can go into detail?—I can show that many of those women who have been prostitutes, but who have abandoned that life, had been brought up and charged before the magistrates about that time and subsequently. One or two Mr. Anniss has brought up himself under the Contagious Diseases Acts, and they came into my hands under a warrant.

126. The same women who are marked there as having abandoned the profession?—Yes; but still there are here women who are not, and never have been, prostitutes, who are brought up before the magistrates and fined.

Dr. Farquharson.

127. Fined for what?—Fined for being disorderly in the streets under the Police Acts.

Mr. William Fowler.

128. Mr. Anniss made a great point last year as to the reduction of what is called juvenile prostitution; what is your view about that; are there still a great number of juvenile prostitutes?—Taking the appearance of the girls on the streets, there are, I see, very little difference in the age.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

129. But you have no authentic record of the age?—No.

Mr. William Fowler.

130. Mr. Anniss told us that there were only two under 18 in the whole place, and none under 17; that would not agree with your view?—Not at all.

131. Have there ever been fewer young girls practising prostitution in Plymouth than there are now?—I could not give figures.

132. Mr. Anniss spoke positively about it, and I thought you might be able to give us some information upon the point?—Mr. Anniss must speak as he likes.

133. I think he told us that in 1865 there were as many as 207 prostitutes under 17 years of age, and that all those have now disappeared?—I think that there were 212 given under 15 in one of his returns. I quite disagree with that, myself.

134. You think that is as speculative as the present statement that there are none left?—Quite so. I can show the number that were brought before the magistrates in the years 1863, 1864, and 1865, and the ages under 20.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

135. How many were there?—According to the returns of ages for the year 1865, 27 out of 141 were under 20 years of age.

136. Of course you are speaking of those who were charged before the magistrates?—Yes.

137. Can you give the number and the ages for last year?—In 1880, 11 out of 69 were under 20.

10 March 1882.]

Mr. WREFORD.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

138. Could you tell me how many were under 19, or under 18?—One under 18, four under 19, and six under 20.

139. In 1865 there were 27 under the age of 20; could you state how many of those were under 19 or 18?—Two were 15 and under 16; one was 16 and under 17; seven were 17 and under 18; eight were 18 and under 19; and eight were 19 and under 20.

140. There has then been a very material diminution in the class of young prostitutes?—Yes.

Mr. William Fowler.

141. In the prosecutions?—Yes.

142. But your evidence, as I understand it, is that, as far as you can judge from the appearance of the girls, there is no material diminution of juvenile prostitution?—Yes, those are actual cases.

Mr. Hanbury-Tracy.

143. In judging of their ages, do you go entirely by their appearance?—Yes.

144. You have no other means of getting at their ages?—No. I take their appearance as they come out of the theatre, or out of any other place.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

145. You are now speaking of what you see in the streets?—Yes, this refers to actual cases brought before the magistrate.

Mr. William Fowler.

146. Will you kindly turn to Question 3859 of last year's evidence; this is the question that was put by Mr. Stansfeld to Mr. Annis: "Now as to clandestine prostitution, you gave very strong evidence as to them, and you said that their numbers were reduced from 300 to 40; are you prepared to say that at this moment there are no more than 40 clandestine prostitutes in your district? (A.) Yes." How do you look at that statement?—In my opinion there are more clandestine prostitutes now than ever I knew in Plymouth, and I have known it for 19 years.

147. Of course you cannot give figures, but if you were to name a number you would name a much higher number than 40?—I should say so, if I was going to name a figure.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

148. Would it not be rather difficult to define a clandestine prostitute?—It would be rather difficult.

Mr. William Fowler.

149. In Plymouth there are a large number, are there not, of what you may call adult prostitutes who are not registered?—No doubt.

150. Are they people who live in lodgings, or what sort of people are they, generally?—They are mostly women that pretend to be kept by a man; and, instead of being kept by a man, they go out with other men, and they go to the theatre and different places.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

151. But those people are not interfered with by the police?—I do not say that they are.

Mr. William Fowler.

152. Are there any shop girls who act in that way?—I do not know. I have no doubt that there are, but I should not like to say so.

153. Then I may take it that your answer is that, as far as you can judge, there is practically an increase of clandestine prostitution lately instead of a decrease?—I believe there is.

154. There is a remarkable statement made by Mr. Annis, in answer to Question 3246 to 3249, where he speaks of houses in which there were 15 to 20 young girls, prostitutes, living in each house; is that a statement that you can at all corroborate?—There was never such a thing in Plymouth as 15 or 20 young girls living in one house.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

155. Mr. Annis speaks from his personal knowledge; he says: "I have found as many as 15 or 20 in some of those houses." Upon what ground do you say that that statement is untrue?—I mean if it refers to a brothel.

156. You mean that you are not personally aware of there being such a large number?—I think I had the visiting of the houses as much as any person when I went to Plymouth first. I went there as an inspector from another force, and it was a good part of my duty to try and put down a lot of these places. You might, at places which used to be formerly dancing places, find 15 or 20, or perhaps 30 or 40 young persons, who were merely there for an hour or two in the evening.

157. The way in which the answer is given shows, I think, that what Mr. Annis means is, that he found them, not living there, but congregating there. He is asked: "Did girls live in those houses?" And his answer is: "In some of them, but in others they only resorted to them at given times;" that is to say, congregated there?—Yes, he might find them.

158. But you are speaking of girls actually living in the houses?—That is so.

Mr. William Fowler.

159. It is a very ambiguous answer. He is asked: "Did girls live in those houses?" And he says: "Yes, in some of them, but in others they only resorted to them at given times." He does not say whether they were living there or not. It is not easy to know exactly what he means, but so far as you are aware, the statement is exaggerated in that case?—If he refers to their living there it certainly is.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

160. But if he merely refers to their being found there for temporary purposes it might be true?—It might.

Mr. William Fowler.

161. Referring to what are called crimps, in answer to Question 3291, he says: "That is a thing of the past." And in the next question, he is asked: "Is that in consequence of the operation of the Acts?" And his answer is: "Entirely; I do not know any other Act which has effected it at all. All I know is that the number has gone down from over 100 to just one or two; and I know also how it has been done."

10 March 1882.]

Mr. WRETFORD.

Mr. William Fowler—continued.

done." What do you say to that?—I should say that there were never such a number in Plymouth. You will occasionally find a man hanging about a woman in a brothel, and no doubt she maintains him, and I suppose that is what he refers to as crimps; but to say that there were as many as 100 is perfectly absurd.

Dr. Farquharson.

162. Of course as the number of brothels is reduced the number of crimps is also proportionately reduced?—Yes, in a certain sense; but it would be only a thief prostitute that would keep a crimp. She would pick up a man in the street, and then her man would come along, and they would perhaps assault him; it would not be done in an ordinary brothel.

Mr. William Fowler.

163. We have heard a good deal about the order in the streets of Plymouth, and the conduct of the prostitutes in the streets; to what do you attribute any improvement that has occurred in that respect?—Any improvement that has occurred may be attributed to the action of the magistrates. Some years ago, in 1865 or 1866, they made it a rule to fine every person that came up charged with being disorderly in the streets, and they have invariably carried that out up to the present time; and if a prostitute is very disorderly, they very often send her to prison without the option of a fine. The Licensing Act of 1872 has made a wonderful improvement in the streets; before that the public-houses were not closed till one o'clock; they were turned out of the beerhouses at 11 o'clock, and they wandered about the streets until one or half-past one; but now they are all clear by half-past 11 or a quarter to 12. Another thing is that the military and naval police now both send out patrols; and if there is a drunken sailor or a drunken soldier, they take him into custody and lock him up; and of course that prevents a great deal of disorder.

164. That is not under the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Not at all.

165. In reference to that, it would be interesting to have your return, No. 6, put in, showing the number of prostitutes charged before the magistrates in Plymouth for all offences, except those against the Contagious Diseases Acts from 1863 to 1881. Will you hand in that return?—Yes. (The same was delivered in.) The total number in 1863 was 118; in 1864 it was 132; in 1865 it was 141; in 1866 it was 98; in 1867 it was 124; in 1868 it was 116; in 1869 it was 136; in 1870 it was 112; in 1871 it was 126; in 1872 it was 112; in 1873 it was 95; in 1874 it was 83; in 1875 it was 89; in 1876 it was 59; in 1877 it was 72; in 1878 it was 77; in 1879 it was 66; in 1880 it was 68; and in 1881 it was 54. That is up to the 30th of September.

166. And for one-fourth of last year, from September the 30th to December the 31st, it was 26?—Yes.

167. That would be nearly at the rate of 104 last year?—Yes, there was rather a large number last quarter.

168. There has been a steady decrease?—Yes.

0.75.

Mr. Hanbury-Tracy.

169. But there was an immediate decrease of prosecutions by the local police after the passing of the Act of 1866, was there not?—No, not until 1872. In 1871 there were 126; that is nearly the highest number.

170. Then you do not think that the passing of the Act in any way put greater energy into the local police with regard to their prosecutions?—No, I think not; in fact we had begun before.

171. But you knew perfectly well, or thought it probable, that the Act would be passed?—Of course we knew it; but I do not think that interfered.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

172. What is the date of bye-law No. 10, to which you referred?—That was passed in 1844; but no persons were ever brought up under that bye-law until 1865, until after I came to Plymouth.

Mr. William Fowler.

173. It would appear from these returns that recently the proportion of offences to the number of prostitutes has rather increased; is that owing to your great activity in prosecuting them?—I do not know what else it can be. They certainly show a larger per-centage, according to the number of prostitutes.

174. The result has been that you have greatly improved the order of the streets by your prosecutions?—There is no doubt of that at all.

175. I notice particularly that the number of drunken and disorderly prostitutes has increased since 1870; that was long after the Acts were brought into operation?—Yes; in 1880 they were nearly as high as they have been at any time, right through; in 1880 they were 43.

Mr. Hanbury-Tracy.

176. That is the case in every town, is it not?—It may have been.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

177. Of course, the population has increased also?—Yes.

Mr. William Fowler.

178. Have you any reason to suppose that there is any improvement as regards the general moral condition of the town with reference to this species of indulgence?—No, I have not.

179. Have you heard any opinion expressed by people who are competent to speak on that subject?—I have heard statements by a man, and if that is evidence I can give it, if necessary. I have heard opinions which I can give, if the Committee wish it.

180. With reference to what is of much interest to the Committee, viz., the condition of soldiers and sailors; as you are aware, these Acts were specially framed for their benefit, and I should like to ask you whether there has not been a great improvement, in various ways, in the condition of soldiers and sailors in recent years, quite apart from these Acts?—Yes, very much so.

181. Would you kindly state some points in which you find that their condition has greatly improved, tending strongly to moral improvement?—There are sailors' homes, and soldiers' homes, and there are parties who interest themselves selves in them. As I said before, there is a military police and a naval police, and they prevent a great deal of what formerly used to occur.

Mr. WREFORD.

Mr. William Fowler—continued.

182. That is to say, a drunken soldier or sailor is immediately taken up?—Yes.

183. Then have they not more amusements and recreations provided for them in the barracks?—Yes, very much more; by the authorities.

184. Is there not a change also with regard to the mode of payment?—Yes, they are not paid as they used to be. For instance, years ago, when I went to Plymouth, when they paid off a ship, the place would be all up in arms; but now when they are paid off there is a steamer provided, and they go to Portsmouth and other places, or they go to homes. I have known sailors paid off with 40*l.* or 50*l.* at a time, but now I think they are paid at different times on the voyage, and not in such large amounts.

185. Then the whole condition of the soldier or the sailor, when he is in Plymouth, is far more comfortable, is it not, than it formerly was?—Yes.

186. And altogether he is in a better position since you can recollect?—Yes, I should say so.

187. We had a statement made by Mr. Anniss, at Question 3299, where he is asked: “I suppose from the facilities for seduction being diminished in that way you would infer that seduction itself has decreased?” And his answer is, “Yes; I have not the slightest doubt that it has decreased very much. I get instances of it.” Then he is asked, “Could you support what you state by any particular instances?” And he replies, “I know gentlemen have complained, ‘We cannot get a place in Plymouth to go to.’” Then I myself asked this question, “Under what law do you suppress them?” And his answer was, “If I find a brothel is being conducted in that way, that is, taking in young girls and married women, and the police are prevented from cautioning them, I place a man in such a position as to shut them up. (Q.) Under the ordinary law? (A.) Under a regulation for such cases.” Do you understand how those men can shut up a house; under what law can they do it?—I do not know of any such law.

188. I think I have asked you sufficient questions to bring out the fact that you differ from Mr. Anniss as regards the effect of the Contagious Diseases Acts police on the condition of the town of Plymouth, and that you attribute the change and improvement that has taken place as regards the order and decency of the town, and as regards the shutting up of these houses, to the action of the ordinary law, which is independent of the Contagious Diseases Acts and not to these Acts at all?—Yes.

Dr. Farquharson.

189. Have you any connection at all with the action of the Contagious Diseases Regulations in Plymouth and Devonport?—No.

190. Then what is your position exactly with reference to Mr. Anniss; are you entirely distinct from him?—Yes; entirely.

191. You are conducting your operations entirely separately?—Yes.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

192. Mr. Anniss, in his evidence, talked of his reducing the number of brothels, and you say that you reduce them?—Certainly.

193. Mr. Anniss also claims the credit of having reduced them by his action?—He assumes so.

194. For instance, at Question 3168, he is asked this: “You visited the brothels for four years before the Acts came into operation, but not having then the powers which were afterwards given to you by the Acts, you were unable to reduce the number of either the brothels or the common women?” You consider that Mr. Anniss’s action has had nothing to do with the reduction of brothels in those places that you speak of?—Not at all, or not directly; I do not know what he may have done indirectly.

195. You having been connected with Plymouth and Devonport for 19 years, do you remember the condition of things before and after the Acts came into operation?—Yes; I know it from 1863.

196. Is there any difference in the condition of the town before and after the Acts came into operation?—Yes, there is not at all so much disorder now; it is very much more orderly, especially in certain parts of the town.

197. There is less molestation in the streets on the part of the prostitutes?—Taking the numbers, I rather doubt that. There is less, certainly.

198. At all events the number of brothels has been largely diminished?—Yes.

199. And also the number of prostitutes?—Yes.

200. Then to what do you attribute the reduction in the number of brothels and the number of prostitutes?—I attribute the reduction of brothels a great deal to the action we have taken.

201. Have you had any increased powers conferred upon you in consequence of the introduction of the Contagious Diseases Act?—No.

202. Then why is it that such a very sudden diminution of prostitution and of the number of brothels took place within the few years following the operation of the Acts?—In the first place the Plymouth police was augmented, and there was some new blood brought in. There was a new superintendent and several new officers, and the watch committee took it upon them to have better order maintained in the streets, and that those places should be prosecuted under this by-law. Previously to 1865 that was never done.

203. Might you not have taken advantage of your undoubted power to check prostitution and brothels before 1865?—No, not at all.

204. Then you cannot explain why this sudden change took place coincident with the introduction of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I cannot.

205. Would you admit that the Contagious Diseases Acts and the operation of the police, &c., have stimulated the ordinary machinery of the law into fresh activity?—Not that I am aware of. As far as I am personally concerned I know it has not; I have always carried out the duties straightforwardly.

206. You are quite unable to explain the extraordinary increase of activity on the part of the police at Plymouth and Devonport coincident with

10 March 1882.]

Mr. WRETFORD.

with the passing of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I can only say, as I said before, through several new officers being appointed.

207. For what reason?—Because the old superintendent died, and they augmented the force, and they had in two or three new inspectors from outside, some from Cornwall and one from Wales.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

208. You mean that the force was made more efficient?—Yes.

Dr. Farquharson.

209. Do you not think that the fact of their being a special police force for regulating prostitution in Plymouth and Devonport might have a good effect upon the order of the town; I mean upon the order of the prostitutes?—No, not in the streets, because however disorderly they were they would never interfere with them.

210. The existence of this special police would have no effect upon their minds?—I could not go so far as that.

211. I think you said that, in your operations, you receive very little assistance from the officers of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—We do not.

212. Supposing that there were no officers of the Contagious Diseases Acts in Plymouth and Devonport, would your ordinary staff be sufficient, without these Contagious Diseases Acts' policemen, to carry out these operations of keeping order and checking prostitution?—Certainly; they have nothing whatever to do with keeping order; I do not think it would make the least difference; their duties now are so very different.

213. You get no assistance from them in any way?—Not at all.

214. They do not assist you in finding out what are brothels and what are not?—Not at all.

215. With the powers that you possess, how could you find out whether women are actually prostitutes or not?—We could find out if they were frequently in brothels, or in any other place with different men.

216. How could you find out whether new comers to the town are prostitutes or not?—You know pretty well where to find them. We do not go like the Contagious Diseases Acts' policemen do, and inquire whether there are any strangers there.

217. Do you visit brothels occasionally to find out whether the inmates are actually engaged in prostitution?—Only in cases of disorder.

218. What evidence have you to bring forward as to whether women are prostitutes or not?—If we find them frequently in brothels, and if we find men in bed with them there. That is generally the evidence that the officers get. Perhaps a robbery occurs, or there may be some disorder going on, and they visit the place, and they find three or four men there.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

219. They would not go in, unless there was some ostensible cause?—Not as a rule, unless we know it to be a very bad house, and they have orders to pay particular attention to it.

0.75.

Dr. Farquharson.

220. Mr. Anniss says, that one of the benefits of the Acts, in his opinion, is that parents often apply to him for information about their children who have gone astray, and that he, from his facilities for observation, is able to tell them where they are; do the parents come to you in the same way?—Yes, repeatedly.

221. As regards the members of your force whom you select for this particular duty, in connection with brothels and prostitution, do you pick them out specially?—No, it is done in the ordinary course of duty. Of course we expect the officers to take the leading part, either the out-door inspector or the sergeant.

222. The contagious diseases' constables are specially picked out, particularly competent men, and married; are your men married men?—Some of them are.

223. But you have not made any selection?—Not at all. If I was going to send a man to search a brothel, I should of course pick out a man who I knew would do it properly.

224. Have you heard in Plymouth or Devonport any complaint of the metropolitan police towards the women?—No, nothing authenticated.

225. You never heard of anything harsh or oppressive in the action of the police under the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Perhaps there may have been in the first two or three years, but nothing particular.

226. You would be likely to hear if anything of the kind took place?—Yes.

227. Coming to those women whom you say have been reformed, but who have been again convicted of having returned to prostitution, was there any evidence of their having returned to prostitution beyond the fact of being seen in the streets?—No.

228. Then they were convicted, not for prostitution, but disorderly conduct in the streets?—Yes.

229. Then there was no evidence that they had returned to prostitution?—No, but it was very well known to the local police that virtually they had not left it.

230. Have they not left the town, and gone away somewhere else?—I very much question it, except they have been sent to prison, perhaps, for six months.

231. How could they have escaped coming on the register?—I suppose they would leave their lodgings.

232. At all events, there was no actual proof that they were prostitutes beyond the fact they were disorderly in the streets?—No, except the knowledge of the police that they were earning their living by prostitution.

233. With regard to clandestine prostitution, of course you have no actual evidence to give of that?—No, but we get evidence occasionally where people, instead of going to brothels, go to refreshment-houses, or even to public-houses, or beerhouses. Every now and then those cases crop up, and I know by that that there is a great deal of clandestine prostitution going on.

234. Would you consider that the increase of clandestine prostitution is due to the closure of brothels in those places?—Partly, and partly to the

the

Mr. WRETFORD.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

the brothels being watched more, I have no doubt.

235. Therefore you think the closure of brothels is no indication of the increase of the morality of the district?—No, I should think not.

236. Perhaps it is the other way?—There are certainly a large number less prostitutes, known prostitutes.

237. How do you know that those women, whom you call clandestine prostitutes, are not on the register, and are not being examined?—I have no evidence of it; I only know it by repute.

238. For anything you know, they may be actual prostitutes on the register, and may be regularly examined?—I should be very much surprised to find that they were.

239. I think you gave some evidence just now about the improved conditions of the life of soldiers and sailors, and you think that the diminution of prostitution in those districts may be due to the increased facilities for amusements, &c., which soldiers and sailors' now have?—I think a good deal.

240. Can you tell us whether those improved conditions of life do not exist equally in the protected and in the unprotected districts?—I cannot tell you.

241. If those improved conditions are in operation, both in the protected and in the unprotected districts, of course that argument falls to the ground?—I have no knowledge as to that.

242. Of course your personal observation is entirely restricted to what you know, yourself, of Plymouth and Devonport?—Of Plymouth.

Colonel Digby.

243. In your opinion has the number of brothels, as well as of licensed houses, decreased in your district?—Yes.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

244. You spoke of the better conditions of life under which the soldiers and sailors live, and we hope, I suppose I may add, that they are an improved class of men that we have got. On the other hand, ought you not to set off against that the larger amount of leave, both by day and night, which soldiers and sailors also have now, as giving them greater opportunities for dissipation, if they choose to avail themselves of them?—They get leave; but I do not know whether they get more leave.

245. And they are younger men, are they not, than we had some 15 or 20 years ago?—Yes; they are not so old, as a rule.

246. Of course no body suspects that local influences would be brought to bear upon you; but you could not answer for these 90 men who are under your care, could you?—Certainly not.

247. They are ordinary police constables living about the town, who do not differ from the police constables, we will say, of Birmingham, or of any other town?—Not at all.

248. Is it not also the fact that your local police are divided amongst five or six districts?—We are three districts; three towns.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

249. But is not each town divided into districts?—No; the superintendent of Stonehouse would take the country districts.

250. But each of those three districts has a separate police force attached to it?—Yes, that is so.

251. Therefore, of course, supposing that a woman had got known to the local police in one of your districts, all she would have to do would be to go to another district, in order to escape observation; would not that be so?—Yes, I presume it would, unless we were looking after her by warrant, and then, of course, we should follow her.

252. It is common ground, I think, to every body that there has been a decided decrease in the number of prostitutes and brothels, and a decided improvement in the order and general appearance of the streets of Plymouth since the time when these Contagious Diseases Acts came into operation?—Yes, it is so.

253. I understand you then, to say that, while you admit that that improvement has taken place, you attribute it, no doubt, perfectly honestly to causes other than the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Yes.

254. And those causes are, first, I think you said, the greater activity of the local police, and secondly, the passing of the Licensing Act?—Yes.

255. Would you go so far as to say that the Contagious Diseases Acts have had no effect whatever in bringing about that better state of things?—No, I would not go so far as that.

256. Then, perhaps, you would admit that it would be owing, speaking in a general way, to the combined action of these three things, the Licensing Act, the activity of your own police, and the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts; would you admit that?—I have no doubt that the Contagious Diseases Acts have prevented a good many women from coming on the town.

257. Or to use the expression which several witnesses have used, they have had a deterrent operation?—Perhaps that has been so.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

258. You said that in your examination before the Commission, did you not?—I do not know; I may have said it. It is 10 years ago, and I have not seen my evidence since.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

259. Should you not also be disposed to think that the fact of these women being sent into hospital, and being brought under the influence of religious and moral teaching, must have a good effect upon some of them, at any rate; or do you not know enough of what goes on in the hospital to be able to speak upon that point?—I do not.

260. As to the comparative means of acquiring knowledge which you and the metropolitan police have with regard to these women, I suppose, as a matter of fact, the name and address of every single registered prostitute would be known to the metropolitan police?—Certainly.

261. And I suppose that every prostitute charged

10 March 1882.]

MR. WREFORD.

Continued.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

charged before the magistrates would be known to the metropolitan police?—Yes.

262. As regards your own force, I suppose, on the other hand, that the thing which sets them in motion is an act of misconduct on the part of a prostitute?—Yes.

263. Am I right in saying that they do not go into the question of whether a woman is a prostitute unless she misconducts herself?—They do not.

264. Therefore I suppose that if a prostitute does not misconduct herself in the public streets, or make a row outside a house, she may be in Plymouth without your knowing it?—Yes, personally, she might.

265. It was said that girls were taken to brothels at an early age as servants, and trained to prostitution there; I suppose you would have no knowledge of that?—I should not, individually.

266. You would not say, would you, that the Plymouth police have the same opportunities of knowing the prostitutes as the metropolitan police would have, whose business it would be specially to know them?—No, they would not, all of them, personally.

267. Of course they would not see those prostitutes, and they would not come into contact with them in the same way as the metropolitan police do?—No, not at all, because the women have to pass through the surgery every fortnight.

268. I understand you to say that the information which you have given the Committee now is from your personal knowledge?—It is.

269. I think on a former occasion you stated one or two cases from information which had been given you by Inspector John Hill of the Plymouth police?—Yes, the return that was made was made by him.

270. I am afraid he a little misled you, did he not, in some respects?—Of course they were not prostitutes according to Mr. Anniss's idea.

271. May I ask you whether you have not been in court yourself when the metropolitan police have been complimented by the Recorder of Plymouth, and also by the magistrates, for the manner in which they have carried out the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I do not remember the magistrates doing so, but the Recorder did pass some compliment to Mr. Anniss.

272. And Mr. Anniss has also been complimented for rescuing young girls who have found their way into brothels, has he not?—I do not remember anything about that.

273. You know the town well, and I am glad to see that you know the difference between what is evidence and what is not evidence. You state that there have been no authenticated cases of respectable women against whom the Acts have been oppressively used?—Oh, no.

274. With regard to clandestine prostitution, it is difficult to say what is a clandestine prostitute, is it not?—I take a clandestine prostitute to be a woman who acts as a prostitute and does not attend the hospital.

275. You mean a woman that is not registered?—Yes.

276. But would there be likely to be many women in that position; would not the vigilance of the metropolitan police enable them to pounce down on these clandestine prostitutes and get them registered?—I am afraid that there are a good many about.

277. One of the great complaints made against the metropolitan police is, that they ferret out these cases and bring even respectable women upon the register; that is hardly consistent with the fact, is it, that they allow an increased number of what are called clandestine prostitutes to go on carrying on their trade without interfering with them?—They watch brothels more particularly. There are other places too.

278. But do they not watch the women too, because the case made against them is that they are rather over zealous in carrying out the Act?—I do not see that they can be very over zealous if they carry them out straightforwardly.

279. If that were so would it not follow that these women, who, you say, are prostitutes to all intents and purposes, would be put upon the register?—In a town of 75,000 what are two men going to watch. One part of the town, the eastern part, is scarcely ever watched at all, where the mercantile marine go. They go there occasionally.

Mr. Hanbury-Tracy.

280. In your opinion, if the Act is continued, there ought to be an increase in the number of police to make it of real service?—I think more are necessary for a town like Plymouth. I do not think that two men can watch all Plymouth.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

281. There are two charges which are a little inconsistent, as it strikes my mind, brought against the Acts and the persons who administer them; on the one hand, it is said that the police are constantly taking up women and going to houses where they have no right to go, so as to bring on the register women who ought not to be brought on the register?—I think there is no ground for that.

282. And, on the other hand, it appears now that there are a number of women who ought to be on the register, but who are allowed to carry on their trade without being interfered with?—There is no doubt that there are large numbers of women who get their living by prostitution who are not on the register.

283. What is your ground for saying that?—Partly from my own observation and partly from what I hear from other people. Only two or three weeks ago I had occasion to make an inquiry of a woman who had been to a public-house, and I found she had been to this public-house three or four times with different men; and when I found the name of another woman who had been going on in the same way, and neither one of those was registered.

284. Your own observation may enable you to speak as to some cases, but it must be necessarily vague; you know one case here and another case there, and as to the rest, I suppose you derive your impression from what you hear?—Yes, and from what is reported to me.

285. Therefore, when you speak of the increase or decrease of clandestine prostitution, I suppose

10 March 1882.]

Mr. WREFOED.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

it must be taken as stated in a very general way; you could not give us anything in the shape of figures?—No, I could not.

286. It is merely your impression?—Yes.

Dr. Farquharson.

287. Would you call a woman living with one man a clandestine prostitute?—No, not if she kept to that one man.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

288. She would not be interfered with by the metropolitan police?—Not at all.

289. Putting aside the question whether the Act ought to be continued or not, would you mean by a clandestine prostitute a woman who ought to be registered, but who is not so?—Yes.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

290. I understand, from your evidence, that if you find that a brothel is conducted in an orderly manner you do not interfere with it?—Quite so.

291. You only interfere when it becomes disorderly?—Yes, or when some complaint is made of it, of drinking being allowed there, or something of that sort; then we order people to visit it.

292. And you then proceed to set the prosecution in motion?—Yes.

293. But only under those conditions?—Excepting in the case of beerhouses or public-houses, then, of course, immediately it came to my knowledge proceedings would be taken.

294. Otherwise a house which was notoriously a brothel, if conducted in an orderly manner, without exciting public scandal, would be allowed to take its course?—It would be.

295. As you are, of course, familiar with the subject, having been resident in Plymouth for a long time, I should like to ask you a few questions about the condition of the public women there; do you consider that their condition has improved, on the whole, since the Contagious Diseases Acts have been in force?—Do you mean personally?

296. Generally?—Yes; we have not so many of the lower and rougher class of women there.

297. And, on the whole, they conduct themselves. I presume, more respectably?—Certainly; we do not get so many charges.

298. Do you mean charges of drunkenness, and so on?—Under the Vagrant Act, or the Police Act, for being disorderly.

299. You are well acquainted with the Albert Hospital, of course?—Not very well; I know the place very well.

300. In the last report I find this statement: "The administration of the lock wards calls for no particular comment from the committee; there has been no trouble, and the work of reformation which is carried on there has been as successful as in former years;" from your own personal knowledge, would you be able to say that you agree in that statement?—I do not know anything about it. I only know from what I read in the reports.

301. As to whether there is any reformation among those women you have no practical knowledge?—No.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

302. In answer to my Right honourable friend, just now you spoke about the persecution of women by the police; you are aware, I suppose, that charges have been brought against the Contagious Diseases Acts police, in no measured terms, that they have committed acts of great tyranny towards the women?—I do not think I ever knew a case at Plymouth.

303. In your evidence before the Commission in 1871, you said that you did not believe that the women themselves were then hostile to the Acts?—No, and I do not think they are now.

304. In the abstract of your evidence drawn up by Sir John Trelawney (8850), you say that disorderly scenes sometimes took place in the neighbourhood of the examining rooms; are there any such scenes now?—No.

305. You also give it as your opinion that the disorderly scenes were due to the action of the opponents of the Acts; do you believe that to be the case?—I know there used to be gentlemen there, and then the women used to come up there sometimes a little the worse for liquor, and that sort of thing, and we had to send a policeman there repeatedly. That was in 1871.

306. But you now tell the Committee, as I understand, that these disorderly scenes do not take place?—I have had no complaint there for years.

307. Are you acquainted with a person of the name of John Marshall?—Yes.

308. Do you know whether he is a paid agent of the Society for the repeal of the Acts?—I understood that he was an agent for the Rescue Society.

309. This is a placard which was issued by him not long ago at Canterbury: he states, "Mr. John Marshall of Plymouth will give an account of his personal knowledge of the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts, and illustrations of the cruel, one-sided, unjust, and tyrannical manner in which these laws bear upon poor and defenceless women;" are you able to tell the Committee whether these laws have ever borne upon poor defenceless women in this cruel, one-sided, unjust, and tyrannical manner, within your knowledge, as superintendent of the police of the borough of Plymouth?—No.

310. Therefore you believe these statements, as far as regards Plymouth, to be utterly false?—I do not know what Mr. Marshall knows.

311. But, as far as you know, are they true?—As far as I know, I do not know of anything of the kind.

Sir Henry Wolff.

312. If there had been anything of the kind you would have known it, would you not?—If it had been public, or had come before the magistrates, I should have known it.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

313. How could it have been otherwise than public if there had been cruelty and tyranny?—There may be little things occur which do not come before the public.

314. However, you do not believe that any such act has taken place?—No, I should not say nothing like that.

315. You

10 March 1882.]

Mr. WRE福德.

Dr. Cameron.

315. You stated, in reply to a question put by the Judge Advocate General, that you did not know of any respectable woman having been prosecuted under the Acts; do you remember that in 1870-71 various cases were heard by the magistrates and dismissed, and that the newspapers reported such cases?—I do not remember; I do not think it was in Plymouth. I do not remember more than one or two cases where the women have been brought up, and not ordered for medical examination; I remember one case, some years ago.

316. You mentioned that in the case of houses which were not beerhouses or public-houses you did not interfere; in most of the brothels, whether they are licensed or not, is not liquor sold; is there not a great deal of "shebeening"?—No doubt.

317. Have you not power to step in to look after that?—Only by obtaining warrants from the magistrates.

318. Do you ever try to obtain warrants?—Yes; many times.

319. Have you succeeded?—Yes.

320. Does not that give you a power to interfere with unlicensed brothels?—Yes.

321. Have you availed yourself of that power?—Yes.

322. With good effect?—Yes.

Mr. JOHN LYNN, called in; and Examined.

Dr. Cameron.

323. You are the Head Constable of the borough of Devonport, are you not?—Yes.

324. And you have occupied that position since 1862?—Yes.

325. You have been a police officer in the metropolis and the provinces altogether about 40 years, I believe?—Yes, 41 years.

326. Have you read the evidence given before this Committee last Session by Mr. Inspector Anniss?—I have.

327. And you have come here, to a large extent, to contradict it?—Yes.

328. Do you believe that any such reduction has been effected by Inspector Anniss, or through the administration of the Contagious Diseases Acts, or the operation of the special police engaged in their administration, as he represents?—I do not.

329. Do you contend that such a reduction has taken place?—There has been a reduction.

330. To what agency do you attribute it?—I attribute the decrease in the number of prostitutes and in the number of brothels to the increased activity of the police, and to the improvement in society generally.

331. You have a return, have you not, of the number of brothels of all kinds in Devonport from 1862 to 1881?—Yes.

332. Will you hand that in?—Yes. (The same was delivered in.)

333. From that return it appears that in 1866 the number of brothels was 60; at the present time how many are there?—Eleven.

334. And those are all private houses, are they not?—Yes.

335. Is there any licensed house now a brothel?—None, to my knowledge.

336. I suppose that a good deal of your powers in suppressing those houses arise out of the Licensing Acts?—Yes.

337. When you came to Devonport, how many licensed houses were there of bad character?—A large number; I should think 80.

338. When did you come to Devonport?—In 1862.

339. And a number of them had dancing saloons attached to them?—Yes, about 60 of them, or rather more.

0.75.

Dr. Cameron—continued.

340. Shortly after your arrival in Devonport, you prosecuted a number of those, did you not?—Yes.

341. For what offence?—For harbouring prostitutes.

342. What was the result?—Convictions.

343. And the dancing rooms were closed?—Yes.

344. You have another return here of the number of convictions under the Licensing Acts obtained against public-house and beerhouse-keepers in Devonport for harbouring prostitutes, from 1863 to 1873; will you hand that in?—Yes. (The same was delivered in.)

345. Were any of the 49 convictions there enumerated obtained through the instrumentality of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police?—Certainly not.

346. You state that in one case the officers of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police did not know that the house was a brothel?—No, neither did I until we got the evidence to convict it.

Mr. Hanbury-Tracy.

347. How long after the passing of the Act was it before the police knew that it was a brothel?—This conviction took place in 1878, but it had not been a brothel all the time.

Dr. Cameron.

348. Do you find that publicans, the proprietors of licensed houses, dread the powers that you possess under the ordinary licensing laws?—There is no doubt of it.

349. You have here another return of the number of public-houses and beershops in Devonport which were closed in consequence of the action of the local police in prosecutions, and also in opposing licenses on the ground of the houses being the resort of prostitutes from 1863 to 1881?—Yes, that shows a total number of 29 public-houses and 34 beerhouses.

349.* Will you hand in that return?—Yes. (The same was delivered in.)

350. Did the Contagious Diseases Acts' police, or their powers, contribute to the shutting up of any of those houses?—Not in any degree at all.

351. Inspector Anniss, in answer to Question

10 March 1882.]

Mr. LYNN.

Dr. Cameron—continued.

3797, made the following statement: "In a good many cases we have been the cause of shutting public-houses and beershops up directly, where they have persisted in carrying on the trade, we having a direct knowledge which the local police would not have the opportunity of getting;" do you admit that?—No, certainly not. I should like to know the name of one house that he has shut up, or been the means in any way of closing.

352. In reply to another Question, No. 3937, Inspector Anniss specifies a house in Cumberland-street, which he claims to have been the means of shutting up; do you know anything about that?—There were three houses shut up in Cumberland-street by my action. One house was shut up after the Acts came into operation, and I suppose that must be the house that he refers to.

353. Was he instrumental in shutting it up?—Not in the slightest degree.

354. In fact, it was shut up through the power possessed by the ordinary police?—It was closed in consequence of my report on the licensing day in 1870, and I have that report here.

355. You have another return showing the number of public-houses and beerhouses in Devonport, with the number of each convicted on prosecutions by the local police for all offences against the Licensing Acts, and the amount of fines inflicted; will you hand in that return?—Yes. (The same was delivered in.)

356. That shows a total of 38 public-houses and 62 beerhouse, does it not?—Yes.

357. Was the shutting up of those houses in any case attributable to the action of the Contagious Diseases Acts police, either as respects information, or evidence, or powers?—In no way connected with them.

Sir Henry Wolff.

358. Were those houses shut up on account of their harbouring prostitutes?—No, not all of them.

359. They were shut up for other reasons, and not on account of the functions of those Contagious Diseases Acts' police?—Some of them.

Dr. Cameron.

360. Is it an offence against the Licensing Acts to harbour prostitutes?—Yes; 29 public-houses and 34 beerhouses were shut up on the ground of the houses being the resort of prostitutes or brothels.

Sir Henry Wolff.

361. Is that the total number that were shut up?—That is the total number that were shut up for those offences.

Dr. Cameron.

362. You have other powers under the bye-laws of the borough; will you read bye-law No. 44?—Bye-law 44 is as follows:—"Persons keeping disorderly houses. That if any person shall permit or suffer common prostitutes, reputed thieves, or idle and disorderly persons to assemble at or continue in any house, shop, room, or cellar in his occupation, whether such house, shop, room, or cellar shall ostensibly be kept for the sale of refreshments or otherwise; or if any person shall in any manner keep a disorderly house in which gaming, prostitution, or drunkenness shall be allowed or encouraged, every person so respectively offending shall for such offence forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding 5 l."

363. Then there is another bye-law, No. 45, which deals with harbouring children; will you read that?—"That if any person shall unlawfully or without sufficient cause, harbour or entertain, or offer to harbour or entertain, any child under the age of 20 years, after notice to the contrary from the parents or other guardians of such child; or if any person shall permit any female to abide or remain in his house, shop, room, or cellar, or in any part of his premises for the purpose of prostitution; or if any person licensed to deal in spirituous or fermented liquors shall knowingly supply any sort of spirituous or fermented liquor to any boy or girl apparently under the age of 14, to be drunk by such boy or girl upon the premises, every person so respectively offending shall for such offence forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding 5 l."

364. You have prepared a return of the number of convictions under the bye-laws which you have just read, all of which, as I understand, were obtained without any assistance from Inspector Anniss or his officers?—Yes.

365. Will you hand in that return?—Yes. (The same was handed in.)

Mr. Hanbury-Tracy.

366. During what period were those convictions obtained?—For the whole period that I have been at Devonport.

Mr. Burt.

367. What is the total number of convictions?—Forty, between the years 1863 and 1881, and the amount of fines was 103 l. 10 s.

Dr. Cameron.

368. Some of those were public-houses and others private brothels?—Yes.

369. Did your watch committee restrain or encourage your dealing with those cases?—In our town the watch committee have everything before them before there is a summons issued, therefore it was on my report by their sanction.

370. Do you consider that such houses are more likely to be dealt with in the way of suppression by the Contagious Diseases Acts' police, or by the inhabitants who are interested in maintaining the order of the neighbourhood?—In all these cases information was obtained by the local police. We could get information any day that a house was a brothel, and we might get a conviction; but it is a sort of rule that I have laid down for my own guidance, as it were, that I never interfere with a brothel while it is well conducted. In all these cases there has been some other reason for the police going there except the public-houses.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

371. In order to set you and your staff in motion, there must have been some misconduct on

10 March 1882.]

Mr. LYNN.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

on the part of the inmates of the brothel; is that so?—Not always. There was another reason for the police going there. It is not always misconduct.

372. Not the simple fact of the place being a brothel?—No.

Dr. Cameron.

373. But you have power of dealing with it, from the simple fact of its being a brothel?—Yes.

374. You derive power under these bye-laws from that fact?—Yes, the bye-laws do not give us power to enter.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

375. But whether you have the power, or not, you do not exercise it?—We do not.

Dr. Cameron.

376. But if you had evidence regarding a place being a brothel, whether it was disorderly or not, or whether you thought fit to exercise your power or not, you have power, have you not, to deal with it?—Yes.

Dr. Farquharson.

377. But you have no legal power to enter a brothel?—No, no legal power; but no brothel keeper ever hinders us.

Dr. Cameron.

378. My question is, whether, supposing that you have got the evidence, you have the power of dealing with the house upon that evidence, independently of the fact of there being disorder or not?—Yes.

379. Do you ever take proceedings against houses that have no licenses as public-houses or beerhouses for the illegal sale of liquor?—No, we have had nothing of the kind in Devonport.

380. There are some important structural improvements proceeding in Devonport, are there not?—Yes.

381. What is your opinion as to their effect in ameliorating the condition of the town?—We have had about 14 brothels pulled down and removed, and in a few days six more will go.

382. What becomes of the inmates of those houses?—I cannot tell; some of them have gone to Plymouth.

383. Has that effected a reduction in the total number?—It has effected a reduction in the total number of both prostitutes and brothels.

384. Mr. Anniss mentioned, in reply to Questions 3246 to 3248, that there had been houses in Devonport set apart for the debauchery of boys and girls; do you confirm or deny that statement?—I know Devonport pretty well, and I have known it for some time, and I never heard of such a thing.

385. At Question 3245 Inspector Anniss is asked: "What state of things did you find there?" (A.) They were houses set apart where boys and girls met and had their debauch just at their will. (Q.) At what age? (A.) Varying from 12 to 18 years of age. You would find, for instance, one house frequented by butcher boys and drovers, another by sailor and drummer boys, &c. (Q.) Did girls live in those houses? (A.) Yes, in some of them, but in others they only resorted to them at given times. I have found as many as 15 or 20 in some of those houses. (Q.) Were they all young girls? (A.) They would be young girls; those houses could not exist; the very fact of our visits to them would shut them up." That would leave the impression on your mind that there were a great number of those houses existing?—Yes.

386. Do you imagine that they could have existed without your knowledge?—No, they could not.

387. How do your sources of information compare with those of Mr. Anniss?—I have 50 where he has one.

Mr. Hanbury-Tracy.

388. But your force surely is not only confined to the detection of any misconduct under these Acts?—No.

Dr. Cameron.

389. Would it have been your duty as head constable of Devonport, to have detected and prosecuted those houses under bye-law 45, which you have read?—There is no doubt of it. I do not doubt that at times, for a night or two, there might be assemblages of boys and girls. I have stopped a good deal of it in public-houses; I never knew it take place in brothels.

390. Do you then regard Mr. Anniss's statement on that point as being very much exaggerated?—I do.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

391. Mr. Anniss is not speaking of brothels, but of places generally, where boys and girls resort, and he is not speaking of Devonport in particular, but of the three towns?—Perhaps so.

Dr. Cameron.

392. In Devonport you say that certain assemblages of that sort have come to your knowledge?—Years ago.

393. Did you take any steps to put them down?—Yes.

394. If any steps had been taken by the Contagious Diseases Acts' police to put down similar assemblages, would they have come to your knowledge?—I should have known it before they would, I think.

395. Had they shut up any such houses or prevented any such assemblages, should you have known of it?—Certainly.

396. Do you know of any such cases?—I never heard of it until I saw it in print.

397. Is this a fair statement of your position: that whenever any brothel has been shut up in Devonport you claim that it has been the result of prosecutions by yourself with the aid of your own officers, and not of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police in any way?—I do. We may have had a brothel shut up for a week or two, and it might be opened again after the prosecution. I cannot say that I have been the means of permanently closing any brothel at all.

398. Are there any circumstances in the shape of better care being taken of soldiers and sailors which would lead to an improvement?—It has led to great improvements. A lady named Miss Weston has opened two establishments in Devon-

10 March 1882.]

Mr. LYNN.

Dr. Cameron—continued.

port, and she can lodge 170 sailors, and a sailor is never turned away from there, whether he is drunk or sober. Very frequently, if a sailor is found drunk, he is taken there instead of being brought to the police station; he is never refused admission.

399. What have you to say as to the improved condition of soldiers?—We do not have a soldier in custody once a month, I should think; we do not have a dozen a year in Devonport. The military patrols are constantly out night and day.

400. Are those a recent institution?—Not very; they have been established within the last 12 or 14 years, probably.

401. They were not in existence when you commenced your connection with Devonport?—They were beginning then, but they were not so much in practice as they are now.

402. As to the number of prostitutes, Mr. Anniss handed in a return marked B., which appears on page 466 of the Appendix; have you any remarks to make with regard to that?—He says that in the year 1866 he had 340; but I say that there were not so many.

403. He brings it down in 1881 to 82; have you any remark to make about that?—No, I think that may be correct in 1881.

Sir Henry Wolff.

404. How many were there in 1866 according to your view?—In 1866 I return 152 at Devonport.

Dr. Cameron.

405. Can you explain the discrepancy?—No.

406. Have you reason to believe that your number is accurate?—I have.

407. Has Mr. Anniss adhered to your numbers in subsequent years?—Yes.

408. Do you see any reason why he should have deviated from them in the first year of the return?—I cannot give any reason.

409. At all events, you adhere to the accuracy of your return?—I do, to the best of my belief.

410. Do you believe that you have better machinery for acquiring information on that point than Inspector Anniss?—Yes.

Sir Henry Wolff.

411. Have you anything to do with Plymouth or Stonehouse?—Nothing whatever.

412. How many do you return this year?—I had no return in 1881.

413. Then when did you stop your returns?—In 1868.

Dr. Cameron.

414. With regard to the number of prostitutes for the years subsequent to 1868; do you believe that Mr. Anniss's figures represent the full number?—In 1869, although I did not return them on the Judicial Statistics, they were taken; and in that year we had 170, and Mr. Anniss shows 156.

415. Have you known any cases in which women of undoubtedly immoral character have been charged and convicted as prostitutes, who had not been registered?—I can only say what they have said. I never saw the register, and, therefore, I cannot tell.

416. Cases have come under your notice, where the women who have been convicted as prostitutes have told you that they were not registered?—Yes.

417. Have there been many such cases?—Several.

418. In Captain Harris's return, page 15, a statement of Mr. Anniss's is embodied to the effect, that no girl under 17 years of age has during the last three years been practising prostitution in the districts of Portsmouth, Plymouth, Sheerness, and a number of other places; does that statement coincide with your knowledge on the subject?—No.

419. Do you consider it credible, or the contrary?—It is not true.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

420. On the question of age; it must, to a certain extent, be a matter of surmise how old a girl is, must it not?—When she is charged we ask her her age.

421. But I mean independently of her being charged?—We could only go by appearance.

Dr. Cameron.

422. Have you not as good means of finding out the age as Inspector Anniss, or has he any means of finding out the age that you have not?—If I wanted to find out, he has no better means than I have.

423. Then do you accept Mr. Anniss's figures in the same return, of there being over 400 girls under the age of 17 practising prostitution, in the year 1865?—No, in 1865, in Devonport, we had four under 16. I have not any return of those over 16 and under 17. On the Judicial Statistics it is 16 and under.

Sir Henry Wolff.

424. Are these returns of all the prostitutes under that age in Devonport?—Yes.

425. Whether charged or not?—Those who were living in Devonport.

Chairman.

426. Do you mean to say that at that time there were four prostitutes under that age living in Devonport, or that there were four prostitutes convicted?—There were four living there under that age.

Dr. Farquharson.

427. You have not any actual authentic evidence of their age; it is only a matter of surmise?—No; in that case their ages were got for the purpose of the Judicial Statistics.

Dr. Cameron.

428. How did you get their age?—I sent a shrewd and intelligent man to collect the evidence.

429. And has Captain Harris any other means of getting their ages?—Not that I know of.

Dr. Farquharson.

430. But they were asked; it was not a case of surmise?—No; they were asked.

431. On

10 March 1882.]

Mr. LYNN.

Dr. Cameron.

431. On the other point of there being no girls under that age practising prostitution at present in Devonport, have you had any case recently?—Yes.

432. Will you give us an account of it?—On the 9th of last month two young women were locked up and convicted of being common prostitutes and behaving in an indecent manner; and one of them was then 16, and she had been on the town two years, she said.

433. Had she ever been at the Lock Hospital?—She said she had been out of the Lock Hospital five days.

434. How old was the other one?—She was 20, and she had been more than three years on the town.

435. Have any similar cases come under your notice?—No, not recently. We have had no very young girls charged.

436. I suppose Mr. Anniss's statement refers only to registered prostitutes?—I should think so.

437. Do you imagine that the registered prostitutes include all the prostitutes of Devonport?—I do not think so.

438. What is your idea as to clandestine prostitution in your district?—I never heard the expression "clandestine prostitutes;" I would give them a different name.

439. What name would you give them?—I should call them "sly whores."

440. I suppose you mean unregistered prostitutes?—I do not quite mean that.

Mr. Hanbury-Tracy.

441. You mean women who are sharp enough to avoid being registered?—Yes.

Dr. Cameron.

442. But practising prostitution clandestinely?—To a large extent.

443. Are there many of those?—I believe that there are a large number in Devonport.

444. Do you believe that their number has been increased or diminished through the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I could not say.

445. Is it your opinion that the operation of these Acts has had anything to do with the diminution or increase of clandestine prostitution?—I do not know that it has. I cannot tell you that the Acts have had any influence at all; I am not aware of any as far as regards the clandestine prostitutes.

446. Mr. Anniss makes a statement, in answer to Question 3446, that the local police send young girls whom they find in bad company to him to be restored to their parents; is that the case?—I have on one occasion sent a parent to Mr. Anniss after sending round to the brothels in Devonport and not finding the child. That is eight or nine years ago.

447. Do you generally pursue that course of sending to Mr. Anniss?—I have only done it once in my lifetime.

448. Have you restored many such girls to their parents?—Many; it is not an uncommon thing at all. A girl has run away from her home in the country and the parent is afraid she has got into a brothel. I at once send an officer, 0.75.

Dr. Cameron—continued.

usually an inspector, to find her out, and we find her out in a short time if she is in Devonport.

449. Then, according to your experience, does your force, or the Contagious Diseases Acts' force, do most in the way of restoration?—I cannot tell at all; I do not know what they do.

450. You have not power in such cases, I suppose, to search?—No.

451. Do you meet with any opposition?—No opposition.

452. What is your experience regarding the effect of the intervention of the police in the reclamation of prostitutes?—I cannot tell.

453. Do you find many or any of the so-called reclaimed ones coming back to prostitution?—Yes; we have a number of women in Devonport who have been to homes time after time.

454. Have you any observations to offer to the Committee regarding the present state of order in the streets, as contrasted with previous years?—There are not so many prostitutes for one thing, and the streets are more orderly.

455. Is that owing to the action of the local, or of the metropolitan police?—Certainly not of the metropolitan police.

456. Is it owing to the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Certainly not; they have nothing to do with the order of the streets; they do not pretend to have anything to do with that. The man who really has the working of the Acts in Devonport does not pretend to do anything towards maintaining the order of the streets.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

457. Not directly?—Neither directly nor indirectly. He is a very proper man to do it. They have had very good men indeed to work the Contagious Diseases Acts.

Dr. Cameron.

458. So that whatever improvement has taken place in the order of the streets is attributable to the ordinary police, acting under their own powers?—Yes.

459. You have a return of the number of prostitutes convicted in the borough of Devonport for disorderly conduct in the streets, and all other offences except against the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Yes.

460. Will you hand that in?—Yes. (The same was delivered in.) I always charge prostitutes under the Vagrant Act, not under the Police Act, for being drunk and disorderly. If a prostitute is disorderly she is charged as a riotous prostitute; and if she is making use of obscene language she is charged with behaving in an indecent manner, so that until recently that always led to her being sent to prison or discharged; the magistrates had no power to fine them.

461. According to this return, the number of convictions has been greater in the last five years than formerly?—Yes, it has.

462. Is that to be explained by the greater powers?—No, there are no greater powers. I suppose they must have been more disorderly, or they would not have been apprehended.

463. Have you any remarks to make regarding street solicitation?—There never was much solicitation

10 March 1882.]

MR. LYNN.

Dr. Cameron—continued.

solicitation in Devonport, because a complaint soon reaches me. If a gentleman is solicited he complains of it, and our watch committee meets every Thursday night, and if any of their friends have been solicited I hear of it at once; and I usually put a man in plain clothes to prevent it.

464. Are you aware of any cases in which proceedings have been instituted before the magistrates in Devonport by the Contagious Diseases Acts' police for the suppression of prostitution in connection with disorderly conduct?—Never.

465. There is some case which you wish to mention which occurred in 1870, is there not, in which Inspector Anniss instituted proceedings before the magistrates?—There were two women brought up then for not complying with the Act. One of them was discharged, and the other was ordered to submit to examination. I think those are the only two cases that have occurred in Devonport under the Act. Anniss or his men have not been in the police court there for many years.

Dr. Farquharson.

466. I understand that you challenge Mr. Anniss's statistics about the reduction of prostitution in Devonport?—I challenge many of his answers as being not quite accurate.

467. You challenge his figures as regards the reduction of prostitution in Devonport?—Not his figures only. I think his figures were much too high in 1866, more than the actual number; but afterwards, in 1867, 1868, and 1869, his figures and mine were almost identical.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

468. I think it is common ground both to you and Mr. Anniss that prostitution has very much decreased since 1866 in Devonport; you admit that the streets have been better, and that brothels have decreased?—Brothels have decreased, but the decrease has only been recently, and not through my action, or anyone else's.

469. I only want to get the fact. Mr. Wrexford, speaking of Plymouth, admitted, and I presume you will admit too, that there has been a steady diminution in the number of brothels and in the number of prostitutes, and a steady improvement in the condition of the streets, which I suppose would be the natural result of a diminution of prostitution, since 1864 or 1865; is not that so?—No, I do not admit that there has been a steady decrease.

470. There has been a decrease, at any rate?—Yes.

Sir Henry Wolff.

471. You stated, did you not, that in 1866 there were in Devonport 152 prostitutes?—In 1866 I think I have said that there were 152.

472. And you acknowledge that Mr. Anniss was right about 1881 when he takes the number as 82?—Yes, he is not far wrong.

473. Therefore there has been a diminution of nearly one-half?—Yes.

474. Has the population of Devonport increased meanwhile?—No.

475. Has it been stationary since 1866?—It has not increased much.

476. It has not diminished by half?—No.

477. Therefore you must acknowledge that, even taking your numbers, there is a diminution from 152 to 82?—This pulling down of these brothels had commenced in 1881, when Mr. Anniss gave this evidence.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

478. But you admit the fact that there has been a diminution, and that, putting it generally, the town of Devonport is more outwardly moral and more orderly than it was in 1864; is not that so?—Yes.

Dr. Farquharson.

479. But you do not allow that this diminution is at all due to the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I cannot tell. I have no evidence in my own mind of anything that they have done that would cause that reduction.

480. But you think it is due to the increased activity of the police, and this activity is due to the Licensing Acts?—Much of it is due to the Licensing Acts.

481. What is the improved condition of society to which you refer?—There is Miss Weston's establishment, and the two men who have been her managers have left her, and each of them opened similar establishments. There was only the old Sailors' Home before that, and now these are places of attraction to sailors, and they go there. Those are the kind of people who used to keep up the brothels in the old days; sailors coming home with money, and sailors having leave from their ships at night, used to go to brothels, but they do not do that now.

482. And that improvement has been introduced since the Contagious Diseases Acts came into operation?—Yes, in the last five or six years.

483. Has the improvement in the condition of the soldiers to which you refer also been introduced since the Contagious Diseases Acts came into operation?—Yes, very much of it.

484. To what particular improvements do you refer?—To the games in the barracks. They have a canteen, and they are allowed to play at cards, and billiards, and bagatelle, and all sorts of things.

485. Do you really think that that would make a difference?—Yes, many of them do not go out at night.

486. Do you think that would make any difference in the fact of a man going out and having connection with a woman?—They do not go and get drunk, and that is how they used to get into brothels.

487. Is there any evidence that they get drunk less than they used to?—Yes, there is less trouble, A soldier now seldom comes before the magistrate, and is seldom locked up.

488. Are there fewer in the public-houses?—There are fewer in the public-houses in Devonport, certainly.

489. You

10 March 1882.]

Mr. LYNN.

Mr. Hanbury-Tracy.

489. You do not know how many are locked up in the guard-room?—Then they are kept in barracks, and they cannot get into the brothels.

Dr. Farquharson.

490. But might not a man in what might be called a minor state of intoxication, in which case he would not come under your cognizance, be more likely to go with a woman than if he were in a more advanced state of intoxication?—I dare say they do go to brothels.

491. There is no evidence, is there, that the improvement in the soldiers' condition has had any effect in lessening their tendency to going with women?—I have no evidence of it, except that I suppose a man who got drunk would be more likely to fall into the hands of a prostitute than a man who went home sober.

492. Patrols do not go into brothels, do they?—No.

493. Or into the public-houses?—They go into the public-houses regularly.

494. So that if a man wishes to elude a patrol he can go to a brothel; and that is a great argument for his remaining there?—That I cannot say.

495. I think you denied entirely that Mr. Annis had had anything to do with shutting up houses?—Decidedly I do.

496. I ask that question because there is evidence here, at Question 3530, of Mr. Annis having been instrumental in shutting up a brothel in Stonehouse?—That is not in my jurisdiction.

497. Have you ever heard any complaints of the metropolitan police in Devonport acting harshly or unjustly towards the women?—I heard about it at first, but I never believed it.

498. Have you ever heard or seen any disorderly scenes going on in the neighbourhood of the examining-room in Devonport?—Not for many years; but I have had to send constables there on examination days.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

499. How long ago is that?—It must be quite five or six years ago, speaking from recollection.

Dr. Farquharson.

500. And you have no personal experience of anything of the kind?—No.

501. With regard to those women who have been falsely accused by the Contagious Diseases Acts' police of having been prostitutes, I think you said that there was no extraneous evidence beyond their own statements?—I did not say so.

502. I think you said that some women had told you that the police had accused them of being prostitutes?—I think it is the other way.

Sir Henry Wolff.

503. I understood you to say that you had heard on one or two occasions that women had been brought before the magistrates as prostitutes when they were not prostitutes?—No, that is not the meaning of what I said. Women who have been convicted as prostitutes, informed me that they were not on the register.

0.75.

Dr. Farquharson.

504. What, in your opinion, has been the result of the Acts in increasing or diminishing clandestine prostitution?—I cannot say what would have occurred if the Acts had not been in operation; but I believe there is more sly prostitution in Devonport now than there ever was.

505. Have you any actual means of finding out whether a woman is a registered prostitute or not?—I have none.

506. You have no register to refer to from which you can say whether she is a registered prostitute?—No; but taking Mr. Annis' returns of the registered prostitutes, and my own returns of those whom I know to be prostitutes, I should say that he considers those to be prostitutes that I consider to be prostitutes; and if he includes those that I call sly prostitutes, his return would be very much larger.

Colonel Digby.

507. Do the brothel keepers show any opposition to the entrance of your constables into their houses?—They have never done so.

508. Do your police often visit the brothels?—No, they never do, to my knowledge, unless something occurs to take them there; such as a disturbance, or a robbery, or for the purpose of tracing stolen property. That is what I meant when the Right honourable Gentleman asked me as to whether they only entered when something takes place on the part of the inhabitants of the house to call for their presence.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

509. There must be some extraneous call?—Yes.

Colonel Digby.

510. You say that the constables who are sent down to Devonport under the Contagious Diseases Acts are very good men; I should like to know in what way you consider them very good men; in what way have they shown their superiority?—I think they carry out their duties with a great deal of prudence. I never hear any complaint of them as to the way in which they carry them out. Of course, I have known the men personally, and there are many reasons why I say they are good men, and which I cannot exactly explain to the gentlemen here.

Sir Henry Wolff.

511. Are there any occasions upon which you have to act jointly with them?—I cannot remember any particular occasion, but I should be always very glad to give them information.

512. Supposing that it came to your knowledge that a woman was practising as a prostitute without being on the register, would you tell Mr. Annis of it?—I should not know anything about it.

513. You know that the women under these Acts are examined fortnightly; do you think that, supposing these Acts did not exist, women practising as prostitutes would voluntarily submit themselves to an examination?—Not at all; they would not be likely to. I do not know any power under which they could be examined.

514. They

10 March 1882.]

Mr. LYNN.

Sir Henry Wolf—continued.

514. They might go to a private Lock Hospital and subject themselves to an examination if they chose; do you think it is likely that they would do that if they were not obliged?—I cannot tell. I rather think the common prostitutes like the Act.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

515. You said that you would not be likely to know of the existence of those prostitutes to whom my friend referred?—I would know of their existence, but I should not know whether they were registered or not.

516. May I ask you from what sources of information you get the returns which you have put in; you do not go to these brothels yourself, do you?—No, not myself personally.

517. By what means do you arrive at the data which enable you to say that there are so many prostitutes in Devonport in a particular year?—I send a sergeant, an intelligent fellow, and he takes the name of every prostitute in every house. Then I have some knowledge of them, and in going over these names I sometimes say: "You have not got so-and-so"; or, "What is the reason that this woman is not in?" and he may tell me: "Oh, she has left"; or: "She has gone to Plymouth." They are checked by myself, and two inspectors, and a detective sergeant.

518. I think you a little misunderstood Inspector Annis. He did not say that he had actually taken proceedings against any of those houses that were closed; what he said was, that he, knowing the inmates, and what they were doing, was enabled to put pressure upon them, owing to which the houses were closed; so that indirectly he and the Acts which he administered were the cause of their being shut up. What observation have you to make upon that?—I am not aware of any having been shut up.

519. Do you mean that no brothels have been shut up at all in Devonport?—There have been some shut up from other causes, from the keepers dying or removing; but I have never heard of a brothel being shut up in Devonport from any outside cause.

520. You agree that there has been a diminution in the number of brothels and prostitutes, and also an improvement in the general morality of the town?—To some extent.

521. Do you consider that the Contagious Diseases Acts have had nothing whatever to do with that result?—I cannot say; I am not aware of anything. I do not know of anything that they have done.

522. It is a singular fact that, according to one of those returns which you have put in from the time of the Contagious Diseases Acts coming into operation there was a steady decrease in the number of brothels of all kinds in the borough of Devonport from 1862 to 1881. In 1866, which was the last year before the Act of 1866 came into operation, there were no less than 60; then they go down to 53, 50, 46, 47, 44, 41, and at last they come down to 11. It is a singular coincidence, to say the least of it, that from the time when the Acts came into operation, the number of brothels should decrease; how do you account for that?—I have accounted for it, I think, by the influence which Miss Weston's establishments have had on the sailors.

523. When was her establishment founded?—In 1876.

524. But this decrease begins from 1867?—Just so.

525. Here is the fact, and I am not asking you for any explanation of it; I am simply saying that it is a fact from your own figures that from 1866, the year before the Act came into operation, when the number of brothels in Devonport was 60, there has been a steady progressive decline until, in the year 1881, there were 11; therefore the decline in the number of brothels certainly is contemporaneous with the passing of the Contagious Diseases Act?—Not exactly. If you go back to my return for 1862 you will find that there were 49, and in 1863, 59; so that there is a rise of 10 in one year. They fluctuate; in 1864 there were 48, and in 1865, 52.

526. Then in 1866 there were 60?—The Contagious Diseases Act came into operation on the 1st of October 1866.

527. From that time there is a steady decrease in the number of brothels?—In 1867 there were just the same number of brothels as there were in 1865.

Sir Henry Wolf.

528. But then the numbers gradually decreased; in 1866 there were 60; in 1867, 53; in 1868, 50; in 1869, 46; in 1870, 47; in 1871, 44; and in 1872, 41, and that was four years before Miss Weston set up her establishment?—Many of those brothels were beerhouses and public-houses. I am not aware of any private brothel that was shut up.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

529. But do you not in any way connect that decrease, which you admit took place after the passing of the Contagious Diseases Acts with the operation of those Acts?—I do not in my own mind. I would if I could.

530. But still, of course, you admit the fact that it did follow upon the passing of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Yes.

531. You have to place all reports before the watch committee before you can obtain a summons, have you not?—Yes.

532. Have you indicted any brothel keeper in Devonport since the year, 1865?—No.

533. Do you know that there were brothels existing in the main streets of Devonport, such as Fore-street, St. Aubyn-street, Chapel-street, George-street, and so forth, and that they have all disappeared?—There never was a brothel in any of those streets to my knowledge unless it was a public-house or a beerhouse.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

534. You think that the establishment of what are called Sailors' Homes and recreation rooms prevent prostitution?—To a certain extent.

535. That is only an opinion; I suppose you have no ground for it?—I have some reason, because in former times seamen who were drunk went

10 March 1882.]

Mr. LYNN.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

went to those brothels, and now they are not found there.

536. But that would not interfere with their desire to consort with prostitutes?—They do not do it in Devonport.

537. Do you mean that those people who go to play at cards in these recreation rooms do not, as a rule, go after prostitutes?—I cannot say that at all; I only know that it has the effect of keeping soldiers and sailors from the streets.

538. But you have no reason for believing that it keeps them from the prostitutes?—No; but one's common sense would lead one to believe that they are not so much in the way of temptation. Formerly soldiers and sailors used to be rolling about the streets half drunk, and we do not see that now.

539. I should have thought that common sense would have pointed out that if you have a number of young unmarried men, the fact of their having recreation rooms and being allowed to play cards would not the least in the world keep them away from prostitutes?—Perhaps it does not keep them away from prostitutes.

540. In your judgment, has the condition of the common women improved of late years in Devonport?—In cleanliness.

541. And in health?—Yes.

542. And that has been the effect of the Acts, has it not?—To a great extent, I think.

543. Therefore the Acts have had a very beneficial effect in that respect?—As far as that goes, I think the Acts, for what they were intended to do, have done a great deal of good.

544. Where you in the room when I addressed a question to the last witness about Mr. John Marshall?—I have been in the room all the time, and I heard your question.

545. He complains of the cruel, one sided, unjust, and tyrannical manner in which the laws were administered; have you, in your experience, seen instances of any such acts?—No; I have not.

546. You are able to state that positively?—Yes.

547. Mr. Marshall also states, at the end of this placard, which purports to be issued under the auspices of the National Association for the Repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts (and therefore one would imagine that the promoters of this association are responsible for it), "I have watched the operation of these Acts for more than 10 years, and I have rescued some hundreds of women from the tyranny and degradation of this fearful legislation." Are any of these hundreds of women to your knowledge people within the boundaries of your borough?—They are not. I do not think that the society selected a good man when they selected Mr. Marshall. I would not select him for that or for any other duty that required discretion.

Dr. Cameron.

548. So far as the sanitary aspect of the Contagious Diseases Acts are concerned, you are favourable to them?—Yes.

549. And you think that the contagious diseases' police have acted with great discretion and been good men?—I have always found them so.

550. Therefore you are anything but a preju-
o.75.

Dr. Cameron—continued.

diced witness against the constables who heve the working of the Acts?—I am not against them at all.

551. As I understand it, so far as their alleged effects in diminishing the number of brothels, in diminishing the number of prostitutes, in protecting young girls, in rescuing young prostitutes, and in bringing about an orderly state of the streets are concerned, you maintain that the Contagious Diseases Acts have nothing to do with the improvements that have taken place?—I cannot say as to the rescue of young prostitutes; I do not know what they have done in that respect, but as to the others I say that to my mind they have had no effect.

552. I enter into this, because the point was taken up, and I think it led to a little confusion in the minds of the Committee. So far as the number of brothels is concerned there has been a marked diminution from 1862 to 1881. You informed us, as I understood you, that that had taken place in two directions: first, as regards licensed houses, public-houses and beerhouses; and, secondly, as regards private brothels. So far as the public-houses and beerhouses are concerned, do you attribute the diminution, or rather the suppression, of brothels in those houses to the action of the local police, or of the police under the Contagious Diseases Acts?—To the action of local police entirely.

553. As to the diminution in the number of private brothels, do you attribute that chiefly to the demolitions and structural improvements which have taken place in the town?—And to certain other causes.

554. Do you inform the Committee that it is due to any extent to the direct action of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police?—I do not believe it is.

555. Can you see how it could be?—No.

556. Have they taken any proceedings against them?—Not in any one case.

557. Then as to the number of prostitutes, is it not a fact, as shown by one of your returns, that, although the number has been diminished, the number of convictions has been much greater during the last five years than it was before?—Yes.

558. Has the activity of the police been greater?—I do not know that there is any difference in the activity of the police.

559. Whilst admitting the diminution in the number of prostitutes, you have stated that a much larger number of convictions has taken place for offences other than offences against the Contagious Diseases Acts; do you attribute that greater number of convictions in recent years to the greater activity of the police in prosecuting people for such offences, or to the greater readiness manifested by the magistrates in convicting them?—We do not see each other's point, I think. The magistrates would convict those whom I brought before them only. The police have not been any more active than they were before. The police, I believe, were as active ten years ago as they were five years ago, and as active five years ago as they are now.

560. In that case does it not follow by exclusion, that the only reason for the greater number
c 3

10 March 1882.]

Mr. LYNN.

of convictions must be the greater disorderliness?—Certainly.

561. According to that then, the habits of the fewer number of prostitutes that there are at present in Devonport must be worse than they were formerly?—Their conduct has not improved in respect of getting drunk and making use of bad language. Their conduct has improved in some things; they do not stand about the streets as they used to, but in getting drunk and making use of bad language they are as bad as ever, and they must do that to get into our hands.

Mr. William Fowler.

562. You wish distinctly to state, as I understand, with regard to the decrease in the number of houses mentioned in the return, which was shown as a matter of time to have coincided with the existence of the Acts that, in your opinion, the diminution has merely followed the Acts, but has not been caused by the Acts?—I do.

563. There was something said with regard to the changes in the habits of soldiers, and their going to the Homes; if I understood your meaning it was this: that a soldier formerly having no place to go to but a public-house, used to go there and get drunk, and then he would go and consort with a prostitute, whereas he now goes to a Home, where he has innocent amusements without getting drunk, and he is not so likely to consort with a prostitute as he would be if he were half drunk?—That was my meaning.

564. And, therefore, the existence of Homes has had a powerful influence in diminishing prostitution?—I think so.

565. It comes to this: that there has been a diminution of drunkenness, and that that has caused a diminution of prostitution?—Yes.

566. The Right honourable Member wanted to point out to you that the mere fact that the man was not drunk did not prove that he would not go with a prostitute; but I understand you to argue that if he went to a Home and not to a public-house, he would be much less likely to come across a prostitute, and to get into temptation?—In the public-house he would be very likely to find a prostitute.

567. And he would get excited by drink also?—Yes.

568. I think you said that the Acts had done good for what they were intended. I suppose that so far as you know the Acts were intended for hygienic purposes, and your opinion is that they have done good in that respect?—Yes.

569. But you do not want to give any further opinion about them?—No, I cannot.

570. With regard to what you said about the improvement of the condition of women; do you think that that can in any way have arisen from their being better paid, and from their conducting their business in a more paying way, as it were, than they used to?—No, I do not think so.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.
Mr. Burt.
Dr. Cameron.
Dr. Farquharson.
Mr. William Fowler.

Mr. Hopwood.
Mr. Osborne Morgan.
Mr. O'Shaughnessy.
Mr. Stansfeld.
Sir Henry Wolff.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY, IN THE CHAIR.

Captain EDWARD BRUTTON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

571. YOU were, I think, a Captain in the 57th?—I was.

572. And you are now Superintendent of the Devon County Police?—I am.

573. How long have you held that appointment?—Ten years.

574. Where are your headquarters?—At Stonehouse.

575. And your jurisdiction comprises the town of East Stonehouse, and what besides?—It comprises the town of East Stonehouse, and the whole of the district outside Stonehouse, under the Contagious Diseases Acts, except Dartmouth.

576. And except, of course, the towns of Plymouth and Devonport?—Quite so.

577. You include the town of Stonehouse and all the rural places in the Devonport Contagious Diseases Acts district?—Exactly.

578. Have you read the evidence given before this Committee last year by Inspector Anniss?—I have.

Inspector Anniss, in speaking of the reduction of brothels in his district, between 1865 and 1880, attributes such reduction, does he not, to the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts, as carried out by himself and his subordinates?—He does.

580. Speaking for your own district of Stonehouse, do you agree with that statement of Inspector Anniss?—Certainly not.

581. Do you think that that statement of his is in any respect or degree accurate?—Quite the reverse.

582. Do you know of any single information against a brothel which has ever been laid by Inspector Anniss before the Stonehouse justices which has caused the closing of any such house?—No, I do not.

583. With regard to the closing of brothels, whether public-houses, beershops, or private brothels, since the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts, have all proceedings been exclusively instituted and carried out by the local police?—They have.

584. Your appointment, I think, dates from the end of 1872?—Yes.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

585. From what sources is your knowledge of the time previous to your appointment derived?—From the serjeant of the Stonehouse district, who was there at the time, and who is still in the force; and from the official records.

586. He was the serjeant who kept those records?—Yes.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

587. May I ask his name?—M^r Nallen.

Mr. Stansfeld.

588. Can you put in a return showing the number of brothels of all kinds in Stonehouse, and the number closed between 1865 and 1882?—I can. (The same was delivered in.)

589. Does that return apply to the town of Stonehouse?—It applies to the town of Stonehouse alone.

590. It includes beerhouses, coffee-houses, and public-houses, does it not?—Quite so.

591. Will you give us the numbers, with what explanatory remarks you may think necessary to elucidate the return?—In 1865 there were 31 brothels, 24 of which were beerhouses, three coffee-houses, and four private houses.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

592. When you speak of beerhouses, do you refer to beerhouses used as brothels?—I do. I might say that before 1869 the beerhouses were not licensed by the magistrates; some of them were licensed by the Revenue and some of them were private houses. In 1869, when the Beerhouse Act came in, 24 of those licenses were opposed. On those brothel keepers, who held licenses, coming up for their licenses, those licenses were opposed on the ground that they kept brothels. An adjournment was asked for by them to enable them to refute the evidence produced by the police. An adjournment was granted for a fortnight, and, on the expiration of the adjournment, some of those people came up for their licenses. The consequence was that the whole of those licenses were taken away; and, on their licenses being refused, 10 of those beerhouses, which were previously used as brothels, brothels, were closed at the same time. That would be from 1869 to 1870.

Mr. Stansfeld.

593. In the year 1868, according to your return, I find that the number of brothels was 31, of which 24 were beerhouses, two coffee-houses, and five private houses?—Quite so.

594. I now understand from you that, in the year 1869, the licenses of none of those 24 beerhouses were renewed; that 10 of those houses were altogether closed, and that 14 remained opened as private brothels, but ceased to be beerhouses?—That is so.

595. By whom were the proceedings taken which ended in those 24 licenses not being renewed?—By the police.

596. By what police?—By the Stonehouse police.

597. By your own county police?—Yes.

598. Had the Contagious Diseases Acts' police anything to do with those proceedings?—Nothing.

599. The result, as I understand upon the number of brothels is, that whereas in 1869 there were 31 brothels of all kinds, in 1870 there were 21?—There were.

600. And that reduction of 10 was brought about in this way; that 24 beerhouse licenses were not renewed, and 10 of those houses were absolutely shut up?—Yes. Possibly it may be as well that the Committee should understand, that previously to 1869, the beerhouses only got their licenses from the Inland Revenue; after 1869 they had to apply to the magistrates, and it was then that their licenses were refused.

Mr. William Fowler.

601. Under Ibbetson's Act?—Quite so.

Mr. Stansfeld.

602. That is the reason why that reduction of 24 licenses occurred in the year 1869, and not before?—Exactly.

603. As I understand from you, you had no power before then to refuse the licenses?—No power whatever.

604. After the year 1869 will you continue with any explanation of this return which you consider necessary?—In 1871 there was an increase of one brothel. A private house was opened, and one was closed.

605. With regard to the one that was closed, I see that opposite to that is "White Horse"; that sounds like the name of a public-house?—They still kept, and were known by the same names as they had before their licenses were taken away.

606. And that would apply, would it, to the year 1872, when I see the "Sportsman's Arms" was closed?—Yes.

607. And the year 1874, when the "Newcastle" and the "Crown and Anchor" were closed?—Yes.

608. All those in the meantime since 1869 have become private brothels?—Yes.

609. In 1876 two were opened, the "White Lion" and the "Freemasons' Arms"; those were licensed houses, were they not?—Those were licensed houses.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

610. What happened to the "Freemasons' Arms"?—That was closed. I should say that in 1876 or in 1877 those two licensed houses, the "Freemasons' Arms" and the "White Lion" had their licenses; but we could not state, as fact, that they were brothels before then; but the police knew about that time that they were used as brothels.

611. Then the phrase "two opened" means that they were then discovered by the police to be used as brothels?—Exactly.

612. Then the license of the "Freemasons' Arms" was taken away?—Yes, in 1877, by the information laid by myself, that in one case the publican had kept an unfortunate man drunk there for a week, and also that he had harboured prostitutes.

613. What happened in the year 1878?—In 1878 there were two closed, the "Globe" and the "White Lion."

614. The "White Lion" was discovered to be conducted partially as a brothel in the year 1876, but what about the "Globe"?—The "Globe" was a private house, and it was closed. The "Sportsman's Arms" was closed, because the landlord was convicted of selling liquor without a license. The "Freemasons' Arms" and the "White Lion" were licensed houses; the renewal of whose licenses was opposed by me in the case of the "Freemasons' Arms," as I have already stated, for harbouring a drunken man and also for harbouring prostitutes. The admiral wrote to me with reference to the landlady of the "Globe," who had a pension; and I made inquiries, and she was given to understand that if she continued that trade her pension would be stopped; and she closed her house.

615. What happened in the year 1881?—There were three houses closed. The vicar of the parish interested himself with reference to the landlady who kept the "Rose of England," and she gave up. She influenced her brother-in-law, who kept the other two, and he gave up.

616. There was no prosecution in those three cases?—There was not; but I should observe that I have no power to proceed against brothels; the only way that I can do it is, if two householders will indict them.

617. That is under the Act of George II.?—Yes. In 1882 there was a coffee-house closed by me. That was a licensed house, and I proved that it was the resort of prostitutes. The landlady was tried for that, and the next day she closed and went away.

618. The result is this, is it not; that, whereas in the year 1865 and down to the year 1869, the number of brothels in Stonehouse was 31, they were immediately reduced by 10 under the Beerhouse Act of 1869?—Quite so.

619. And in 1882 the number has come down to 14?—That is so.

620. Of those 14, are there 11 private houses and three coffee-houses?—There are.

621. I understand your evidence to be that none of these reductions were occasioned in any way or degree by the action of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police?—Certainly not. They have no power. They can only work under the Contagious Diseases Acts.

622. I see, according to your return, that you appear

17 March 1882.]

Captain BRUTTON.

appear during the whole of this period to have had a certain number of coffee-house brothels in Stonehouse?—There have always been three or four.

623. Stonehouse is a part of Inspector Anniss's Devonport district. Have you before you Captain Harris's return for March 1881?—I have.

624. Do you not find that, according to Captain Harris's return for Devonport, which I presume is within your knowledge, founded upon Inspector Anniss's returns, the column of brothels which are not public-houses, or beershops, or private houses, contains no figures?—There are no figures there.

625. According to Captain Harris's return, during the whole of that period there were no coffee-houses which were conducted as brothels in the whole of the Devonport district; your evidence to-day, I understand, is that, in the town of Stonehouse alone, during the whole of that period, there have always been two or three, or more, coffee-houses so conducted?—There have. At the present moment there are three.

626. Has the town of Stonehouse any bye-laws affecting the brothels and disorderly houses as Plymouth and Devonport have?—No, it has not; it is under a local board.

627. Stonehouse is not a corporate town?—No, it is not.

628. It follows from that, does it not, that the proceedings which you take against brothels, as they cannot be taken under bye-laws, so far as the brothels which are beerhouses or public-houses are concerned, must be taken, and are taken, under the Beerhouse or Licensing Acts?—So far as licensed houses are concerned; and the only way in which I can touch brothels is when I can detect them selling liquor without a license. That of course would be under the Licensing Act.

629. But am I correct in assuming that all the proceedings under the Beerhouse or Licensing Acts in Stonehouse have been taken by you, and not by the Contagious Diseases Acts' officers?—That is so.

630. And without any aid from the Contagious Diseases Acts' police?—With no aid at all.

631. Have you Inspector Anniss's evidence of last year before you?—I have.

632. Turning to Questions 3530 to 3536, do you find that Inspector Anniss, in the answers to those questions, speaks of a brothel as having been closed by him under the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I see he does.

633. What case was that?—That was in the case of the "White Lion" public-house, kept by Charles Turner.

634. Will you turn to Question 3535; what does Inspector Anniss say there?—He is asked, "How many of those brothels are beerhouses?" and his answer is: "We have none. The local police did their very utmost to convict this man. They tried to shut him up for years, but failed, and it was left for me to do, and after a long time done."

635. Is that statement, in your opinion, correct?—It is not.

636. Will you give us the facts with regard to that public-house called the "White Lion," kept 0.75.

by Charles Turner?—In 1876, Inspector Anniss laid an information against that house for resisting the metropolitan police. The landlord was fined 1*l.* and costs. This conviction was appealed against, on the ground that Inspector Anniss had no right in the house, and the conviction was quashed in the Queen's Bench Division.

637. That is the action of Inspector Anniss with regard to the "White Lion"?—Yes; then he laid an information against the same house in 1878, under the Contagious Diseases Acts, for harbouring a diseased prostitute. The man was convicted under the Contagious Diseases Acts, and fined 15*l.* and costs. He also laid another information, which was withdrawn, against the same house apparently on the same date.

638. Will you turn to Answer 3536; what does Inspector Anniss state there with regard to the consequences of that prosecution?—He is asked: "How did you get your information in that case?" and his answer is, "I had information from many sources, but got direct information from a man at the hospital with syphilis. He said that a certain woman had been the cause of it, and that he had slept in this house, and he gave the names of other men that slept there also. Some of our friends who were opposing us at that time thought to beat us, and sent this woman away. However, I found out where she was, and brought her back, sent her to the hospital, and convicted this man. We had cautioned him for years, but he would persist in carrying on his trade in defiance."

639. Will you tell us what proceedings you took against this house?—I laid an information in 1876 against the man for allowing his house to be a brothel. Upon that information the charge was dismissed. In 1877 I laid an information against this man for attempting to bribe a constable; in that I failed. In 1878 I summoned him upon three different charges; the first charge was for failing to admit the police; the second charge was for allowing his house to be a brothel, and again in another instance for allowing his house to be a brothel. He was convicted on one of these; and as that conviction made him lose his license under the Licensing Act, on his paying the costs I withdrew the other two informations.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

640. Was the conviction obtained by Mr. Anniss before this?—It was.

641. Would not that of itself have involved the loss of the license?—No, not under the Contagious Diseases Acts. The Act says that if you convict a man of keeping a house as a brothel, that of itself causes him to lose his license.

Mr. Stansfeld.

642. What happened to the house?—The magistrates granted the license on the application of the owner of the house to a fresh tenant; but it has never been used as a brothel since.

643. It has been in fresh hands?—It has.

644. Now let me compare for a moment your action and Inspector Anniss's action in the year 1878. I understand from you that Inspector Anniss laid an information in August 1878, and obtained a conviction under the Contagious Diseases

Captain BRUTTON.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

Diseases Acts against this man, Charles Turner, for harbouring a diseased prostitute?—Yes.

645. I think you said, in answer to the Judge Advocate General, that the penalty for harbouring a diseased prostitute was not the forfeiture of the license which could only take place under the Licensing Act, but was the infliction of a fine?—That is so.

646. In the same year I understand that you laid an information against the man not for harbouring a diseased prostitute, but for harbouring prostitutes at all?—Quite so.

647. And the result of your proceeding was that the house passed into other hands and ceased to be a brothel?—Yes.

648. I think I may assume that you are not unfamiliar with the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I know them; I have read them.

649. You have just referred to that section of one of those Acts under which an information may be laid against a brothel keeper for harbouring a diseased prostitute; is there any other section in those Acts under which the Contagious Diseases Acts police can prosecute a brothel keeper?—None that I know of.

650. And the only consequence of such prosecution is the infliction of a penalty?—Quite so.

651. The house remains open?—Yes.

652. And as far as the powers in the Contagious Diseases Acts are concerned, the house will remain open, and the brothel keeper will remain unsubjected to a penalty if he takes care not to harbour prostitutes who are diseased?—Yes.

653. On the other hand, as I understand, your action under the Licensing Act is of a very different nature; you lay an information against the keeper of a public-house for conducting his house as a brothel, and if you obtain a conviction there is a forfeiture of the license?—That is so.

654. Can you give us a return of the number of convictions of persons under the Licensing Acts for harbouring prostitutes and allowing prostitutes, and allowing prostitution from 1865 to 1881?—I can. (The same was delivered in.)

655. Are there any particulars in that return year by year, upon which you would like to comment to the Committee?—From 1865 to 1881 there were 60 convictions under the Licensing Act for harbouring prostitutes and allowing prostitution. This return includes nine prosecutions against brothel keepers for selling liquor without a license.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

656. Also, of course, under the Licensing Act?—Quite so. The amount of the fines was 496 l.

Mr. Stansfeld.

657. I observe that in the year 1865 in the column for remarks you give the number of licensed houses at 127; those are public-houses?—Yes.

658. In the year 1870 you have put it at 97, and in the year 1881 at 94, that is to say, the number of those houses has considerably decreased?—Yes.

659. Has that reduction, to any extent, been brought about by the proceedings which are recorded here?—Unquestionably.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

660. And those proceedings which tended to reduce the number of licensed houses were instituted and conducted, I presume, by you and your staff?—By myself, and my staff.

661. Without any assistance from the Contagious Diseases Acts' police?—The Contagious Diseases Acts' police had nothing to do with it.

662. Can you put in a return of the number of persons convicted of all offences against the Licensing Acts in Stonehouse from 1865 to 1881?—Yes. (The same was delivered in.) This return shows the number of persons convicted, and the amount of fines for all offences under the Licensing Act from 1865 to 1881. The total number of convictions was 185, and the amount of fines was 544 l. 11 s.

663. In any of those cases did you receive any assistance from the Contagious Diseases Acts police?—None.

664. Am I right in assuming that the general effect of all those prosecutions recorded in the returns which you have laid before us has been to close ill-conducted houses which directly or indirectly afforded facilities for prostitution?—There is no question about it.

665. And you would expect as a natural consequence a diminution of prostitutes and of prostitution?—Yes.

666. In reference to the number of prostitutes in Stonehouse, Inspector Anniss laid a return before us, Return B, Appendix No. 12, of last year's proceedings; have you seen that return?—I have.

667. Does that return appear to you to be approximately correct?—So far as I know, it is.

668. Would you make any exception?—Speaking generally, I should say that there were many women in the district who act as prostitutes who are not on the register.

669. Then when you say that you regard that return as approximately correct it would be exclusive of what we have been accustomed to call clandestine prostitutes?—Quite so.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

670. Do you apply the same definition to a clandestine prostitute as another witness gave, that is to say, a woman who, if the Contagious Diseases Acts were strictly carried out, would be on the register, but who, as a matter of fact, was not there?—My definition of the difference between a clandestine prostitute and a prostitute by profession is that the one actually makes her living by prostitution, and the other works in the day time, and goes about with men in the evening.

Mr. Stansfeld.

671. I take it that the clandestine prostitutes to whom you refer as not being taken account of in respect of Inspector Anniss's figures are not women who live solely with one man?—No.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

672. Women who do not actually get their living by prostitution?—Quite so.

Dr. Farquharson.

673. Who do not get all their living by prostitution?—Just so. Ostensibly they are employed in shops and rag-stores, and as orange girls,

17 March 1882.]

Captain BRUTTON.

Mr. Farquharson—continued.

girls, and that kind of thing; ostensibly they have a calling.

Mr. Stansfeld.

674. We have heard of the improved condition of the streets in recent years in Plymouth and Stonehouse, and elsewhere; would you attribute that improved condition of the streets, so far as prostitutes are concerned, to the action of the Contagious Diseases Acts police?—I cannot, because by the returns I showed that the number of prostitutes convicted of different offences, except under the Contagious Diseases Acts, have not diminished since 1865, but rather increased up to a certain point.

675. Then the improvement in the streets you would attribute in the main to other causes?—Certainly.

676. Would you attribute it partially to the earlier closing of public-houses?—To a great extent.

677. Of course you would attribute it partially to the reduction of the number of public-houses and beershops used as brothels?—No doubt of it.

678. And to the prosecutions undertaken by yourself and your staff?—Yes.

679. And to the decisions of the magistrates upon those prosecutions in respect of charges against immoral women for solicitation and disorderly conduct?—Yes, particularly convictions of houses harbouring prostitutes.

680. It is to those causes, and not to the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts, that you would attribute the improvement of public order in the streets of Stonehouse?—Mainly. I do not by any means wish to say that the Acts do not do some good.

681. With reference to public order?—Yes.

682. What good do you think they do?—There is no doubt that they have a deterrent effect.

683. That is to say, that they induce certain women to practise their profession outside that district instead of in it; is that what you mean?—I know nothing to go upon to enable me to say that, and therefore I would rather not say so. If I was asked why? I have only my own opinion.

684. I only want to understand your view and not to put any gloss upon it. I understand that your view is that, to a certain extent, the women are in fear of the Contagious Diseases Act police, though the prosecutions are undertaken by you and not by the Contagious Diseases Act police, and that probably makes them a little more careful in their outward demeanour?—Certainly.

685. Can you give us a return showing the number of charges against prostitutes before the county magistrates, brought by your police?—Yes, return No. 4 shows the number of charges against prostitutes before the county magistrates at Stonehouse by the county police, under the following heads, from the year 1865 to 1881: Disorderly conduct (that is drunkenness), 956; Towns Police Acts (solicitation, &c.), 254; Vagrant Act (having no visible means of subsistence), 31; larceny, 79; and other offences (assaults and that kind of thing), 43. (The same was delivered in.)

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

686. Those are all proceedings I understand against prostitutes?—Those are all proceedings against prostitutes for all offences, except under the Contagious Diseases Acts.

687. What are the only proceedings that are possible against prostitutes under the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Simply informations for refusals to submit to the compulsory examinations.

688. Therefore, practically speaking, this is a record of all the charges against prostitutes?—Yes.

689. And those have all been undertaken by yourself and your staff, and without the assistance of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police?—Yes, wholly.

690. Have the cases of disorderly conduct and solicitation decreased or increased on the average of late years?—According to this return they have increased up to 1880, more or less.

691. I see that in 1881 there is a very considerable diminution?—Yes, that I can explain; they are about the same, I think.

692. On the whole you told us that public order had been better observed in the streets; therefore I assume that I must consider that the comparative increase of those cases must be taken as evidence of the activity of your police, rather than as evidence of increased disorder or solicitation?—No doubt of that. There are many causes.

693. Have you any special explanation that you desire to offer with respect to the great decrease in the number of cases in 1881?—In the years 1880 and 1881 there were nine public-houses that had "free-and-easies," as they are called, that is to say, singing-rooms set apart for men and women. When those houses used to be turned out at closing time the greatest disorder used to take place in the streets. At the annual licensing meeting I opposed the renewal of the whole of those licenses on the ground of those singing-rooms. I might say that previously to doing this I had cautioned those men, and I had summoned two of them for harbouring prostitutes; but I failed to get convictions, because I could not prove that the women were prostitutes; but when the annual licensing meeting took place I opposed the renewal of the whole of the licenses on account of the interference with public order. The magistrates refused to grant those licenses, and in five cases they appealed to the quarter sessions, and the licenses were renewed only on the distinct understanding that those singing-rooms should be closed, and ever since that the streets have been very different.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

694. The singing-rooms were closed, I suppose?—Those singing-rooms were closed, and they are closed now, and the consequence has been, that whereas in 1880 there were 110 cases, in 1881 there were only 66 cases.

Mr. Stansfeld.

695. Can you give us a return of the number of persons proceeded against by Inspector Anniss under the Contagious Diseases Acts during your period of office?—Yes. This is a return showing the number of persons proceeded against by

D 2

Inspector

17 March 1882.]

Captain BRUTTON.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

Inspector Annis, under the Contagious Diseases Acts, from 1872 to 1882. (The same was delivered in).

696. How many cases are there in all?—Nine.

697. Will you give the Committee the particulars of those cases; one case is the case of Charles Turner, is it not?—It is. The first was a charge brought against a brothel keeper for harbouring a diseased prostitute, and she was fined 10*l.* and costs in the year 1872. The second case was against a publican; there were apparently two informations, one against the publican, and one against his wife.

698. Were those successful?—Those were dismissed. Then No. 4 is an information against a brothel keeper for the same offence, and she got two months' hard labour; that was in the year 1874. Another brothel keeper for the same offence got four months' hard labour in the year 1875. In the year 1876 there was a conviction for resisting the metropolitan police, which was quashed on application to the Queen's Bench (that is Charles Turner's case); and, in the year 1878, there was another case against Charles Turner for harbouring diseased prostitutes, for which he was fined 15*l.* and costs. No. 8, which was against the same man, was withdrawn. No. 9 was a case of a brothel keeper who got two months' hard labour for harbouring a diseased prostitute.

699. Those are all the informations laid by Inspector Annis during the 10 years?—Those are all.

700. And with the exception of the case of Charles Turner, where the conviction originally obtained was quashed on appeal to the Queen's Bench, all those informations were against brothel keepers for harbouring diseased prostitutes?—Yes.

701. And the consequences of the conviction were not the shutting up of the brothel, but the fining of the brothel keeper?—Quite so.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

702. Do those convicted persons all carry on brothels now in the district?—I know that some do.

703. I should have thought that the effect of so very severe a sentence would have been to put a stop to the trade indirectly, if not directly?—No, it takes more than that to shut them up.

Mr. Hopwood.

704. The sentence of imprisonment would be for non-payment of the fine, would it not, in those two cases?—If I recollect aright the Act gives the power of imprisonment without the option of a fine. Geach's house is still open, and Warne's house is still open. In Geach's case one of my men knew that Inspector Annis's men were in search of this prostitute; he saw her go into a brothel with a man, and he gave him the information, and went in with him and showed him where she was.

705. Your officer did that?—Yes, that was in 1879.

Mr. Stansfeld.

706. Taking a review of your proceedings, and of Inspector Annis's proceedings, as recorded in these returns, am I correct in saying that, wherever a public-house or a beerhouse conducted as a brothel has been shut up, and the license refused, wherever persons have been fined for harbouring prostitutes and allowing prostitution, wherever persons have been convicted for any offences under the Licensing Acts, and wherever prostitutes have been charged and convicted of disorderly conduct or solicitation, or under the Vagrant Acts, or for larceny, or for any offences except the offence of not proceeding to examination, all those proceedings have been conducted by you and your staff without the aid of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police?—They have.

707. And, in your opinion, those are the proceedings which have tended to the reduction of the number of brothels and prostitutes, and to the promotion of public order in the streets?—No doubt.

708. Whereas, on the other hand, Inspector Annis's proceedings, with the exception of the case of Charles Turner, where the conviction that he obtained was quashed on the appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench, have been confined to the punishment of a fine inflicted on the brothel keepers, not for keeping brothels, but for harbouring diseased prostitutes?—Yes.

709. And it is within your knowledge, after having carefully read the Acts, that they contain no other powers under which any other information could have been laid by Inspector Annis?—None at all.

710. I will ask you a question or two about these "free-and-easies" to which you referred; you effected considerable moral good, you believe (and I am quite prepared to believe), by closing those "free-and-easies"?—There is no question about it.

711. By what kind of persons were they frequented?—By girls from 16 and upwards, and by soldiers, sailors, and civilians.

712. In what kind of number would those girls be present?—From 10 to 20 in each of those places, sometimes more.

713. And those girls would be, according to your definition of the term, generally clandestine prostitutes?—There is no question about it, because no respectable girl would be seen in those places; and, not only that, but those girls have, on many occasions, been taken up after they have been in those singing-rooms by the police, for disorderly conduct.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

714. Would they all be clandestine prostitutes; might there not be open prostitutes as well?—If there had been other prostitutes, I should have been able to proceed against them, but I failed in my proceedings because they were not prostitutes.

Mr. Stansfeld.

715. Under what Act would you have proceeded against them?—Under the Licensing Act. The defence was, that they were not prostitutes.

716. Then

17 March 1882.]

Captain BRUTTON.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

716. Then your proceeding would not have been against the girls themselves?—No, my argument is, that if they had been prostitutes, I should have had no difficulty in shutting up the houses; but as they were not prostitutes I failed, and it was only at the annual licensing meeting that I was able to shut them up.

717. I suppose that their behaviour, within your knowledge inside those "free-and-easies," and sometimes outside, was such as to leave no doubt of their character?—No question about it. It was proved in court not long ago, that on one occasion, after coming out of one of those houses, one of those persons who was alleged to be respectable, took up all her clothes in the middle of the street and danced.

718. Can you tell us anything of their conduct within those places of amusement?—Their behaviour with soldiers and sailors was, in the opinion of those who gave evidence at the time, what no prostitute would do in public.

719. I think you have told us already that one consequence of these proceedings of yours was a great reduction, in the year 1881 as compared with 1880, in the number of convictions of women for disorderly conduct?—In the year 1880. I think there were 110; and in 1881 there were 66.

720. In those cases was there an appeal to the Quarter Sessions?—There was; that is to say, in five of them.

721. In any of those cases was Inspector Anniss appealed to to give any information in his power as to whether the women present were women on the register, or not?—I can only speak from hearsay, from what I was told by the magistrates' clerk. On the occasion of the appeal to Quarter Sessions Inspector Anniss was asked by the clerk to the justices if he could furnish evidence as to the character of those women; particularly with reference to one house that was most notorious. His reply was, that he could prove nothing.

722. Was that the very house out of which the woman came and danced with her clothes up in the open street?—That is the house.

723. Then I may infer, I take it, from the evidence which you have just given us, that you would regard Inspector Anniss's estimate of 40 clandestine prostitutes as the number in the Devonport district as being, shall I say, an inaccurate or an absurd estimate?—You might very well say both, I think.

724. You have spoken of these "free-and-easies;" were there not also occasional balls got up?—Yes, when I first went there it was a very common thing to have what used to be called balls given at St. George's Hall, where tickets were 2s. 6d. for a lady and gentleman. Those places were the resort of prostitutes and clandestine prostitutes.

725. That is to say, of registered and unregistered prostitutes?—Quite so. We have known as many as 24 registered prostitutes to be present at those balls at one time.

726. What action have you taken with regard to those balls?—I have opposed the granting of those licenses on every possible occasion.

727. With what results?—The consequence is that the justices have refused to grant occasional licenses to those places, without there is a guarantee of their respectability. I might be asked why I did not proceed under the Licensing Act. I did on one occasion, and I was met by the solicitor who defended. I was called upon to prove that it was an habitual resort of prostitutes. That I could prove, but as these occasional licenses were not granted to the same individual, but each man has his own license, I failed in that, because, although it was the habitual resort of prostitutes, I could not prove that it was within the knowledge of this particular individual that it was. There was no defence whatever as to the character of the women.

727*. I presume, therefore, that you are not prepared to admit the truth of the statement of Inspector Anniss, in answer to Question 3240, that the local police would not interfere with immoral practices?—It is the very reverse. He says: "The police do not interfere inside a house unless they are called in. We must not expect too much, I am afraid, from the police. If there is noise or disorder, the police are called in, and they see what is going on inside of that house, and take action thereon."

728. You do not accept that as a correct interpretation of your functions, or of the way in which you have exercised them?—Certainly not.

729. And you say that your evidence to-day disproves the correctness of that statement?—The facts that I give the Committee and the convictions prove that.

730. Now would you turn to Question and Answer 4249, and tell us what Inspector Anniss there states?—He is asked: "With regard to the borough and metropolitan police, in what respects would you contend that the metropolitan police were for the purposes of carrying out these Acts, or for the purposes connected with these Acts, superior or likely to have or to be able to obtain better information upon the subject of the Acts?" And his answer is: "In the first place, we are entirely independent of all local influence."

731. In the first place, I will ask you whether you are independent of all local influence?—Yes.

732. You can give us, I take it, some other reason for your independence than the fact (which I should not doubt) that you would not choose to be subservient to such an influence?—My position is entirely independent of any local influence. I see that, in answer to another question, Inspector Anniss says, that we are under what they call a watch committee. I have no watch committee. All informations, all the summonses, all police proceedings, are initiated by myself, entirely independent of any one. I am responsible solely to the county authorities. The public possibly do not understand what the gentlemen here would understand. Innuendoes have been thrown out against the local police which are not justified; and I think you will allow that I am right in repudiating them.

733. Going back to the last subject that we discussed, viz., Inspector Anniss's opinion that the local police do not interfere with immoral practices; they do not go into a house unless they are called in in case of disorder?—We have no power to do so.

17 March 1882.

Captain BRUTTON.

Continued.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

734. But have you not at least as much power to enter houses as the Contagious Diseases Acts' police?—Of course we have.

735. In fact you have power to enter, which they have not?—Yes, under the Licensing Act.

736. Can you suggest any other influences which have tended to improve the order and morality of the town during recent years?—There is no doubt that, particularly in a garrison place like the three towns, the improvement in the condition of the soldiers and the sailors has been very considerable of late years, and I can speak of that from my own knowledge as a soldier. Not only have they canteens and libraries, and places of recreation, which they used not to have in former years, but also the sailors, particularly, have been benefited by the Sailors' Home, under Miss Weston. I know of my own knowledge that sailors, however drunk, in whatever state they are, are taken in there and cared for. There is also, as far as the soldiers are concerned, an institution called the Soldiers' Home in Stonehouse itself, of which I can speak from personal knowledge, and there it has done an immense deal of good, because it is fixed in a place which abounds in public-houses. They do all in their power to draw soldiers there; they have every kind of amusement; not only billiards and bagatelle, and all that kind of thing, but lectures of different sorts.

737. Speaking from your experience, first of all as a military man, and secondly as a superintendent of police, I understand you to say that, in your opinion, these improved conditions and influences must have had an effect in diminishing the amount of sexual vice amongst the men?—In my opinion it has, certainly.

738. I suppose you would agree with the old saying that idleness is the mother of mischief?—No doubt.

739. And that drunkenness is the mother of a good deal of mischief too?—There is no question that the more you can decrease drunkenness the better the condition of a town will be.

740. And the less sexual immorality you would expect to find?—I should.

741. We have had evidence before this Committee from Mr. Shaen and, amongst other subjects to which he referred, was a case of personation of a Contagious Diseases Acts' policeman at Stonehouse; I think it was a case where a Mrs. Holmes was molested by a person who assumed to be one of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police; can you confirm that evidence?—Yes, that came under my knowledge. I made a report on it to Superintendent Wakeford, the superintendent of the metropolitan police, and sent him up the whole of the papers; and, I have no doubt in my own mind, from the evidence produced, that it was a bona fide case of personation.

Mr. Canonius Benjamin.

742. Do you mean that she was molested by the police?—No, it was a case of personation.

Mr. Stansfeld.

743. My Right honourable friend seems to think that a case of personation is of the moment; but I presume you would hold it to be somewhat of an objection to the working of an Act of Parliament that it offered facilities for such cases of personation as this?—Every Act of Parliament does that.

744. Where the police are employed in their own clothes, you can hardly speak of there being facilities for personation; it is the fact, is it not, that the Contagious Diseases Acts' police are in plain clothes, and that makes personation possible?—Yes, it makes it possible.

Dr. Farquharson.

745. Have you ever heard any complaints as to the way in which the metropolitan police carry out their duties?—Never.

746. You have never heard of any instance of harshness?—Never any authenticated case of the kind.

747. Has any evidence come to your knowledge of disorder or indecent scenes round the examination rooms?—No, it is not in my district; but I should most likely have heard of it, and I have not heard of any.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

748. Referring back to Inspector Anniss's evidence, at Question 3240, he was asked: "Why were they not stopped by the police?" And his answer was: "The police do not interfere inside a house unless they are called in." You stated that that was inaccurate. I suppose, as a matter of fact, it would be true, would it not, to say that the police do not interfere unless there is some complaint as to the way in which the house is carried on?—They would certainly not go into any house.

749. They would not initiate proceedings, simply because they believed that a house was used as a disorderly house?—Are you talking of a public-house, or of a private house?

750. I am speaking of both. They would not go in in the case of a private house, of course?—Certainly not; we have no power. In the case of a public-house we should go there. If I received any information which led me to believe that immoral practices were being carried on, I should instruct my men to visit that house under the Licensing Act.

751. You make a distinction, therefore, between a public-house and a private house?—Yes, in a private house I have no power.

752. You spoke of eight private house brothels, and three other brothels being still carried on in Stonehouse; could you give me the names of them?—They are three coffee-houses.

753. You know them by name, I suppose?—Yes.

754. May I ask why those houses were not shut up as well as the others?—They have been proceeded against, but that does not of necessity cause them to be shut up.

755. Have you taken proceedings before the magistrates to shut them up?—One man has been convicted twice, that is under the Licensing Act, of course.

756. When you speak of three brothels, you mean three coffee-houses, or beerhouses, or places of that sort?—There are 14 brothels, 11 of which are private houses, and three are coffee-houses. They are still allowed to go on. Proceedings ceedings have been taken against two out of the three, if my recollection serves me, and in one case, I know of two convictions against one man.

Captain BRUTON.

757. But as a matter of fact those three are known to you as being still carried on as brothels?—Yes, I can give the names to the Committee, if necessary.

758. I want to be quite clear about an answer which was given to a question that I put as to the metropolitan police being independent of all local influence. I hope you do not for a moment suppose that I imagined that you could be under any local influence. How many men have you under you in Stonehouse altogether?—Altogether I have 39.

759. I suppose they are ordinary policemen, are they not?—Yes, they are picked men to a great extent.

760. Still they live in the town?—They change about.

761. But, as a matter of fact, I suppose they would be of the same class as the policemen in Birmingham or elsewhere?—One rule that we have is that we never, if it is possible, put a man where he has relations, or where he is likely to be mixed up with the people of the town.

762. But still of course they live there, and I suppose they would be very much like other policemen, would they not?—Yes.

763. Going back to these convictions of this man Turner in the year 1878; he was convicted twice, was he not, once under the Contagious Diseases Acts for harbouring a diseased prostitute (of course the conviction could only take that shape), and the second time under the Licensing Act for harbouring prostitutes?—Yes.

764. I suppose that the fact of his harbouring a diseased prostitute would of itself be a record that he had harboured prostitutes, so that the one conviction would pretty well involve the other?—To a certain extent it would.

765. You have been in the army; in the 57th Regiment, I think you said?—Yes.

766. And you have seen some service, I imagine?—Yes, in India, China, and New Zealand.

767. Will you give me your opinion generally of these Acts; you spoke, I think, of their having been indirectly the cause of a diminution of disorder in the town in consequence of their deterrent effects?—Yes.

768. That would be particularly the fact, I suppose, in the case of young girls who are not hardened to a life of prostitution?—That is my opinion.

769. The Acts would, therefore, in your opinion, help to deter some girls from entering upon the life at all?—No doubt of it. My opinion with regard to a garrison town is that these Acts are very good for checking the spread of venereal diseases, and that they also act as a deterrent to prostitution.

770. Your opinion is an exceedingly valuable one, both as an officer in the service and as a superintendent of police, so far, therefore, as your own personal opinion is concerned, you would be in favour of continuing the Acts, as I understand?—Certainly.

771. Have you had any experience of the treatment of these girls in hospital?—No, except from hearsay and from what I have read. The Lock Hospital is not in my district.
0.75.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

772. Have you any objection to state how far from what you have heard and read, the influences brought to bear upon these girls in hospital help to reclaim them?—I have been told that in the Lock Hospital girls are reclaimed.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

773. Would that be the Albert Hospital?—The Albert Hospital.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

774. In looking down the return that you have put in of the number of convictions of prostitutes, I notice one rather curious fact, and that is that a great increase in one year is usually followed by great decrease in the succeeding year; I suppose that you would account for that by the fact of greater vigilance having been exercised?—Not only that, but in some years there are more ships, and the garrison is larger.

775. But there is a sort of see-saw up-and-down; for instance, I find in one year 110, and in the next 66?—That was particularly explained.

776. But I think the same diminution from a very high rate to a very low rate occurs more than once, and I accounted for it in my own mind by the fact that your attention would naturally be drawn to the greater number of these offences, and that you made the police exercise greater vigilance?—Possibly complaints may have been made, and I have put on men in plain clothes, or something like that; and there may also have been a decrease in the garrison, or in the number of sailors.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

777. I understood you, in answer to my Right honourable friend, to say, that you are favourable to the Acts; have you any complaint to make of the manner in which the provisions of the Act are carried out by the police officers?—None whatever.

778. In answer to a question you said that on the whole they were very good men; do you confirm that opinion?—Certainly.

779. Were you in the room when the Committee sat on the last occasion, when I put some questions as to whether there were any cases against the police of undue interference with and molestation of women?—I was.

780. Do you confirm what was said by Mr. Wreford and Mr. Lynn, who said that there was no such case within their knowledge?—Within my knowledge there has been no case.

781. No case of interference with or molestation of a respectable woman?—None, within my knowledge.

782. You were also in the room when I put some questions concerning a certain Mr. John Marshall?—Yes.

783. Are you acquainted with Mr. John Marshall?—I know him.

784. Do you confirm what was said by those witnesses?—Well, I forget exactly what was said.

785. Mr. Marshall, at the end of a placard

Mr. Carendish Bentinck—continued.

(which I produced to the Committee), which purports to be issued under the auspices of the National Association for the Repeal of Contagious Diseases Acts, writes as follows: "I have watched the operation of these Acts for more than 10 years, and I have rescued some hundreds of women from the tyranny and degradation of this fearful legislation." I put to you the same question as I addressed to Mr. Lynn: Are any of these hundreds of women, to your knowledge, people within the boundaries of your district?—None.

Mr. William Fowler.

786. I think I understood you to say that, as regards clandestine prostitution, you did not think there was any decrease of that in the town at all?—My answer to that was that the figures given by Inspector Anniss were, in my opinion, quite absurd.

787. And you have no reason to suppose that there is any decrease in clandestine prostitution?—So far as I know, there is none.

788. You consider that there is a large amount of clandestine prostitution in the place?—I think so.

789. If that be so, I do not quite understand how that fits in with your idea that these Acts have had a deterrent effect on the women; if there is such a large amount of prostitution still going on, it does not look as though the system had had much effect?—It reduced the number of professional prostitutes, the registered prostitutes; but of course I can give no opinion as to the unregistered.

790. Except your general idea that unregistered prostitution continues on a greater scale?—That is so.

791. Therefore, the deterrent influence is apparently rather upon a special class of women and not upon the men, at any rate?—Certainly not.

792. So that as regards the general moral effect it is very limited in its character, if that be so?—Yes, if that is the case.

793. I do not know that it will be necessary to dwell upon it, but you repudiate all idea of any local influence being brought to bear upon you, which I quite understood; but there was an expression used last year in a question put to Mr. Anniss, I think, by the Right honourable Gentleman, the Judge Advocate General, to the effect that he supposed that the local police were more, or less liable to be "got at" by the inhabitants; that is Question 4250; I understand from your answer that you entirely repudiate any such idea?—Of course. They are not a bit more liable than Mr. Anniss's men.

794. In answer to Question 4107 of last year's evidence Mr. Anniss uses a very curious expression; he says: "I think certain people who are mixed up in the traffic would so hamper the local police that they would not be able to carry out their duties to the extent that we can;" I apprehend that you would repudiate that also?—Entirely.

Mr. Hopwood.

795. You have, you say, 39 men?—Yes.

796. You were asked whether they are ordinary police; as I understood you to say they are really picked men?—To a great extent.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

797. Men who have been for a considerable time past in the service?—Most of them.

798. And you have had them under your eye?—Yes.

799. And you have every confidence in them?—Every confidence.

800. Do I rightly understand that you change them about?—Yes, they are changed about.

801. You were asked whether they do not live in the town, and whether that is not a reason for supposing that they may be "got at;" does not that equally apply to the metropolitan police?—Of course it does.

802. They are liable to the same influences of friends that they may make, and, in fact, to corrupting influences generally to the same extent?—Yes, they are liable in the same way.

803. You were asked as to the conviction that Inspector Anniss speaks of against Turner for harbouring diseased prostitutes, and whether that would not be sufficient evidence to show that the house harboured prostitutes; is not the harbouring of prostitutes under the Licensing Acts a wider question than the harbouring of one woman?—You have got to prove habitual resort.

804. You have to give much more extended evidence to make out the case?—No doubt.

805. Therefore, that one case proved by Inspector Anniss, would not, as the Judge Advocate General seems to suppose, prove the case before the magistrates?—It would not be sufficient to prove a house to be a brothel.

806. As to your general approval of the Acts, I see that you confine it to two circumstances; viz., the checking of disease and the deterring of prostitution; the deterring you have explained to my honourable friend; as to checking disease, I suppose that if the disease could be checked by Lock hospital accommodation or by other means of bringing the surgeon to the women, one reason for maintaining the Acts, in your opinion, would be gone, would it not?—If you had any means of compulsion other than the Act.

807. Then I understand you to think that compulsion is necessary?—Yes.

808. I do not know whether you have studied that at all, or whether it is merely a passing opinion?—It is merely my passing opinion.

809. You were asked about the variation in the number of convictions which you have obtained, and it was rather suggested that your diligence was not continuous; but that you sometimes stirred to greater activity; do you admit that?—If you look at the return, I think you will find, that in one year, as the Judge Advocate General said, there was a decrease, and then a sudden increase in the next year; but, with the exception of that instance, I think you will find that up to the year 1880 there was, if not an increase, no decrease.

810. Then may I take it that you do apply the utmost diligence that you can to this question of securing order?—There is no question of it.

811. I see you say, with regard to the variation in regard to the number of convictions, that sometimes that has been accounted for by the number of ships that come in?—Of course the larger the garrison and the greater the number of

17 March 1882.]

Captain BRUTTON.

of ships the greater would be the amount of disorderly conduct.

812. There has been, in point of fact, has there not, a great improvement secured as regards the conduct of sailors by the alterations of the mode of payment?—I cannot speak with regard to sailors; I can only speak with regard to soldiers.

813. I thought, perhaps, you knew that the mode of paying off a ship had been altered, that instead of the men being landed with a sum of money at once, in the place, there are other means of deferring the payment?—No, I do not know that, except from what I have heard.

814. As to molestation, how are you likely to hear of a respectable woman being molested unless she complains?—I should not hear of it unless she complained.

815. If she made a charge of course you would hear of it?—Exactly; that would be the only way in which I should hear of it.

816. If she were followed by a man, and dodged up and down the street, that you would never hear of unless she complained?—Not unless she complained.

817. Would that be, in your judgment, such molestation as a respectable woman ought to be submitted to?—No, certainly not.

Mr. Stansfeld.

618. I do not know whether you followed the evidence which was given by Mr. Shaen last year?—No.

Mr. ALFRED WILLIAM COSSER, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

827. You are the Chief Constable of the Borough of Portsmouth?—I am.

828. What does the borough of Portsmouth include?—The towns of Portsmouth, Portsea, Landport, Southsea, and a number of other hamlets.

829. When were you appointed to the office that you now hold?—On the 7th of December 1880.

830. Were you previously on the staff of the police in Portsmouth?—I was.

831. Since what time?—Since 1863.

832. So that your official acquaintance with Portsmouth extends over upwards of 18 years?—It does.

833. To the whole period of the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Yes, and beyond that.

834. I may presume, may I not, that you are intimately acquainted with the state of prostitution at Portsmouth during that period?—Certainly.

835. Contrasting the year 1864, the year after you first joined the force, with the year 1881; would your evidence be to the effect that a great improvement had been brought about in Portsmouth?—Certainly; very great improvement. I am speaking generally, as well as of the order observed in the town.

836. I will classify those improvements, so as to bring out your evidence. Take first the number of brothels, including private houses, 0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

819. Have you the Report of the Committee of last year before you?—I have.

820. Will you turn to page 484; that is a return put in by Mr. Shaen, is it not?—Yes.

821. Will you read the heading of the return?—“Return by Mr. William Shaen, Chairman of the National Association for the Repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts, showing the Ages of Girls and Women registered and unregistered rescued in the Devonport District by the Agent of the Association, occasionally assisted by the London Society for the Rescue of Young Women and Children, from 29th July 1870, to October 1880.”

822. The agent of association is Mr. Marshall, of whom you have been speaking?—Yes.

823. The cases are classified, are they not, under the heads of registered and unregistered women?—They are.

824. The period in question is the 10 years from 1870 to 1880?—Yes.

825. And this is the summary. The number of registered women rescued by this agency in those 10 years is 171, and the number of unregistered women rescued is 173; is that so?—Yes.

826. I presume you are not prepared or disposed to question the accuracy of this return?—Certainly not.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

public-houses, and beerhouses; have they been reduced?—As regards beer and public-houses, the public-houses certainly, and houses of that class, the resorts of prostitutes.

837. To what causes do you attribute the reduction in the number of brothels, as far as public-houses and beerhouses are concerned?—Principally to the adoption of the Wine and Beer-house Act, 1869.

838. And to the action, I presume, of your police?—Yes, consequent upon the adoption of that Act; we had no power before.

839. I understand from you that, taking the period of your knowledge of Portsmouth from 1863 to the present year, you testify to great improvements which have been effected in various ways?—Certainly.

840. In the first place, I understand you that the number of brothels, including private brothels and public-houses and beerhouses, the resort of prostitutes, has been reduced?—Yes, most certainly, as regards public-houses and beerhouses. My knowledge is not so perfect with reference to private brothels.

841. So far as the beerhouses and public-houses, the resorts of prostitutes, are concerned, their number has been largely reduced?—Undoubtedly.

842. Has there been also a reduction in the number of prostitutes?—I should say that there has been a very large reduction.

843. Is there now better behaviour on the part

part of such women in the public streets?—Far better.

844. We will take first the case of the reduction in the number of brothels; to whom, or to what do you credit this improvement?—As regards licensed houses and public-houses, to the action of the local police, taken subsequently to the passing of the Wine and Beerhouse Act.

845. I understand that, as far as beerhouses are concerned, your power of dealing with them was increased by the Beerhouse Act, 1869?—We had very little power before. They can be deprived of their licenses now.

846. In 1869 it became a magistrates' license?—That is so.

847. Therefore, in 1869, for the first time you had the power of appealing to the magistrates not to grant or to renew such a license?—Exactly.

848. But with regard to public-houses not beerhouses, those I take it have been dealt with under the Licensing Act?—They have.

849. The Licensing Act existed before 1869, as well as since?—There was the old Alehouse Act of George IV.

850. Licensed houses, as distinguished from beerhouses, have been dealt with, of course, by the police under successive Licensing Acts?—They have.

851. How have private brothels been dealt with?—When prosecuted they have been prosecuted by the local police upon the action of two informers.

852. Under the Act of George III.?—That is so.

853. Have any considerable number been practically disposed of and cleared away by public local improvements?—Yes, a large number.

854. Now I will come to beerhouses that are brothels. Before 1869, were there a considerable number of those beerhouses which were used as brothels?—There were.

855. And which afforded special facilities and inducements for prostitution?—Certainly.

856. When did the principal reduction in the number of such houses take place?—In the year 1869, at the licensing session of that year.

857. That is to say, immediately after the passing of the Beerhouse Act of 1869?—Yes.

858. Upon whose initiative did those proceedings take place?—Upon the initiative of the then head constable of the local police.

859. Then, subsequently to the year 1869, were there any cases dealt with under the Licensing Acts in 1872 to 1874?—There were. I recollect two such cases of public-houses in 1871; one in the Grand Parade, in Portsmouth, and the other in Warblington-street, in Portsmouth.

860. Were those licenses refused?—They were refused.

861. With regard to beerhouses, you produced a considerable and immediate effect, as I understand, in 1869; can you give us the exact number?—In 1869 the number was returned as 617, and as 567 in 1870, being a diminution of 50.

862. I suppose all those 50 were not beer-

houses used as brothels?—Not all; but the majority of them were.

863. And they lost their licenses in consequence?—They did.

864. And all the work, as I understand you, connected with the refusal of those licenses and the closing of the houses was done by the local police, without any assistance from the Contagious Diseases Acts police?—Certainly.

865. Have you now any beerhouses of that class, that is to say which are used as brothels?—Not one to my knowledge.

866. Take the case of public-house brothels now as distinguished from beerhouse brothels, have licenses in like manner upon the reports of your police been refused by the magistrates?—They have.

867. You gave us, I think, two cases; one a public-house in Warblington-street, and the other on the Grand Parade in Portsmouth?—Yes.

868. Those licenses were refused in the year 1871?—Yes; both of them.

869. Have you any public-houses which are used as brothels in the borough now?—Not one to my knowledge.

870. Since when have you had none; have you had any since 1876?—No; I think not.

871. So that this result has been brought about, if I understand you correctly; that at present there are no public-houses or beerhouses used as brothels in Portsmouth at all?—That is so.

872. And that entire elimination of that class of brothels, you say, is due to the vigilance and activity of the local police?—Certainly.

873. What, in your opinion, has been the general result of the operation of the Beerhouse Act, and of the Licensing Acts under the administration of your department in respect of prostitution as carried on in connection with public-houses and beerhouses?—I should say that it has nearly or entirely ceased. The owners are much more careful in selecting their tenants.

874. The operation has been to make the owners of public-houses and beerhouses more careful, because they know that they allow their places to be conducted as brothels, under the penalty of losing their licenses?—Yes; and the tenants are also far more careful than they were formerly.

875. They know, I presume, from experience, that you would at once take action in any such case, and that probably the result would be, first of all the conviction, and then the necessary forfeiture of the license?—Certainly; if not, the tenant would be removed for a trifling offence only.

876. What is the legal consequence of convicting a public-house keeper or a beerhouse keeper, of harbouring prostitutes?—Harbouring prostitutes is a serious offence, and the immediate result would be a change of tenant, if nothing more.

877. Not the forfeiture of the license?—Not unless the house was used as a brothel. Then the forfeiture follows as a matter of course, under the 15th section of the Licensing Act, 1872.

878. Then the moment you prove to the satisfaction of the magistrates that the public-house or beerhouse has been used as a brothel, the license is, ipso facto, forfeited?—Certainly; to the person, and probably to the house. That would be dependent upon the action of the magistrates.

879. Evidence of prostitution on the premises would be evidence of the user of the house as a brothel?—It would.

880. And it would be followed by these consequences?—It would.

881. Can you give us a return of the number of public-house and beerhouse keepers convicted under the Licensing Acts for all offences during your experience of Portsmouth?—I can (The same was handed in.)

882. Will you read to the Committee such of the figures as you think call for special remark?—I should like to refer to the convictions in 1867 in confirmation of the statement that I have made with reference to the greater care now shown in selecting tenants, and in the conduct of these houses since the passing of the Licensing Act or Beerhouse Act, 1869. In the year 1867 the number of houses are stated to have been 892 and the convictions 106; in the following year the number of houses was 897 and the number of convictions was 94; in 1869 the number of houses was 949 and the number of convictions was 58; and in 1870 the number of houses was 899 and the number of convictions was 48.

883. And there are 50 houses which you told us have been closed under the Beerhouse Act, 1869?—Yes; in 1871 there are still fewer convictions, and so we go on; so that, taking the present year by comparison, we have a larger number of houses but fewer convictions, the number of houses being 957 and the number of convictions being only 30. I think that will be found to be the highest number, with one exception, for 10 years as regards convictions.

884. I see from one of these columns that the number of public-houses since 1868 has remained practically stationary?—It has.

885. The number of beerhouses has varied, but on the whole has increased?—That is so.

886. But are not some of those beerhouses houses with simply off licenses?—They are. The increase is to be attributed principally to that fact.

887. Then the off licenses have increased of late years?—They have; they increase every year. Unfortunately the magistrates have no option to refuse them. So long as certain conditions are complied with, the magistrates have no option.

888. Therefore, those licensed beerhouses increase; otherwise the number of public-houses and beerhouses seems to remain almost stationary, but the broad fact most pertinent to our inquiry is that none of those houses are any longer conducted as brothels?—That is so.

889. Now let us come to private brothels, which are neither public-houses nor beerhouses. Are you aware that, according to Captain Harris's return of March 1881, page 20, if you take Portsmouth, which includes Gosport, a very considerable reduction took place in the private brothels in 1867, and that they were reduced apparently from 169 in 1866 to 130?—My attention has certainly been drawn to that statement.

890. Have you any opinion to express upon 0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

those figures?—I am quite unable to account for it.

891. The totals in Captain Harris's column are not the totals that I refer to; they include public-house and beerhouse brothels, and I propose to exclude them, and excluding them there is a large reduction between those two years 1866 and 1867; I understand you to say that you cannot account for those figures?—I certainly cannot.

892. And you are not prepared to accept the accuracy of that proposed reduction?—Decidedly not.

893. At any rate it is within your knowledge of those figures that they were very shortly reversed, and amounted again to as high a figure as 169, or more?—Higher.

894. They increased, did they not, until the year 1870 when the number was 182?—They did.

895. Did they remain almost stationary for two years?—Apparently so.

896. And then they dropped between 1873 and 1875?—It would appear so.

897. There is a drop which is noticeable between 1873 and 1875, a drop from 182 to 141; do those figures appear to you to be accurate?—I should think so.

898. Can you give us any explanation of the cause of that sudden reduction in the number of private brothels?—I attribute it principally to the demolition of the ramparts, and to the improvement of a part of Portsmouth called Prospect-row, which consisted principally of brothels and low beerhouses.

899. Would you explain to the Committee what you mean by the demolition of the ramparts?—Formerly the towns of Portsmouth and Portsea were separated from the other towns by ramparts and moats. Those ramparts were very largely used for immoral purposes; for prostitution, I am certain for one thing, and I have no doubt for seduction also. Many persons would go there who would not think of entering a brothel. About 15 years ago the work of this demolition was taken in hand, and now it is very nearly completed, in fact, entirely so, with the exception of about one-half of Governor's-green, at Portsmouth. I think that has had a great effect in checking prostitution generally; at all events, the road by Prospect-row has been quite altered; instead of a low narrow place as it used to be with nothing but brothels as tenements, or nearly so, we have a different class of buildings springing up and large wide roads and trees planted down them.

900. A double consequence has followed from the demolition of the ramparts: first of all, the opportunities for outdoor prostitution have been diminished; and secondly, if I understand you aright, the localities have been generally improved, and a superior class of shops and houses have been built, and the lowest houses, including a great many brothels, have disappeared?—That is so. I may mention another place which is improved, although the improvement is not quite to be attributed to the same cause, where I think at least 30 houses are now untenanted, which were formerly occupied principally by brothel-keepers and prostitutes; and there, as well as in many other places, have wide roads been made.

901. Where

17 March 1882.]

Mr. COSSER.

Sir Henry Wolff.

901. Where is that?—Military-row, Portsea, at the back of Queen-street. There are other courts somewhat the same, although not perhaps to the same extent, in fact the court property is giving way to a better class of property, and the people are getting out of the courts, generally, I may say.

Mr. Stansfeld.

902. Of later years has the number of these private brothels at all tended to increase?—I think not.

903. I see from Captain Harris's return that they have remained practically stationary since 1876; in 1876 they were 133, and now they are 135?—I think that for December last they are only 132, including Gosport; that would leave about 120 only for Portsmouth.

Sir Henry Wolff.

904. Is Gosport under you?—No, it is quite separate.

Mr. Stansfeld.

905. You have undertaken, have you not, the prosecution of certain private brothel-keepers?—I have.

906. That was under the Act of George III.?—Yes.

907. Can you refer us to any cases?—I have taken action against four brothels in King William-place, Portsmouth; the keepers of those brothels were indicted at the Quarter Sessions, and the brothels discontinued, and they were bound over in the sum of 100*l.* in the usual way to discontinue it, and for 12 months to be of good behaviour generally. Since then I have instituted proceedings against two other brothels in Church Path North, with like result.

908. By those proceedings you have succeeded in closing six brothels?—That is so; and I have also closed one other without taking legal proceedings, by sending to the owner of the property. That is in respect of No. 55, Creswell-street, in close proximity to a mission chapel, complaints having been made respecting the house. I knew the owner, and he remedied it on my representation.

909. It was not necessary in that case to prosecute; he yielded to your representation, and probably to the knowledge that you would prosecute in case of need?—That is so.

910. In those cases have you received any assistance from the Contagious Diseases Acts police?—The Contagious Diseases Acts police were simply called as witnesses to prove that those houses were brothels.

911. You called them?—Yes, as the prosecutor.

912. But the initiative, as I understand, was yours?—The initiative rested with two common informers, and I took action upon their information.

913. Of course you have had other prosecutions for offences against the Licensing Acts, and so on; have other houses been closed indirectly in consequence of those other prosecutions?—They have; in one instance a very notorious house has been closed, No. 19, Spring-street,

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

Landport. There the brothel keeper and his wife were both proceeded against for larcenies.

914. And, in consequence, the brothel was closed?—That is so.

915. I think you referred to a house in Creswell-street that was closed in consequence of the pressure of your advice?—It was.

916. Could you refer us to any case where a house has been closed in consequence of a prosecution for selling liquor without a license?—I can. It is the case of a house in Bow-street, which was formerly kept by Jemima Francis, which was closed for a time. It had been a very notorious house for many years for illegally selling liquor. I secured three offences against the woman Francis, and to evade service of summons she had her furniture removed and absconded; but I found her, and she was sentenced to six weeks in default of paying fines. Of course she was turned out of the premises, and they were handed over to the tenancy of another person. I am not in a position to say that the house is not now, to some extent, used as a brothel, but not to the same extent, certainly.

917. Can you give the Committee a return showing the convictions against brothel keepers from 1872 to 1881, for illegally selling liquor?—I can. (The same was delivered in.)

918. Have you any special remarks to make as to that?—Not upon the figures.

919. I see that the number of convictions was largest in the year 1872, when there were 10 convictions?—Yes, the penalties at that time were not so high as they are at present, and therefore the deterrent effect was not so great.

920. I understand that since 1872 brothel keepers have been more careful?—Very much more so; it is very difficult to detect, and we are hedged round with restrictions which I think ought not to exist with respect to brothels.

921. You are under certain difficulty in dealing with brothels?—The detection of these offences is extremely difficult.

922. What would you suggest?—I would suggest that we should have the same power of visiting those brothels without search warrants that we now possess with them.

923. Do the Contagious Diseases Acts police possess that power which you have not?—Certainly not.

924. Therefore, in that respect, you are upon the same footing?—Yes.

925. All the prosecutions to which you have been referring, I assume from your previous residence, were conducted by the local police, independently of the Contagious Diseases Act police?—They were all conducted by the local police, certainly independently of the other police; but we received some assistance with respect to the case of Jemima Francis, which I detailed. In that instance one of the constables rendered us valuable assistance.

926. That was in 1881?—Yes, and I believe he was awarded the sum of 10*s.* by way of reward by the Commissioners of Police upon my representation.

Sir Henry Wolff.

927. That was the only case in 1881?—Yes, that was the only one that I am aware of.

928. As

17 March 1882.]

Mr. COSSER.

[Continued.]

Mr. Stansfeld.

928. As to the reduction in the number of prostitutes of which you have spoken, you say that the number has diminished, do you not?—I do.

929. To what do you attribute that improvement?—Principally to the operation of the several successive Licensing Acts, to prosecutions by the police, and to greater vigilance on the part of the police than there was formerly, and the advance, if I may say so, of civilisation. People set their faces more against this sort of thing than they used formerly to do.

930. The reduction of brothels would be a cause of reduction in the number of places of immoral resort. You have referred to the effect of the demolition of the ramparts, and of those improvements?—Yes.

930*. Would you attribute any improvement in this respect to the earlier closing of public-houses?—Certainly, I do. People come out of public-houses and beerhouse now, and go to their homes in time to get a night's rest. Formerly they were about all night.

931. Is that under the Act of 1872?—It is.

932. And you think that that early closing of public-houses has had a considerable effect in diminishing the amount of sexual vice?—Decidedly.

933. Then, I presume, your police have, as in other towns, taken measures to secure decency and order in the streets, and from time to time prosecuted prostitutes for improper conduct in the streets?—They have.

934. And that you have done with vigilance?—We have.

935. And you think with good effect?—I am sure of it.

936. You think that first of all the effect has been to promote order in the streets?—Yes, it has.

937. Do you think that those operations of yours have had any effect upon the number of prostitutes?—I think so.

938. We have heard, in evidence before this Committee, of the good offices of the Contagious Diseases Acts' policemen in warning very young girls away from a life of vice; are those good offices, in your experience, confined to those police?—Certainly not; I frequently do that sort of thing myself.

939. And your men, I presume?—Certainly.

940. In fact, would you not say that it would hardly be consistent with the ordinary kindness of human nature for a respectable policeman seeing the evident danger of a mere child, not to endeavour to restrain her from that which would be her ruin?—I should consider it his bounden duty.

941. And you think he would take that course?—I think so, certainly.

942. Have you known your constables to take that course?—I have in many instances; it is the common practice.

943. In what way, when they have made these discoveries, have they endeavoured to save those children?—I am speaking of children that we do not know to have gone wrong, or to have commenced a career of vice, but whom we have kept from falling.

944. My question is, what steps have been taken on observing the danger of those children to preserve them from it?—They have invariably brought them to the divisional stations and reported the matter, and it has generally come to myself, through one of the inspectors, and the children or young girls have been handed over to a home, in most instances to the Home of Mrs. Colebrook at Southsea.

945. Therefore those young girls have been saved from the danger of falling into a life of prostitution by the action of your men and by the assistance of homes established by private and charitable persons?—They have.

946. Can you give us any illustrative cases of this course of action on the part of yourself and your constables?—I could mention a few cases. In the first instance, I have the name here of Emma Norris, aged 12, who absconded from her home near Southampton. She came to Portsmouth, as she alleged, to see friends, but had none there. Of course the child was in danger and she was handed over to the home.

947. This child of 12 years of age, I suppose, from what you say, was seen in company which was evidently dangerous?—The fact of her being alone in the streets would, in my opinion, be dangerous to a child of that kind.

948. She was seen by your men; what became of her?—She was handed over to Mrs. Colebrook and ultimately returned to her friends. I communicated with the friends myself.

949. Will you give us some other cases?—There is another case, a young girl, aged 18, named Florence Pavey; she was passed through us to the Home, and subsequently to Weymouth. The third case that I have is Jane Ballantine, aged 12 years. She was was a most remarkable girl; she measured 5 feet 2½ inches in height, and she was the finest girl that I ever saw of her age.

950. How did you ascertain her age?—By asking her.

951. What happened to her?—She was also sent to the Home and retained there for a length of time, and, in fact, Mrs. Colebrook could not get rid of her, and I had to write to the chief constable of Edinburgh to communicate with her father, who was an attendant in an asylum, and he came from Scotland upon my representation and fetched her away.

952. Have you any other cases?—I have the name of Christina M. Gray, aged 23; I am not so conversant with her case.

953. Was she also sent to the Home?—She was. Another case is that of Alice Mitchell, aged 19 years. This girl I remember very well indeed; she was found in a very deplorable condition on Southsea Common; she was without a portion of her clothing, and what she had was saturated with wet; it was a most boisterous night. Her statement was that the wind had blown her into the sea. She was taken to the Southsea Station and brought thence to the Central Station, where I saw her and questioned her. She was removed to the Home, and subsequently her friends were communicated with in London, and she was returned to them. There are a number of other cases; but they are so common that I have not enumerated them; it is a question of common humanity.

17 March 1882.]

Mr. COSSER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

to enable you to form that opinion?—Yes, from my own observations and reports from my officers.

979. Do you happen to have with you a report of that institution?—I have the report for 1881.

980. What does that give you as the number of home boarders for the year?—During the year ending July 1881. there have been lodged at the home 2,530 boarders; 7,091 casual meals have been supplied; 20,553 casual beds have been occupied; 37 distressed seamen have been relieved, and 41 distressed seamen have been lodged.

981. Then I will take you to another institution, the Soldiers' Institute in High-street, Portsmouth; when was that established?—In 1874.

982. How many beds have they?—Sixty.

983. By whom is that institution used?—By soldiers and seamen.

984. Is that Miss Robinson's?—It is.

985. Is that also used by the families of soldiers and seamen?—It is.

986. Do you know the total number accommodated in that institution in the year 1881?—Six thousand eight hundred and forty-three.

987. Therefore they were accommodated for a very short time?—That would be so.

988. Have you the report for 1881?—Yes, I have the report; but there is nothing very important in it.

989. Take the Sailors' Welcome, in Queen-street, Portsea; whose is that?—That is also Miss Robinson's.

990. When was that established?—In 1879, but it was transferred to its present position in 1880.

991. How many beds are there there?—One hundred and fifty-three.

992. What was the number of lodgers accommodated in 1881?—Twenty-three thousand six hundred and eighty-two.

993. Do you wish to refer to that report at all?—No.

994. Is there not a home of Her Serene Highness the Princess Edward of Saxe Weimar?—That is in Oyster-street, Portsmouth; there are several cottages.

995. How many beds are there there?—Twenty-two.

996. Are there large day-rooms?—Yes.

997. Open to whom?—Open to wives, widows, and orphans of soldiers passing through, to or from, foreign stations or service.

998. Is there not a place called the Sailors' Welcome, in Commercial Road, Landport?—Yes.

999. Whose is that?—Miss Weston's.

1000. How many beds are there there?—There will be 50; but the place is not completed. It is a very large building.

1001. Is there accommodation for recreation of an innocent character?—All kinds of amusements of an innocent character.

1002. When soldiers go away on furlough is there any change within your knowledge in the circumstances of their leaving, compared with former periods?—Yes, in the case of soldiers and sailors also, I might say.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

1003. What is the change?—They pass to the railway stations and go right away, instead of loitering about the town as they formerly did.

1004. Do they go under escort?—They have some one to go and see them away.

1005. Are you familiar with the conditions under which they receive their pay?—No, I am not able to speak upon that; I have heard of it, but I have no practical knowledge of it.

1006. Has it come under your observation that disorderly scenes have occurred near the examination room in Portsmouth?—I may say that, within three months I have had an application from one of the committee for a constable to drive away youths from that locality on examination days.

1007. Do you mean boys?—Boys and youths who assembled to watch the women go in and out, and pass rude observations upon them as they come out.

1008. And who, therefore, behaved themselves in a disorderly manner?—That is so.

1009. You have placed a constable there who, I presume, has stopped that disorderly conduct?—I have, and he has stopped it.

Dr. Farquharson.

1010. I think you said that the Local Police Act in suppressing brothels on the information of two common informers; who are those persons generally?—Neighbours, generally.

1011. Who puts them in operation?—They start it themselves, with a desire to remove what they consider to be a common nuisance.

1012. Do they get their information from the Contagious Diseases Acts, policemen, occasionally?—No, they reside, as a rule, close to these brothels.

1013. But Mr. Wreford, in his evidence, in answer to the Judge Advocate General, admitted that Mr. Anniss and his machinery set these men in operation. He is asked at Question 98: "Would this be the course taken: that he set the board of guardians in motion; that they set the householders in motion; and that the householders took the proceedings?" (A.) I think that is very probable?—It is not so in Portsmouth, certainly; quite the contrary. I have been compelled to prosecute, because the overseers declined to do so. I was bound under a penalty to do it.

1014. I observe that there is a very great reduction in the number of brothels between the year 1865 and the year 1869; I think the Beer House Act only came into operation in 1869; to what do you attribute the great reduction in the number of brothels between 1865 and 1869?—I am unable to attribute that satisfactorily to any cause.

1015. But that is coincident with the establishment of the Contagious Diseases Act?—Yes.

1016. You acknowledge the coincidence?—I do; but I am not able to explain it.

1017. Then you do not admit that that reduction of numbers has any connection with the establishment of those Acts?—I do not either admit or deny it; I cannot explain the cause.

1018. But you admit the coincident?—Yes, certainly.

Mr. COSSER.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

1019. The Right honourable gentleman the Member for Halifax asked you if the early closing of public-houses diminished the amount of sexual vice; in what way are you able to prove the diminution of sexual vice?—Those that used to frequent at late hours, or in the early hours of the morning, public-houses, or beerhouses, were of the low class. Wherever they were prostitutes used to congregate; they used in my opinion to watch for them.

1020. That is to say, they do not continue their sexual vice in the same locality; but you cannot prove that they have not gone somewhere else to carry it out?—No, I cannot prove it.

1021. Therefore you cannot prove that there is any actual diminution in the amount of sexual vice in consequence of the early closing of public-houses?—I gave it as my opinion.

1022. Have you any actual knowledge that the soldiers frequent brothels less frequently than they did formerly?—I believe they do, but I cannot prove it.

1023. Is it only your opinion?—That is all.

1024. But you are of opinion that the increased facilities for amusement that the soldiers now possess diminish prostitution?—Certainly, and always would do; it follows as a natural sequence.

1025. I do not quite go so far as that; for instance, is prostitution unknown in the upper classes of the community?—Not quite, I am afraid.

1026. Seeing that they are amply provided with amusements in proportion to their means, according to your argument prostitution should be, in fact, almost extinct among them?—The class of prostitution to which I was alluding was of the lowest and most debasing character.

1027. With reference to the soldiers' institute, and the beds which are there, of course those are only used for the married men?—Yes, both married and single.

1028. All that has no connection with the diminution of prostitution in any way?—Possibly not.

Sir Henry Wolff.

1029. How long have you been chief constable of Portsmouth?—Since the 7th of December 1880.

1030. And before that were you at Portsmouth?—I was; I was chief clerk.

1031. I did not quite understand what you said with regard to Return No. 2; did you say that the fines had been higher since 1872?—I did.

1032. And in consequence of the fines being raised you think they are more careful to avoid detection?—That is what I said.

1033. And that they were less careful when the fines were lower, of course?—Yes.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1034. In that case which you mentioned you applied, I believe, to the officer charged with the administration of the Contagious Diseases Acts to give evidence?—I did.

1035. You did that, I suppose, because you thought that these officers had special sources of information on the subject?—Yes, I did it for that, and one other reason. The other reason was, that this constable knew an informer who could give me some valuable information, and upon whose evidence the person was really convicted.

1036. Would you not, naturally, if you wanted any information upon these subjects as to brothels and prostitutes, go to those officers charged with the administration of the Acts?—I should, certainly, if I had any desire for such information.

1037. I suppose you would refer to them as persons whose duties took them among these women, and to the houses which they frequent?—I should do it in this way: supposing I had a report of a robbery committed by some woman whose description I had, but whose name I had not, I should try to trace her through them.

1038. You have stated (quite rightly, no doubt) the cause of a number of girls whom you and your officers rescued from a life of vice; of course that would be quite consistent with the same thing being done by the persons charged with the administration of the Contagious Diseases Acts, would it not?—Certainly, it would not interfere or clash at all.

1039. I suppose it is common ground to all the witnesses, that the condition of the streets in Portsmouth and in other towns subject to the Acts has very much improved, that the number of brothels has diminished, and that the number of prostitutes has diminished; and you gave what seemed to me a very good explanation of those results. Should you be prepared to go so far as to say that the Contagious Diseases Acts have had no influence in bringing about that result?—Certainly not.

1040. Then might I ask you to state to what extent you believe they have operated to bring about these most desirable results?—I think, as I have already stated, that they have something to do with the more cleanly appearance of the prostitutes in the streets; and I think also that they have checked the worst classes of disease. I can remember quite well that many years ago I was able to diagnose the disease in the streets; I cannot do so now, and I have not been able to do so for several years at least.

1041. Should you say also that the Acts have had a deterrent effect in preventing young women from following a career of vice?—I should think that in all probability they have, more especially with timid women.

1042. And young women who are not hardened?—I am afraid some of the young ones are nearly as bad as the older ones; such is my experience, at all events.

1043. Women who are not hardened; women on the border-land, between levity and immorality?—Yes, semi-respectable. I should say that the Acts would have an effect upon those.

1044. Did I understand you aright to say that to that extent you think the Acts have had a beneficial operation?—Certainly.

1045. Might I go further and ask you whether, in your opinion, it is desirable that the Acts should be repealed as far as Portsmouth is concerned?—I think not.

1046. You

17 March 1882.]

Mr. COSSER.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

1046. You, being of opinion that the Acts should not be repealed, are there any complaints to be made against the manner in which they are administered by the metropolitan police?—I believe not; I believe they have been administered admirably.

1047. You think, like some of your predecessors in your profession, that they are good men, in an official sense, that are administering these Acts?—They are, and they administer the Acts, I think, very well indeed, with a great deal of discretion.

1048. Did you ever hear of any cases of ill-usage of prostitutes by them?—I have not.

1049. Or of any cases of harsh conduct towards prostitutes?—No.

1050. Did you ever hear of any case of molestation of a respectable woman?—No; I have had no complaint of the kind.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1051. And you would have heard them if there had been any such complaints?—I think so.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

1052. In answer to the Right honourable Member for Halifax you said that your police were in the habit of warning young girls, and that, in consequence of such warnings, they had induced many of them to leave their evil courses?—I gave an opinion to that effect.

1053. Do you not think that your policemen, having many other duties to fulfil, have less opportunities of warning young girls than the metropolitan police?—I think not, certainly. We would have far greater opportunities, because we have a greater number of them. We number 132, and there are about five, I think, under the Contagious Diseases Acts.

1054. But your policemen must remain on their beats, and they have other duties?—They can do it on their beats. Speaking in respect of the Commercial Road only, I think hundreds of young persons there are warned away; that is the kind of warning I spoke of. When you see the youth of both sexes congregating together you warn them, and separate them, and send them away. I do not mean to say that we tell them that they should go away, otherwise they will be leading a life of vice and crime.

1055. Do you ever give notice to their parents?—No.

1056. I understand that your warnings are simply confined to this: that if you see young men and young woman walking together, you desire them to separate?—Not walking together, but where they are congregating together and behaving somewhat boisterously, or in a way calculated to obstruct the free passage of the streets or misbehaving in any way.

1057. But you never go to their parents?—No.

1058. Or to the minister or clergymen of the religious denomination to which they belong?—No; we should want an augmentation of 500 constables if we had to do that.

0.75.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

1059. Supposing that the metropolitan police, from the special nature of their duty, were able to give such warnings to the friends of these young girls, would not their action in the matter be more efficacious than yours?—It might be in isolated cases, but I do not think their warnings would be so numerous as ours.

1060. But if there were such warnings they would be more efficacious surely?—In those cases, certainly.

Mr. Hopwood.

1061. I suppose that if you knew that a young girl was going wrong, or was likely to go wrong, and if you knew her parents, in that case you would possibly communicate with them?—I should act with a good deal of discretion in doing so.

1062. You would do it if the case justified it?—Yes, it would be an exceptional thing to do.

1063. It would perhaps be in your judgment a proper proceeding on the part of any guardian of the peace, such as a police officer?—I have certainly, myself, spoken to girls in that way in the presence of their parents, but we have to exercise a great deal of caution in so doing.

1064. And you would expect the same caution to be very necessary in the case of the metropolitan police?—Certainly.

1065. Do you see anything in their proceedings, either in the matter of public order, or in warning girls against straying from virtue, or anything in their powers that exceed those of your police?—Certainly not; their powers are more limited than ours in many respects.

1066. In all that you have told us about the management of the town and the preservation of order?—They have nothing to do with it.

1067. Do you admit that Mr. Annis, or his men, have in any way contributed to produce that result?—I do not know; Mr. Annis has to do with a different town.

1068. I do not know that they do say so in Portsmouth?—I think not; I do not think that they would say so. Inspector Jones is the head of the Contagious Diseases Acts police in Portsmouth.

1069. I understand you to say that you have never heard such an allegation made by the metropolitan police at Portsmouth?—I have not.

1070. With regard to the early closing of the public-houses, I understand you to attribute great improvement to the closing of public-houses at an early hour in the night under the Act passed in 1872?—I do attribute it to that.

1071. Before that you had shut up a number of beerhouses?—Yes, we had.

1072. Perhaps you will remember that the beerhouses used to close earlier than the public-houses?—I am aware of that.

1073. Was it the course of proceeding with many of those who frequented the beerhouses when they were closed to go to the public-houses and to get further refreshments?—I have no doubt of it.

1074. And that would lead to more disorder and riot?—Yes. There is one thing which I think I omitted to mention with reference to

Licensing

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

Licensing Acts and restrictions as to closing. There was an Act adopted in Portsmouth in 1866 called the Public-House Closing Act, which required public-houses to close from one to four o'clock every morning.

1075. Previously they had been open all night?—Previously they had, if they chose to keep open.

1076. As to cleanliness, how do you suggest that the Contagious Diseases Acts produced that; is it from the desire of the women to make themselves more attractive?—I should say that a feeling of shame would have something to do with it; they would be somewhat ashamed to go in a filthy condition to be examined; that is my idea.

1077. You do not think they would be ashamed of the operation that they went to undergo?—That is a question that I can hardly answer.

1078. I thought you gave, as a reason, the shame that they would feel at coming in a dirty condition?—No, I can scarcely answer that question.

1079. As to diseases before these Acts, was there any hospital where these poor creatures could be received?—There was then, as there is now, the Royal Hospital at Mile End, Landport, where these girls are now detained, and the Workhouse Hospital.

1080. Was the Royal Hospital subsidised by the State?—I am not aware that those girls were cared for before the passing of these Acts differently from any other persons in the streets.

1081. I understand you to say that you have no complaints of the police, the water police or the metropolitan police, following people or molesting them?—I have had no complaints.

1082. That would of course depend upon the complaint made; but you would not hear of it unless it was a complaint to your police?—I should not be likely to hear of it unless the complaint was lodged at one or other of the five divisional stations.

Mr. Stansfeld.

1083. I think you were asked by the honourable Member who succeeded me, whether you did not admit a reduction in the number of brothels between the year 1865 and the year 1869, and you answered in the affirmative, did you not?—I could not contradict it.

1084. Would you look at these figures in Captain Harris's return for 1880 (handing a return to Witness). That is the report of the police for the year 1880 on the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts, is it not?—It is.

1085. In that report, so entitled, they set out the diminution of brothels in various places, including Portsmouth, and they show a diminution in the brothels at Portsmouth, including public-houses and beerhouses?—So it appears by this return.

1086. But is not your evidence to-day to this effect: that no brothel, being a public-house or beerhouse, has ceased to be such in consequence of any action taken under the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Certainly.

1087. Therefore, these annual police reports, stating year after year the reduction of brothels under the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts, give an apparent credit to those Acts which is not justified by the law or by the facts?—They do certainly.

Mr. Hanbury Tracy.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, IN THE CHAIR.

MR. FREDERIC WHEELER, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

1088. YOU are, I think, a native of Strood, near Chatham, where you carried on business for many years?—Yes.

1089. When did you retire from business?—About 20 years ago.

1090. What was your business?—That of a grocer.

1091. And you removed then to Rochester?—Yes.

1092. Have you since continuously resided there?—Yes.

1093. Therefore, you have lived in the neighbourhood of Chatham the greater part of your life?—Yes, the whole of it.

1094. Are you a Member of the Society of Friends?—Yes.

1095. About what time was your attention drawn to the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I think about the year 1870.

1096. Have you taken any part in that matter within the Society of Friends?—I am a member of the committee of the Society of Friends for opposing the State regulation of vice.

1097. The Society of Friends has a representative body which meets periodically, has it not?—Yes, once a month.

1098. What is the representative body called?—It is called the "Meeting for Sufferings," because it was originally established to take measures for the relief of those who might be suffering in prison; and it retains the old name.

1099. That representative body meets monthly in London, I think?—Yes.

1100. Has that representative body petitioned Parliament for the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Yes, for a number of years past from year to year.

1101. Are you a member of the Committee of the Chatham Refuge for Unfortunate Women?—Yes; those who desire to be reclaimed we style them.

1102. Since 1870, when you first began to pay attention to the subject of these Acts, you have, have you not, devoted considerable time to watching their operation, and to recording the evidence which you have gathered from time to time?—Yes, I have made notes from time to time.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

1103. It has been your habit, has it not, during all that time to keep a record of facts coming to your knowledge bearing upon the subject?—I keep these notes.

1104. These notes which are made at the time?—Yes, such as appear to have any value.

1105. And these notes refer, do they not, to a great variety of facts, including the result of inquiries made by you of military men and civilians, magistrates, ministers of religion, and so on?—Yes.

1106. Have you read the evidence given by Mr. Stigant before this Committee on the subject of the number, and the public behaviour of the prostitutes in the Chatham district, both before and since the passing of the Acts?—Yes.

1107. Do you agree with Mr. Stigant that there has been, in recent years, an improvement in the appearance of the prostitutes in Chatham?—Yes.

1108. What do you mean by improvement in appearance?—I should refer principally to their dress; many of them dress in a more costly way than they did; not all perhaps.

1109. But, on the whole, they are better dressed, and appear better off?—Yes.

1110. Has there also been within your observation, any improvement in their public behaviour?—Yes, there has.

1111. Do you attribute that improvement in their public behaviour to the Contagious Diseases Acts?—No, by no means.

1112. To what influences would you attribute that improvement?—To the measures instituted by the Kent County Constabulary.

1113. The county constabulary are the local police in Chatham, are they not?—Yes.

1114. Then there are other agencies, I presume?—Yes, there are numerous other moral and religious agencies.

1116. Then.

21 March 1882.]

Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

1116. Then, so far as your judgment goes, you are unable to attribute that improvement in any degree to the existence of the Acts?—I do not see the connection.

1117. If I remember rightly Mr. Stigant spoke of a decrease of the amount of prostitution in Chatham; do you agree with him that there has been any diminution of prostitution in the district?—I do not think there has been any.

1118. Has the number of registered women been reduced?—Yes.

1119. Does the number of registered women, in your opinion, represent the actual number of women and girls engaged in prostitution in Chatham?—I do not think it does.

1120. I infer from your last answer that you agree with those who believe in the existence, to a considerable extent, of what is called clandestine prostitution, that is to say, of prostitutes who are not registered in the district of Chatham?—Yes, I do.

1121. Do you think that your opinion is shared by people generally in Chatham?—I think it is shared by very many in Chatham.

1122. Have you made any specific inquiries upon the subject of clandestine prostitution in Chatham?—Yes.

1123. With what results that you may have recorded?—I have made inquiry amongst soldiers, thinking that they have a good opportunity of judging on the question of clandestine prostitution.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1124. Private soldiers?—Private soldiers, and non-commissioned officers as well.

Mr. Stansfeld.

1125. And you have, if I mistake not, been in the habit, with reference to those inquiries as well as others, of recording the results at the time?—Yes; I made notes from time to time, and I have the substance of them here.

1126. And you are enabled to express the opinion, from your own observation, that there exists a considerable amount of clandestine prostitution in Chatham?—Yes, I have not a doubt of it; and I think I can find it sustained by remembering that I have met with a number of women who are not registered.

1127. How have you come to meet with those who were not registered?—Girls have been brought to me to get them into the refuge for young females, such as, I think, have not been registered, and who acknowledge themselves fallen.

1128. In any other way that occurs to you to mention?—Not at this moment.

1129. I now ask you as to the alleged reduction in the number of juvenile prostitutes. Question 5468, which was put to Mr. Stigant by the Judge Advocate General, was as follows: "Have you observed any change since these Acts came into operation in the number of young prostitutes; have they increased or diminished since the Acts came into operation?—I am afraid to say that they are much decreased; but I may explain that there would have been a greater number but for the Contagious Diseases Acts than there is; of late years there have sprung up in Chatham some cloth factories, employing great numbers of girls, establishments that did not previously exist; unfortunately many of these girls spend their evenings in dancing saloons, and they appear to have gone astray; many of the girls, even the respectable ones, after their daily occupation, walk the streets; it is very hard to say, because they are young people, that there is anything wrong in their being on the streets;" and then a number of questions follow upon the same subject; I presume that you are able, from your own observation, to confirm that general statement of the number of girls in connection with the cloth factories, and so on, in Chatham, who have apparently gone astray?—Yes.

1130. But do you confirm the opinion of Mr. Stigant, that there is some, though not much, reduction in the number of juvenile prostitutes, and that there would have been more of such juvenile prostitutes but for the Acts?—I could not say anything about what might have taken place under different conditions; but I do not think that the number of juvenile prostitutes is less than it was, so far as I have been able to observe.

1131. Have you any reason to suppose that there is an increase in the number of juvenile prostitutes?—I think there is.

1132. You are familiar with Captain Harris's Annual Returns?—Some of them.

1133. I will take the return for 1877; how many prostitutes does that return give under the age of 18 in the Chatham district?—One under 18.

1134. One under 17, in fact, and of course under 18 too?—Yes.

1135. Was your attention drawn to that return about the time it was issued?—It was.

1136. And did you read that statement with assent or with surprise?—I was amazed at the statement.

1137. Why were you amazed at it?—It seemed to me so contrary to what I had seen and heard many times over.

1138. Did you thereupon proceed to make inquiries upon the subject, and was the result of those inquiries to confirm your conviction that the number of girls under 18 practising prostitution was largely more than was admitted in Captain Harris's return?—I called on a number of tradesmen resident in the neighbourhood most marked as the scene of prostitution.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

1139. When did you do this?—Immediately after the return appeared; 56 tradesmen and others, most of whom were resident in the neighbourhood, presented the following petition to Parliament: "Your petitioners have had their attention called to the report of Captain Harris in which he gives the number of known common women under 18 years of age as one only. From observation and inquiry your petitioners are convinced that his statement is wholly unreliable and untrue, and that there is a considerable number of such women under 18 years of age."

1140. That petition was presented to Parliament in 1878, was it not?—Yes.

1141. The

Mr. WHEELER.

1141. The report for 1877, of course, would not appear until 1878?—No.

1142. Was there not a letter which appeared in the "Times" a year or two afterwards, which has some bearing upon this subject, and to which you would like to refer the Committee?—Yes, I have the letter. It was in the "Times" of April 16th, 1881.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1143. Who signs the letter?—Henry J. Boys, St. John's Rectory, Chatham; he is also the salaried chaplain of the Lock Hospital.

Mr. Stansfeld.

1144. In that letter there is this statement: "It is evident that the brothel keepers of Belgium seldom dare to receive girls of extreme youth, or do so at their peril. Here at home in England girls of 15 or 16 years of age are continually being decoyed into houses of ill fame. If any confirmation of this statement is desired I invite an investigation of the quarterly reports furnished to the War Office by the chaplains of the Lock Hospitals." In consequence of reading that letter did you call upon the writer?—I did.

1145. In consequence of your discussion with the writer did you apply to be furnished with the reports of the chaplains at the Lock Hospitals, to which reference is made?—I did.

1146. Do you put in the reply that you received from the War Office?—I do. It is as follows: "Sir, in reply to your letter of the 16th May requesting to be furnished with a copy of the last quarterly report of the chaplain of the Lock Hospital at Chatham, I am directed by the Secretary of State for War to inform you that it is not usual to give copies of such reports, and he is therefore unable to comply with your request, I am, sir, your obedient servant, Ralph Thompson." That letter is dated the 1st of June 1881.

1147. Have you found the youth of the girls upon the streets at Chatham matter of remark at public meetings?—I could quote the remark of Mr. Stigant, as quoted in the local papers. The date of the meeting was on the 29th of April 1881, and at that meeting Mr. Stigant made a speech, in which he said he had been recently most painfully impressed with the number and youth of the pregnant women who had applied for admission to the union of which he is chairman of the guardians.

1148. With regard to the public behaviour of prostitutes in the streets, can you give us any similar evidence?—On another occasion, at the annual meeting of this institution, the Refuge for Penitent Females, Colonel Fellowes, the Commandant of the Marines, spoke on the necessity of the authorities of Chatham suppressing the disgraceful scenes that were witnessed in Chatham; "these unfortunate women going about the streets in an ill-dressed and drunken state, and standing at the corners of the streets to lead astray young soldiers. Such a state of things was a disgrace to the town."

Chairman.

1149. Is there anything in the statement to show that this gentleman spoke from his personal observation?—I think the following words imply that: "He also complained that the women would not even let the troops alone when marching through the streets on duty." I have to say also that I have seen the women on their way to examination making signs to the soldiers when they have marched past them, which I suppose to be the same thing which the Commandant complains of.
0.75.

Chairman—continued.

Mr. Stansfeld.

1150. Was any action taken by any public body in consequence of this speech of the Commandant of the Marines?—Yes, the speech of the Commandant of the Marines was mentioned at a meeting of the local board of health by one of its members, Mr. Breeze.

1151. Is the local board of health the governing body of the locality?—Hardly so; it has a limited power over the streets.

1152. But there is no other governing body, is there?—There is another local board for providing means for the payment of the rates. I think this might also be called the governing body of the district.

1153. This speech was reported; what was done upon that?—He recommended that the matter should be taken up in imitation of the Rochester people who had prevented such a shameful state of things under their byelaws. On this occasion Mr. Stigant, who is chairman of the board, objected to any action in the matter, and so it passed.

1154. Now take the case of Rochester; is Rochester a corporate town?—Yes.

1155. Rochester might have a byelaw which the Local Board of Chatham could not have under the existing state of the law?—Yes, it has.

1156. You are aware, are you not, that local boards, unless they are also corporations, have no police powers?—I believe that is so.

1157. And, therefore, what could be done in Rochester could not be done in Chatham where there was no corporate body?—I suppose that is so.

1158. With reference to the behaviour of the prostitutes in the streets, can you refer us to any reports of prosecutions by the local police and convictions of women for drunken, riotous, and indecent behaviour in the streets?—I have made extracts from police cases reported in the newspaper press of 233 cases of prosecutions by the local police, and convictions of women for drunken, riotous, or indecent behaviour in the streets.

1159. During what period?—Since 1876. Those cases I have casually observed in the local papers between 1876 and the present time.

1160. Your opinion, as I understand, would be this: that these numerous cases of prosecution and frequent conviction were evidence of the fact of drunken and riotous and indecent behaviour, and probably operated to diminish that evil?—Yes, I attribute whatever improvement may have been effected in the streets largely to measures of this kind; and in none of those cases have I been able to discover that the Contagious Diseases Acts' police were either prosecutors or witnesses.

1161. You are familiar with the Contagious Diseases
f 3 Diseases

21 March 1882.]

Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

Diseases Acts, are you not?—To a great extent; I have looked them over.

1162. Probably you are enabled from your knowledge of them to say (that which is known to the Committee) that they contain no powers of prosecution in such cases?—I believe that that is the case. I might say also that I have reason to believe that rather a larger number of prosecutions were instituted and convictions secured against drunken men. This also would have some effect in amending the state of the streets.

1163. Have you Mr. Stigant's evidence before you, and will you refer to Question 5573, where Mr. Stigant is asked this question: "Do you mean to say, as a respectable resident in Chatham, that you allowed this horrible state of things that you say went on" (that refers to indecent conduct on the part of a prostitute in the street) "to continue without remonstrating against it or calling upon the authorities to restore order?" And the answer is, "I do not say anything of the kind. I say we had no power; we often drew the attention of the authorities to it, but we had no power." It is true, is it not, as a matter of law, that the local board, the sanitary authority, would have no such police power?—I understand it to be so.

1164. But the place is under the county police, is it not?—It is.

1165. And they have power?—Yes.

1166. And you give the best evidence of their possession of that power by your statement of the 233 cases which you have noted, in which they have exercised the power?—Yes.

1167. Have you frequently heard complaints of such indecent behaviour on the part of the women going to and returning from examination?—I have.

1168. Has that been a matter of frequent occurrence?—Yes; I could name at once a dozen persons who have complained to me of the behaviour of the prostitutes on their way to or from the examination.

1169. To what locality have those complaints principally had reference?—To the thoroughfare leading to the Lock Hospital.

1170. Would they refer particularly to the corner of what is known as Military-road and High-street?—Yes.

1171. Have you had specific complaints from shopkeepers in the neighbourhood; for instance, have you had any complaint from shopkeepers in High-street of indecent scenes in the neighbourhood of their shops?—Yes.

1172. Can you refer us more specifically to any such complaints?—Yes; a respectable shopkeeper in the High street complained to me on the 6th of July last of indecent scenes; women going up for examination, and soldiers with them. Other people have told me that it is a great nuisance. I have myself seen soldiers waiting about, and passing and making signs to the women, and also the women waiting at the public-house at one corner of this thoroughfare, and saucily saluting the soldiers as they marched past.

1173. Do you mean that the women were waiting on their way to or from the examination?—On their way to or from.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

1174. And close to the examination-room?—Near to it; on the way.

1175. In the same street?—In the great thoroughfare; it is a road.

1176. We had it in evidence from Mr. Stigant, at Question 5715, that the women walk quietly to the examination-room and back, and no one notices them. The question is put to him: "You never saw women waiting about?" (A.) No. (Q.) And the women come in one's and two's? (A.) Yes. (Q.) In fact, they naturally desire not to attract observation themselves? (A.) Yes; they walk quietly to the place; no one notices them, and they take notice of no one else." You entirely dissent from that statement and that observation of Mr. Stigant?—I was perfectly amazed at the statement.

1177. And you have yourself witnessed, and, as I understand, have received frequent complaints from others who have witnessed, scenes passing between soldiers and the women going to or from the examination-room?—Yes.

1178. With a view to ascertain personally the actual state of things, have you recently visited that particular neighbourhood?—Yes; on the first convenient day after the date of Mr. Stigant's evidence.

1179. What day was that?—On the 29th of July 1881.

1180. What did you do upon that day?—I went with a friend, at a quarter to 12, to the top of Railway-street, where several roads diverge, waiting there, and walking up towards the hospital.

1181. How far is that spot, to which you and your friend went, from the examination-room?—Perhaps 200 yards; there is a pathway across a field leading to it.

1182. Can you see the locality of the examination-room from that spot?—Yes; I have here a little drawing of the neighbourhood (producing a plan). The hospital stands within the green line; that is a field; the green line shows the boundaries of the field. We noted carefully 49 women and girls pass up in about an hour and a-half, and 46 women and girls passed down. Dirty, rough-looking men were lying on the grass in two separate places; others were sitting on the walls on either side of the road; other men were in the road exchanging recognitions with the women when going, but more returning. There was much loud talking, laughing, and occasional screaming among themselves, and boys looked on. A number of the women, say a dozen or 20, visited one or other of the drinking houses on the way up or down. One returning appeared to have been crying as she passed; another, too tipsy to walk straight; two, or more, appeared under 16.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

1183. Was that in going or coming?—I have not distinguished in these three cases between going and coming. About the same number went up as came down.

Mr. Stansfeld.

1184. Did you see any of the men go away with the women returning from examination?—
They

Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

They did; and they cleared off about the time when the women returned from the examination. The language that was uttered I could quote, but it would be very disagreeable.

1185. It was obscene language?—It was.

1186. I think I understood from you that there were boys there at the time; were they coming from school or going to school?—Yes, between 12 and two o'clock they would be dismissed from the morning school and perhaps collecting for the afternoon.

1187. Is there a school in that neighbourhood?—Close by; it is marked upon that plan.

1188. And you saw boys passing to and from school?—Yes.

1189. And seeing the women passing to and from examination?—Yes. I may remark also that there are 150 windows that overlook that scene.

1190. Did you make a second visit to the same spot?—Yes. My next note is to show that my friend made a visit; that I will not trouble you with. On the 3rd of August 1881, I went again with the same friend. We were too late to see the earliest go up; but we counted 17 go up and 23 down. The more respectable ones were quiet in their behaviour. Two went up in a cab. The shabby ones were very different, loudly laughing and talking among themselves and with the men passing by. Three others were passing down, and one of them accosted a waggoner with a waggon and four horses. She walked close by the waggoner's side. Then his arm was round her waist. The loud laughter and the language of her two companions who had walked on attracted the attention of persons in the road. After walking unsteadily for some distance, we saw them both roll on the grass bank close together; indeed the man appeared to fall on the woman. At this moment unintentionally, or instinctively, or unconsciously, I turned away and did not see them get up.

1191. On either of these occasions did any of these women notice your presence, or make any remark to you?—Yes, they did. One of them said, "If you shut up that hospital I hope you will drop down dead."

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

1192. Was that addressed to you?—Yes, it appeared to be.

Mr. Stansfeld.

1193. The impression upon that woman inferentially being that you desired to close the hospital?—Yes.

1194. Was any other expression used to the same effect?—Yes, another said, "That is the old — that wants to shut up the hospital."

1195. Have you, in the present year, visited the same place?—Yes, I have, and I saw similar scenes and heard similar language.

1196. Upon that or any other occasion did you hear any complaint from any passer by?—Yes; from a woman there who had come to fetch her son from the school. She was shocked.

1197. You have told us of the numbers of windows which overlook this spot from which the women going to and fro and their companions can be noticed?—Yes; I counted 150, and there are more.

0.75.

1198. Amongst those are there the windows of any institution with which you are connected?—Yes; we have lately established an industrial home for young girls, from 12 to 16 years of age, girls considered to be in jeopardy for want of suitable protection; and some of the windows of that home overlook these scenes; and I have thought it my place to suggest to the matron of that institution, that it would be desirable to keep these young girls at the back part of the house on certain days between the hours of 12 and two for obvious reasons.

1199. Have you made any inquiries to ascertain the moral effect of the examination upon these poor women themselves?—I have made inquiries, and the result of those inquiries is that I believe it has a very hardening effect.

1200. Have you made inquiries of nurses attached to these hospitals?—Yes, of nurses from two distinct hospitals; but I should not like to be pressed for the names of those women.

1201. Can you specify to us any information upon this subject which you have received from nurses in Lock Hospitals?—The statement is that after the women have passed through the examinations there, they give up all hope, all as lost, as to their character.

1202. That is a statement of the opinion which you have received from nurses in the Lock Hospital?—Yes.

1203. And from the girls themselves?—Rather through other persons than directly to myself.

1204. With regard to the number of brothels, has it increased or decreased of late years?—Within the last four or five years it has increased from 64 to 84, according to Captain Harris's Return.

1205. According to Captain Harris's Return, page 21, there were 64 in 1876, and 84 in 1880; were there not, with a steadily increasing number after the year 1876?—Yes.

1206. That number of 84 in the year 1880 is higher, is it not, than in any year after the year 1870?—That is so; but I ought to remark that this increase in the number of brothels synchronizes with the reduction of the military element in Chatham. Mr. Stigant stated that the number of military in Chatham had been reduced by 3,000 as comparing one census with another as between 1871 and 1881. I think he has a little overstated the matter; if he had said 2,500, it would have been nearer from the inquiries I have made; but it will be seen that if the military element was so largely reduced by troops going to Ireland and to the Cape, and the number of brothels increased, and the number of prostitutes increased, it compels the conclusion that the vice of prostitution must be eating its way into the civil population.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1207. Has there been any increase in the civil population?—Yes, not very great. It is stated by Mr. Stigant in his evidence.

Mr. Stansfeld.

1208. In Captain Harris's Return for 1880, on the 31st of December 1879, the number of known common common women was 155; and in the next year, 1880, it was 164?—Yes.

1209. According to Captain Harris's Return, on the whole there is a diminution in the number of registered common women at Chatham; but in the two last years there is a rise from 155 to 164?—Yes.

1210. And your view would be, would it not, that the increased number of brothels, and lately of prostitutes at the same time, with a decrease in the number of military, indicates a larger demand and supply of prostitutes amongst the civil population?—Clearly.

1211. Mr. Stigant's evidence gave us the population of Chatham in 1871 and 1881 at Question 5598; there is a difference of only 800, is there not, there being in 1871, 26,100, and in 1881, 26,900?—By the late census there were 26,900; and by the former census, 26,100.

1212. Now, with regard to the number of public-houses used as brothels, they are shown, by Captain Harris's returns, to have been diminished since 1870?—Yes.

1213. To what has the number risen since 1875?—As between 1876 and 1880 the variation is from 8 to 16 public-houses.

1214. There was a reduction down to the year 1876; in 1876 there were eight of such public-houses; in 1877 there were eight; in 1878 there were eight; in 1879 there were seven; and in 1880 there were 16 of such houses: is that the fact, according to that return?—Yes.

1215. In Captain Harris's Report for the year 1875, in paragraph 8 I find this statement: "The number of brothels (see Return No. 3) has been reduced this year by five, showing a total decrease of 683 brothels within the protected districts since the Acts came into operation. Of those, 110 were public-houses and 255 beer-houses. I regret, however, to say that there are 42 public-houses and eight beer-houses still used as brothels, notwithstanding the penalties imposed by the Act 35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, s. 16, the Intoxicating Liquors Licensing Act, 1872. Of this number, 17 public-houses and seven beer-houses are situated at Chatham. It is not found that the local authorities assist in the suppression of those houses." With reference to that remark, what have you to say?—I have to state the fact that in the years 1873 and 1874 a very earnest gentleman was mayor of Rochester, whose name was James Letchford Edwards.

1216. This is in the Chatham district?—The city of Rochester is within the Contagious Diseases Acts district. In those two years, 1873 and 1874, I have the names of 10 public-houses prosecuted as brothels and convicted, the "Maidstone Arms," the "Fortune of War," the "Buffalo," and so on. Then I have also the names of five others threatened by the city police, and amended by the threat of proceedings. That is my first reply to Captain Harris's statement, that it is not found that the local police assist him or his Institution in suppressing brothels.

1217. In Captain Harris's return for 1880 I find that, referring to Chatham, the number of public-houses that were brothels in 1872 was 27, and in 1873 it was reduced to 17; those are the

10 houses to which you refer, which were struck off?—I could not identify them; it might be so.

1218. Then in 1874 the number was reduced to 15, and in 1875 to 12; and then we have a still smaller number, but they rise again in 1880. Those figures are as I have read them, are they not?—Yes, in column 1. I was going on with my statement of the disorderly public-houses suppressed or amended by the local police. Three other houses were also amended by the threat of a parochial constable; the names of those houses are given. Further, I have the names of a dozen others prosecuted and convicted in 1876, 1878, 1879, and 1881, principally under the Licensing Act of 1872; but I do not find that the detectives under the Contagious Diseases Acts have initiated those proceedings in any case. This in further reply to Captain Harris.

1219. Were those convictions for harbouring prostitutes?—Distinctly.

1220. They were not for harbouring diseased prostitutes?—No.

1221. Do you know a place called the "Brook"?—Very well, indeed.

1222. Is that in Chatham?—It is.

1223. Are there not there some public-houses which are practically conducted as brothels?—The case of the houses on the "Brook" is referred to by Mr. Stigant, and by others who know the neighbourhood well, who say that they have little huts at the back which are supposed to be just beyond the boundary; or in some way or other not explained by Mr. Stigant, they evade the law.

1224. Do you say that those huts are outside the boundary of the borough?—They are at the back; they appear to be at the end of the garden.

1225. Outside what boundary?—Outside the boundary of the public house property, as I understand. I could not explain how they evade the law, except it be in that way, and that seems to be implied by Mr. Stigant's evidence.

1226. You mean that, at a place called the "Brook," there are public-houses, and beer-houses, and lodging-houses which have cottages or huts at the back, practically in connection with them, but which they are able to say are not part of the same building, and that those huts are brothels?—Yes, I understand it so; they are accommodation huts.

1227. You say that that is Mr. Stigant's account?—He refers to them.

1228. And do you confirm his statement?—Yes.

1229. What it would amount to is this: as to the separation of the huts from the public-house that they would not be a part of the licensed premises?—Just so; I understand Mr. Stigant so, and I believe it is so.

1230. That might make a difficulty with regard to the withdrawal of the license; but are those places visited by the Contagious Diseases Acts police?—They are. I made it my business to call upon one man, who I believe has more brothels belonging to him than any other man in Chatham; I call him the largest prostitution merchant that there is in Chatham; he has three houses in front, and I do not know how many of those huts at the back. I might say, parenthetically, thetically, that the thoroughfares from the main street to those places at the back are through narrow courts. The street is a short one; but there are 36 of these courts. I do not mean to imply that they are all used in that way, but the way from the front to the back is through these little courts, of which there are 36. I called upon John and Fanny Ware, the proprietors of these brothels; the man is also at the present time the licensed victualler of the "Devonshire Arms" near by. My object in calling upon John and Fanny Ware was to understand the nature of these visits.

Mr. WHEELER.

1231. What did you find after seeing this brothel keeper as to the visits of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police?—I learned from John and Fanny Ware that the Contagious Diseases Acts police came there sometimes twice or thrice a week, and sometimes twice or thrice a day, to make inquiries after the women; in answer to my questions they told me (that is to say, they stood both together, and I cannot say which made the statement, but they joined in the replies) that the Contagious Diseases Acts police never reprove them for keeping a brothel, but come only for information about women, and go right up into the bedrooms to find the women they want.

1232. I understand that, in your opinion, this kind of open relationship and co-operation between the brothel keepers and the police has a very bad moral influence?—I think it has; and while I am ready to admit that there may be many incidents such as we should rejoice in in the administration of the Acts, I lay infinitely greater stress upon this thing which we are now speaking of, the normal, never-ceasing influence of the Acts, which I shall have to explain a little further to make myself understood; I submit that these visits, being paid strictly in the sense of conducting and not reprovng a known illegal and immoral traffic, are and must be unhappy in their influence on the man who keeps the house, and the persons who frequent the house; each one of those visits must have some influence; we cannot meet without influencing one another; and I think it cannot have other than a most mischievous influence, that while we all know that these things are contrary to the law of God and to many wholesome human laws, these visits are in the sense of conducting, and there must be more or less connivance with the sin.

1233. Then this co-operation between the police and the brothel keeper, in your opinion, must exercise an immoral influence upon those who are parties to it, and who are conscious of it; and you would hold that to be not consistent with the proper functions of either Government or law?—I would.

1234. In that particular case of your conversation with the brothel keeper, to which you have referred, the man seemed to have the opinion that the police had a right to enter his houses without warrant, did he not?—Yes; and I expressed a doubt about it.

1235. Did anything follow afterwards upon the expression of that doubt?—Yes; Inspector Nutt, of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police, politely intimated to me, a day or two afterwards, that the conversation that I had had with John and Fanny 0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

Ware rendered me liable to proceedings under Jarvis's Act; in reply, I could only intimate to him that I was prepared to risk all consequences.

1236. You have expressed the opinion that this kind of relationship between the police and the brothel keepers is immoral in its influence, and also inconsistent with the true functions of both government and law?—I think so, and I have said so many times.

1237. Is it inconsistent with any public authoritative declarations upon the subject of morality?—It is directly a contravention, I think, of the Proclamation of the Queen, issued on the 9th of June 1860, a Proclamation which is lodged with the Clerk of the Peace, and which is read, as I am instructed, at the opening of every quarter sessions and assizes. A copy of that Proclamation I have with me.

1238. Will you read the part of the Proclamation that you consider applies to this matter?—The last words are, "We do strictly command all justices of the peace, and all other our subjects whom it may concern, to be very strict in the prosecution and punishment of all persons who shall be guilty of immoral practices, and to suppress all disorderly houses."

1239. To put it shortly, you hold a very strong opinion that the relationships necessarily existing between the Contagious Diseases Acts' police who have to carry out the Acts and the brothel keepers who are subjected to them, are demoralising in their influence upon the parties concerned and upon the neighbouring population, and inconsistent with the views contained in the Queen's Proclamation to which you have referred?—Clearly; and further than that, it is encouraging the growing lawlessness and disregard of the law which every law-abiding citizen now has increasingly to deplore.

1240. Now, let me pass on to another subject. Mr. Stigant referred to the diminution and mitigation of venereal disease in the Chatham Union of late years, and he attributed the improvement in that respect to the effect of the Acts alone; can you point out any other influence to which that diminution may have been fairly attributable?—Yes, I think that very much is due to the altered aspect of the military authorities towards the discouragement of the use of strong drink; that is to say, that up to just about the time when these Acts were passed, there was a disposition on the part of the military authorities, for, of course, their own reasons, to discourage temperance societies being formed in the army. From that period to the present time they have been very much encouraged, and with the happiest results, as the Judge Advocate General knows well.

1241. I understand you to be of opinion that these facts must be taken into consideration in this estimate; but what I wanted to draw your attention to was another matter. Is it not true that during the period covered by the Acts, 1864 to 1881, voluntary venereal patients have been treated elsewhere than in the union?—Yes; there is an institution called St. Bartholomew's Hospital at Chatham.

1242. Are you acquainted with St. Bartholomew's Hospital at Chatham?—Yes.

G

1243. When

21 March 1882.]

Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

1243. When was that opened?—It was reopened in 1864.

1244. Did it receive Government patients until the new hospital was built in 1870?—Yes.

1245. Both male and female venereal patients have been treated in this voluntary hospital?—Yes.

1246. Now take the reports of that hospital; do they show the venereal patients separately from the general patients?—No, they are included in the general patients.

1247. Do you find that the general patients amounted, in 1881, to 387?—I think that is correct.

1248. And was the number of out-patients about 5,500?—Yes, and 76,901 in all since 1864.

1249. Amongst those a certain proportion (but you cannot define the proportion) were venereal patients?—Yes, on the statement of the consulting physician.

1250. And your statement and argument, therefore, are that the reduction in the amount of venereal disease in the Chatham Union may be attributable, or partly attributable, to the existence during this particular period of this voluntary hospital which received venereal cases?—Yes.

1251. But on the whole are you prepared to say from inquiries which you have made, that venereal disease still largely prevails among the civil population in Chatham?—That agrees with the information that I have received.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1252. But you do not know it of your own knowledge?—No.

Mr. Stansfeld..

1253. Is it within your knowledge, or information, that a considerable amount of practice upon the part of doctors and of the chemists takes place in the treatment of these diseases?—It was in consequence of Mr. Stigant's statement at No. 5635 that the traders are extinct, that I was induced to make these inquiries.

1254. Mr. Stigant says, "Before the Acts came into operation there were two or three low class doctors and chemists who got their living from this disease, but they are extinct now;" do you deny the accuracy of that evidence?—I did not believe it to be true, and I immediately set to work to inquire; and I have now before me the names of a dozen persons who, by common repute, have a considerable trade, each of them in this particular class of treatment. I have the information respecting this trade from 17 different informants; I could give the information that each informant furnishes, if it were needful, mentioning the informants by numbers and the chemists by letters.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1255. Are the informants the chemists themselves?—In some cases I had the information from the chemists themselves.

Mr. Stansfeld.

1256. Your evidence clearly is that a considerable amount of practice of that kind still exists in Chatham?—Yes.

1257. With regard to the moral influence of these Acts upon the minds of the soldiers themselves, have you for many years made it a practice, as opportunity presented itself, of entering into conversation with soldiers, both privates and non-commissioned officers, upon this subject?—Yes, for a number of years past.

1258. Can you refer us to cases of inquiry of that kind, with answers by soldiers and non-commissioned officers, as to the moral effect within their own knowledge, or upon their own minds, of this legislation?—Yes, here are a number of soldiers who testify that this Act presents a temptation to sin.

1259. In fact you have a large number of notes of that kind in your note-book, of conversations with private soldiers, and marines, and non-commissioned officers, the effect of those conversations being that they regarded the Acts, and believed that they were regarded generally, as an encouragement to vice?—Yes, certainly, by those informants.

1260. I will take a case which you have numbered, 155; will you tell us the particulars of that case?—A sergeant of the Royal Marines says he thinks that it is a good Act, for 19 out of 20 of them go with prostitutes.

1261. In the notes to which you could refer there are a number of cases in which those soldiers express the opinion that the Acts are a temptation, and they give their reasons?—Yes. A Royal Marine thinks, as the women are supposed to be right, the men are deceived. They go after the girls the more under that supposition.

1262. Now, going to case No. 150, a private in the 2nd 5th Foot expressed to you this opinion: that there was an idea prevailing there that vice was safe, and that many went into it through that, but that it was false?—Yes.

1263. Did he say that Chatham was as bad as other places as to disease, and that as to morals it was a contrast with Glasgow?—Yes.

1264. Did another private in the same regiment confirm all these views?—Yes, on the 16th of May 1879.

1265. I will take No. 123; that is the case of a private of marines acting as a policeman at Fort Pitt Hospital; did he say that the supposed protection is a snare; and that the supposed safety makes more disease than ever in this place?—He did, on the 30th of March 1876.

1266. Then I find other cases in which privates and corporals express generally the opinion that the Acts are a temptation and a snare?—Yes.

1267. Have you spoken to civilians upon the same subject?—Yes.

1268. And with the same kind of result?—Exactly; a ganger of coal-heavers amongst others.

1269. Take your note of No. 130 in the year 1877; was that a conversation with a ganger of coal-heavers of screw colliers in the Medway?—Yes.

1270. Did he express the opinion that these Acts produced a false impression of safety, and led to the increase of vice?—Yes, amongst the men over whom he was ganger.

1271. You

21 March 1882.]

Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

1271. You began, a short time ago, to refer to certain moral influences which ought to have had an effect in diminishing the amount of vice?—Yes.

1272. Take the case of married soldiers' quarters; what do you say about them?—They were erected in Chatham in 1864 and 1865 at a cost of 8,700 l., thus abolishing the former notoriously indecent state of things in the barracks, which must have had an immense influence upon the character of the soldiers.

1273. Then I think you referred, did you not, to the temperance movement?—Yes.

1274. And you expressed the opinion, I think, that the progress of the temperance movement has had a large effect in diminishing the amount of sexual vice?—Yes, I mean that the amount of reformation would have been very much greater from this temperance influence but for some adverse influence, that is to say, the Contagious Diseases Acts.

1275. In fact you desire, in this part of your evidence, do you not, to refer to a number of moralising agencies which have been in operation, particularly during the period of the Contagious Diseases Acts, and which ought to have produced a very great improvement in the moral condition and habits of the population?—Yes.

1276. What about the increase, so far as the army is concerned, of the Scripture readers in the army?—Scripture readers have been increased in number, and all those things are within the period covered by the Acts.

1277. Have they been increased considerably?—Yes.

1278. Do the reports show a steady increase?—Yes; thus, in 1873, 64 readers; in 1874, 70; in 1877, 77; in 1880, 88; in 1881, 89; and in March 1882, 92 readers.

1279. What do you say about Educational Institutes at Chatham?—There is a very remarkable educational institute called the Institute of Engineering.

1280. When was that built?—That was instituted in the year 1872, with a vote of 21,000 l.

1281. In that institute have the men of the engineer corps the advantage of schools of instruction which their predecessors had not?—Yes.

1282. Is there besides the Soldiers' Institute in Brompton opened by Miss Daniel in 1876, which combines secular instruction and recreation with religious services?—Yes, a very excellent institution.

1283. Is there also a Soldiers' and Sailors' Home in the Military-road, Chatham, which was opened in 1877?—Yes, with temperance meetings every week, some of which I have attended and seen the work done.

1284. Is it within your knowledge that the sanitary arrangements of the barracks including decent arrangements for personal ablution, have been very much improved of late years?—I am told that it is so, but I do not know it.

1285. But that is a matter of general notoriety?—Yes.

1286. As to rescue work, you are one of the committee, I believe, of the Chatham House of 0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

Refuge, which Mr. Stigant notices as a small affair?—Yes.

1287. I find that his answer to Question 5629 is, that there were never more than 12 or 13 in the Home at a time; that is not quite accurate, is it?—No, 20 is nearer the number.

1288. How many does the report for 1880 mention as having been in the Home at the end of the year 1880?—Eighteen is stated as the number.

1289. Mr. Stigant is himself connected, is he not, with that institution?—He is a subscriber, and heard the report read.

1290. And he spoke upon that occasion, did he?—He did.

1291. Taking the reports of that institution for nine years past, do they show about 150 cases of rescue which resulted in permanent reformation?—Yes, satisfactory reformation as far as we know.

1292. Now, coming to the question of the petitions in favour of the repeal of the Acts, have there been petitions for repeal from Chatham signed by a great many influential people?—There have been every year for a number of years past.

1293. Do those signatures comprise magistrates, town councillors, guardians, clergy, and others?—Yes.

1294. How many of the clergy?—Eleven, including three canons, and one minor canon, in the one now in course of signature.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1295. How many clergy are there in the district altogether?—I could not tell you the total number.

Mr. Stansfeld.

1296. Have those petitions also been signed by the chaplain to the Melville Hospital?—Yes.

1297. What is that hospital?—That is a hospital for the reception of venereal patients from the navy and the marines, and other patients also.

1298. Have they also been signed by the Roman Catholic chaplain to the forces, by the Wesleyan chaplain to the forces, by the Presbyterian chaplain to the forces, by the Presbyterian chaplain to the Royal Marines, by the two high constables of Chatham and Gillingham, and by two medical men?—Yes.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

1299. What are the dates of those petitions?—There is one in course of signature now.

Mr. Stansfeld.

1300. These petitions are recent petitions, are they not?—The one we are speaking of now is one that is not presented yet; it has been signed partially.

1301. You have the petition there?—Yes (producing it).

1302. All those signatures to which you refer independently of former petitions, are contained in this petition which is not presented to the House?—Yes, that list is supposed to be a list of representative men; I have collected them myself, and witnessed them; but there is a long roll of others, of ordinary residents.

a 2

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1303. How many signatures of town councillors are there?—I think three.

1304. What is the total number of town councillors in Rochester?—I am not sure.

1305. Could you give me an idea of the number?—I have no idea; very likely 20.

Mr. Stansfeld.

1306. Have you ever applied to officers of the army or navy for their signatures?—Frequently.

1307. And have you ever been informed by any of those gentlemen the reason why they declined when they declined to sign?—Yes, they have either intimated, or alleged distinctly, that their Commission presented an obstacle.

1308. I understand you to say that in certain cases in which you have, yourself, applied to officers in the army or navy, they have assigned as a reason for not signing the petition, that they thought it was inconsistent with their holding a commission in the Queen's service?—Yes.

1309. Was there a memorial addressed to the members for Chatham District for a repeal of the Acts?—Yes, in the last Session.

1310. That was signed by how many persons?—Twelve hundred and sixty.

1311. Are you speaking of one now in course of signature?—No; there is one now in course of signature.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1312. There were 1,260 signatures to the one that was actually presented?—Yes; this is a memorial to the five members of Parliament interested in the district. They each had a copy of this, with an intimation that they could call at a certain place near the House of Commons, and collate the copy with the original, and this is the original.

1313. They were not all electors, I suppose, were they?—No, electors and others; it purports to be so.

1314. May I ask what the total population of those places represented by the five Members is?—At a rough guess, I think something like 70,000; I speak without book, of course.

Mr. Stansfeld.

1315. Opinion of Chatham is divided, I take it, upon the subject of the Acts?—Yes.

1316. Does it come within your knowledge or observation, that so far as there is public opinion in favour of the Acts, it is based to a certain extent upon the fact that the cost of curing prostitutes in the hospitals to which they are sent, being borne out of the Parliamentary estimates, it is at the expense of the general ratepayer, and is a saving to the local poor rates?—There is that feeling clearly.

1317. There is only one more subject upon which I have to examine you, I think, and that is the case which has already been referred to before this Committee, of Caroline Wybrow; you remember the case of Caroline Wybrow?—Yes.

1318. Did you make a personal investigation into the facts at the time of their occurrence?—Immediately after.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

1319. Who was this girl, Caroline Wybrow?—She was the daughter of the widow of a marine; a poor woman receiving parochial relief.

1320. The mother and daughter were in extremely poor circumstances, were they not?—Very; they lived in a garret.

1321. Were they recipients of out-door relief?—Yes; 1 s. a week and some bread, for I cannot tell you how long, but for a long time.

1322. Did they take lodgings in Chatham in 1870?—About that time. They were living there in 1871, certainly.

1323. Did they live for some years in the same lodgings?—Yes, they live there now, at least, the mother does.

1324. How did they get their living, so far as they earned money?—The mother by nursing, and by going out to what is called char-work; and the daughter by similar occupation, washing, scrubbing, and sometimes going in the fields.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1325. Are these matters within your own knowledge?—Yes, I know them very well.

Mr. Stansfeld.

1326. The evidence that you are about to give is founded upon your own knowledge?—Yes.

1327. They were very poor people, and lived, of course, in a very poor vicinity, and in very poor lodgings?—Yes.

1328. Have you reason to believe, from inquiries that you made at the time when they first came to Chatham, that the lodgings which they occupied were not shared by any women of immoral character?—The mother assured me that when she took the lodgings there were no prostitutes in the house.

1329. That is all you can say?—Yes.

1330. In those poor lodgings there would naturally, would there not, be a frequent change of lodgers?—There have been a great many changes.

1331. And if, in the course of time, from time to time parts of the same house became occupied by women of bad character, that would not, in your opinion, be a justification for calling the house a brothel, and the mother and daughter the inmates of a brothel?—The woman would have no control over the reception of tenants in other parts of the house.

1332. She occupied her own room?—Yes.

1333. You have seen her in that room?—Yes.

1334. Now I will take you to the year 1875. In January 1875, did a Contagious Diseases Acts' police officer go to the house and order the girl Caroline to go up for examination to the Lock Hospital?—Yes.

1335. How do you know that he did so?—I have seen letters from the Home Office and letters from the police stating that, and I have copies of them.

1336. Then I had better bring you at once to evidence which cannot be disputed. Do you put in the documents which I have before me, viz., first of all the statutory declaration by the mother and the daughter, made by them in November 1875, and which was sent to the Home Office in January

Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

January 1876, with a letter signed by Mr. Shaen, who is the president of the National Association for the Repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Yes, and I am one of the general committee.

1337. You also put in a letter of the Home Office in reply, dated the 22nd of February 1876, with copies of the reports of the police and the surgeons?—Yes. (The same were delivered in.)

1339. You gather, do you, from these papers, that in January 1875 the Contagious Diseases Acts' police officer went to the house and ordered the girl to go up for examination to the Lock Hospital?—Yes.

1340. Did the girl refuse to go, saying that she had done nothing wrong, and that she would not go?—Yes.

1340*. In fact most of the particulars would be contained in the statutory declaration, would they not?—Just so.

1341. The officer in a report of the 16th of June, which is quoted in a Home Office letter of February 22nd, appears to have stated that he found her in a brothel with two prostitutes?—Yes.

1342. But, as I understand, you visited the house; you have seen the mother and the girl in her room, and your statement is that certain rooms in the house may be occupied by prostitutes, but that the room occupied by the mother and daughter is not a brothel?—That part is not a brothel, certainly.

1343. The policeman says in his report, "I called on her and directed her to attend for medical examination; at that time I found her in a brothel with two prostitutes"?—Yes.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1344. It does not say that the house in which her mother lived was a brothel?—No. She was at the time when the policeman called and warned her up scrubbing the room below occupied by a prostitute to earn a few coppers.

Mr. Stansfeld.

1345. Is it not true that Caroline Wybrow, in her statutory declaration, declares that the call was made upon her in her mother's room?—Not so; in the house in which her mother lived whilst she was scrubbing the room belonging to a prostitute in the lower part of the house.

1346. The policeman states that he found her in a brothel with two prostitutes, and the statutory declaration of the girl is that she was employed, being a poor person, in scrubbing a room which belonged to a prostitute?—Yes; on the lower floor.

1347. The policeman directed her, according to his statement, to attend for medical examination?—Yes.

1348. Was that proceeding on the part of the policeman in accordance with your reading of 0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

the Acts?—I am not a lawyer, but it is not as I understand it, certainly.

1349. Is not this within your knowledge of the Acts: that unless a woman chooses of her own will to attend she must be summoned before a magistrate?—I understand it so.

1350. The policeman came a second time; that is in evidence upon this document, is it not?—Yes.

1351. And then he saw the mother; and did he repeat his injunction that the girl must go up for examination, or that she would be sent to Maidstone Gaol; is that upon the statutory declaration of the mother and daughter?—I think it is. The man repeated the order that she should attend, and he threatened her with imprisonment at Maidstone Gaol if she should refuse.

1352. Then did the mother and daughter go to the Lock Hospital upon the 22nd of January?—Yes.

1353. Did they there see the police inspector?—Yes.

1354. Did he, according to their statement, in the statutory declaration, ask the girl's name and fill up a paper which he told her to sign?—Yes.

1355. Was that the form of the so-called voluntary submission?—Yes.

1356. Have both mother and daughter in the statutory declaration, which is now before the Committee, affirmed that that document was never read over to them or explained to them?—Yes, they said so.

1357. But the officer, on the other hand, states that it was read and explained?—Yes.

1358. The girl was then taken to the examination room?—She was sent in.

1360. Did she go up that day week after another call from the police officer?—Yes.

1361. Did she see the visiting surgeon, Dr. Jardine?—Yes.

1362. Did he order her to mount the examination chair?—Yes.

1363. Did she refuse?—Yes.

1364. Did he finally call in one of the police officers and tell him not to let her go out?—Yes.

1365. Was she then taken by a nurse into the hospital, and were her clothes taken away whilst she was in a bath, and were prison clothes substituted?—Yes.

1366. Does it appear to you that her detention was legal under the Acts?—Not as I understand it.

1367. She could only be legally imprisoned, could she, upon summary conviction by the magistrates under the Acts?—So far as I could understand.

1368. On the following day was she brought before another surgeon, Dr. Weld, who told her to go on the chair?—Yes.

1369. Did she again refuse?—She again refused.

1370. Was she again sent back to the ward, and kept in bed for several days?—Yes.

1371. Was she again and again urged to submit to examination?—Yes.

G 3

1372. But

21 March 1882.]

MR. WHEELER.

Mr. Stangfeld—continued.

1372. But she refused?—Every time she refused.

1373. Did the girl at last contrive to get another girl to send a note to her mother, in consequence of which did her mother come and see her daughter in the presence of Dr. Weld?—Yes.

1374. And Dr. Weld, according to the statutory declaration of the mother and daughter, accused the daughter of having been with all the soldiers in the barracks, and of having the disease fearfully?—Yes.

1375. But previously to that statement, confirmed by the statements of the doctors themselves, he had not at that time examined her?—No.

1376. Taking the report of the policeman, Capon, does it not appear from that report that Dr. Weld certified her to be diseased?—Yes.

1377. But at that time she had not been examined; what was written over her bed?—In the first instance nothing; afterwards “Gonorrhœa.”

1378. After she had been confined for a whole week, did both of the doctors see her, and persuade her to be examined, as the only way of clearing her character?—Yes, and of getting her liberty, as I understand.

1379. At last she consented, and she was examined, upon condition that they would not use an instrument, by Dr. Jardine, Dr. Weld being present?—Yes.

1380. As the result of that examination she was told, was she not, that she would be discharged?—Dr. Jardine said: “It is as you say; you will have your liberty to-morrow.”

1381. Did the matron, Miss Webb, give her food and money?—Yes, she gave her abundance of food that day; the nurses gave her 6 d. each, and Miss Webb gave her mother 5 s. for her on a subsequent day.

1382. According to the statutory declaration, she said that she told the matron that she should be ashamed to go home; she asked if she could not be sent to one of the Homes that she had heard the girls talk about; and the nurse replied, “No, because you have not done anything naughty?”—Yes.

1383. Amongst these papers are the reports of

Mr. Stangfeld—continued.

Dr. Weld, and, I presume, also of Dr. Jardine?—Yes.

1384. Dr. Weld intimates in his report, does he not, that when he examined the girl upon the first occasion, only indifferently, she was suffering from a copious thick discharge, which, from its appearance, had the character of a gonorrhœal discharge?—He states so.

1385. But he does not allege her to have been actually diseased?—No.

1386. But when it came to the actual examination it is clear, is it not, that both surgeons found that she was not diseased, because she was discharged?—They said, “You will have your liberty to-morrow.”

1387. According to Dr. Weld’s statement of the 1st of February he examined her only indifferently, the girl stating that she really was not examined, and that the real examination was at a later date, after which she was discharged?—Yes.

1388. In the reports of the medical men do they deny the girl’s statement that at that time she was a virgin?—No, neither of them.

1389. You have had interviews with both those officers, have you not?—Yes.

1390. And you are prepared to say that they do not deny that the girl’s account of her condition at that time was an accurate account?—Neither of them denies her chastity.

1391. Can you tell us what either Dr. Weld or Dr. Jardine said?—Yes, I can recollect a few words of each. Dr. Weld said, “A man may make a mistake once in his life.” Dr. Jardine said, “The blame rests with the police.” I thought it was due to them to tell them what was coming.

1392. Did not the statutory declaration of the mother and daughter contain this statement: that when the mother saw Dr. Weld on the day after the examination he said to her, “I am happy to tell you that I have found your daughter to be perfectly what she professed, and anything that I can do for her I will do with pleasure”?—Certainly.

1393. Was she afterwards required to go up for examination?—She was never molested afterwards.

1394. In 1876 was the girl married to a soldier?—Yes.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, IN THE CHAIR.

MR. FREDERIC WHEELER, re-called; and further Examined.

Dr. Farquharson.

1395. I THINK you cannot say from your own general observation that clandestine prostitution has increased in Chatham?—No; not so much from personal observation as from testimony.

1396. But, of course, there is the difficulty that if you have no access to the register, you do not know what women you see on the streets casually are registered, and what are not?—Just so.

1397. So that there is a natural fallacy?—Yes; and that is a point which I intended to refer to, and which was certain to arise. I spoke of the girls passing through my hands (speaking metaphorically) on their way to homes, and I thought that there were amongst those girls a number who were practising prostitution, but who were not registered; but, on looking it over thoughtfully afterwards, we are quite certain that a number of girls might be registered without my knowing it. Again, it is not very easy to say, so as to satisfy every hearer, what a prostitute is; the definition is difficult; so that it must be only a modified statement.

1399. In answer to Question 1127 you say: "Girls have been brought to me to get them into the refuge for young females, such as have not been registered, and who acknowledge themselves fallen"?—Yes, those are the girls I speak of. Every one of them might have been registered without my knowing it, but I believe there were such amongst them.

1400. But those were girls who may have been seduced; there is no reason to suppose that those girls are what you call clandestine prostitutes, inasmuch as they may have simply fallen on one occasion, and may be desirous of redeeming their character without in any way going upon the streets?—Some of both classes. I have the names before me of some that have occurred to my recollection since I was here before.

1402. But may not the testimony of your informants be derived from that class of observation as to which you have acknowledged that there is a difficulty?—There are informants who do not feel all that kind of difficulty that I do. The kind of testimony that I proposed, if it had been admissible, would have been that of persons who have abundant opportunity, which I have not, of testing the habits of this class.

1403. I think you have also stated that you do not quite agree in the statements of some witnesses as to the diminution of juvenile prostitution at Chatham. In answer to Question 1138, you affirm your conviction "that the number of girls under 18 practising prostitution was largely more than was admitted in Captain Harris's return"?—Clearly.

1404. And, in order to back up your opinion, you refer, in answer to Question 1147, to a speech made by Mr. Stigant, in which he says: "He had been recently most painfully impressed with the number and youth of the pregnant women who had applied for admission to the union of which he is chairman of the guardians;" but there is no proof that those women were what are called juvenile prostitutes?—Not at all; it is only a presumption.

1405. They may have been women who had been seduced and had become pregnant, and probably had not gone into what we may call prostitution at all?—Possibly; it is impossible to say how far they had gone.

1406. Then that is another difficulty you admit?—It is a want, certainly.

1407. I think you admit that the number of registered prostitutes at Chatham has diminished?—Yes.

1408. But I think you also say that the number of brothels has increased?—According to Captain Harris's return they have. It has increased within four years; I speak of four years past.

1409. To what is that due. Why should there be more brothels and fewer prostitutes?—The number of prostitutes has also increased. I pointed to both returns of Captain Harris.

1410. But I thought you stated that the number of registered prostitutes had diminished?—That is looking a long way back. I could not deny that. The number of registered prostitutes returned is smaller clearly, but I speak of four years

Mr. WHEELER.

years past especially; and during those four years, while the military element was in course of reduction, the number of brothels was increasing, and the number of prostitutes as well, if not in the four years, certainly in the last year or two.

1411. And I think you admit also that there is an improvement in the general appearance and behaviour of the prostitutes?—I refer there, more especially, to their dress.

1412. I think you attribute that improvement to two possible reasons, viz., to the action of the police, and to moral and religious agencies?—Yes.

1413. The action of the police can have no effect in improving the dress of the prostitutes, can it?—I am not sure of that.

1414. In what way can it have that effect?—The dress is referred to by Mr. Stigant and by others as a part of the demeanour of the women. He talks of them as being ill-dressed and shameless.

1415. But the police have only to do with their police action in the streets?—Certainly, within their strict duty.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1416. The police would not take up or proceed against a woman for being ill-dressed?—Certainly not.

Dr. Farquharson.

1417. You refer, therefore, more to the moral and religious agencies?—Yes.

1418. But I suppose you admit that there are also moral and religious agencies in connection with the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I do not deny that there are such.

1419. Do you not think that those moral and religious agencies have really a better chance of operating on the women when you get them quietly in a hospital where they have some time to reflect, and have the beneficent ministrations of the chaplain and matron brought to bear upon them?—If there were no adverse influences it might.

1420. Therefore, although you say, in answer to Question 1115, that you are at a loss to see the connection between the action of the Contagious Diseases Acts and this improvement, you think it, notwithstanding, possible that the moral and religious influences brought to bear on the women by the Acts may have improved their dress, at all events?—I do not think I have said that; but I think it is very likely. Certainly they can dress better than they could.

1421. I think you have admitted a certain possible connection between the action of the Contagious Diseases Acts and the moral and religious influences brought to bear upon the women in connection with those Acts; you have admitted that it is quite possible that the moral and religious operation of the Acts and the influences brought to bear upon the women in the hospitals may do good?—Yes, to some extent. I could not deny that; that is so sometimes.

1422. Then in that case you modify the answer which you gave to Question 1115, that you are at a loss to see the connection between the action of the Contagious Diseases Acts and this improvement?—Yes, and this improvement in dress and demeanour. This improvement, I understand, to refer to the improved appearance of the streets, such as Mr. Stigant described.

1423. Of which you have stated that their dress and general deportment is an important part, therefore I need not press that point any further. Do you not think it quite possible that the actual examination of the women may have something to do with their improved dressing?—It is quite possible.

1424. There is nothing that a woman is so sensitive about as being examined by a medical man when her clothes are in a dirty state?—She must feel it.

1425. Therefore, if she is examined once a fortnight by a doctor, in that case she would naturally dress a little better, and be a little cleaner upon the occasion upon which she was going to be examined?—Yes, the doctor has told me that.

1426. Therefore, that influence brought to bear once a fortnight cannot be without some permanent effect upon her moral nature?—Upon her dress certainly; but I distinguish that from moral considerations.

1427. The action of the Contagious Diseases Acts then has had an influence in improving the condition of the women as far as dress is concerned?—Yes, it has made them what some call a more respectable class; that means, in appearance. That, I think, is admitted. They have more money and better dress.

1428. I think you also say that these examinations are hardening; what do you exactly mean by the term “hardening” as applied to the women?—I think I could explain it best by the language of a witness before the Royal Commission with whom I was rather intimately acquainted, a policeman, who said that he observed that they were greatly distressed on going up the first time, but that gradually that distress disappeared, and that they appeared able to bear it without suffering that distress.

1429. That is to say, they were distressed on the first occasion, because they did not quite know what was going to happen?—He did not say that.

1430. I am putting my interpretation upon it. Then when they find out that the process of examination is not so formidable as they expected the dread goes off; do you accept that?—I have no testimony that they do make that discovery.

1431. Then what is the hardening to which you refer; is the hardening physical, or moral?—Moral hardening, I speak of.

1432. But you are now rather touching on the physical side; you say that when they have gone through the examination for some time, they do not seem to mind it afterwards?—That is a moral process; they become inured to it.

1433. Is this on account of the actual physical operation of the examination?—It is not confined to that by any means, I think. I am dependent upon the testimony of others for this.

1434. Are you aware that a large number of women of the highest virtue and morality have to undergo these examinations in hospitals and in private practice, very frequently as often as once a day?—When they are known to have known disease probably.

1435. To

24 March 1882.]

Mr. WHEELER.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

1435. To find out whether there is any disease or not?—With their own consent.

1436. And for what we call diagnostic purposes?—They are not driven to it by the police.

1437. They want to know what is the matter with them, and they voluntarily permit a medical man to make an examination, which he holds to be necessary, in order to find out what is the matter?—It is done.

1438. Would you hold that those women are hardened by that process, and that “they give up all hope, all as lost, as to their character,” as you say, in answer to Question 1201?—I should not say that that takes place in every case. The cases are not analogous in my estimation.

1439. Would you kindly explain what is the difference, because the process of examination is exactly the same in the two cases, and consent is given in both cases by the women?—The circumstances are entirely different, I think.

1440. Not the local circumstances?—The surroundings certainly are different.

1441. In what way?—The object is entirely different.

1442. Do you mean the physical or the moral surroundings?—The moral surroundings; I am not speaking of the physical surroundings. The moral surroundings are entirely different.

1443. You have never heard any complaint, have you, that these examinations are not conducted with decency and privacy and decorum?—Yes, I have heard such complaints as that.

1444. Were they investigated at the time?—I do not recollect. I have heard complaints.

1445. But you have not any information beyond the mere fact of casual remark, perhaps?—Perhaps more than casual remark. I am not prepared with evidence of the number of cases, but I cannot say that I have no evidence at all.

1446. But I do not quite follow your statement that a woman, after examination, “gives up all hope, all is lost, as to her character”?—I do not give that as my statement; I give that as the statement of two nurses.

1447. Then you do not agree with the nurses?—I do not dissent from them; I do not dispute it.

1448. Then, although it is not your own statement, you adopt it?—Yes, I think it is quite true.

1449. But why should a woman, who has lost her character, be so very different as to character when she comes out of the examination room?—Shall I give you the words of the nurse, because I have them here and that is better than any testimony of mine: “When this examination is once passed upon them all shame is taken from them, and they say nothing worse can be done to them, and give up all thoughts of good that were instilled in the innocent days of childhood.” This is a letter from one of the nurses of a Lock hospital.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1450. A Lock hospital certified under the Acts?—Yes.

1451. What Lock hospital was it?—This one, from whose letter I have read, I can give the name of.

075.

Chairman.

1452. It appears that there are two nurses that you refer to?—I have spoken of two.

1453. Is the nurse whose name you are prepared to give the nurse who wrote this letter?—Yes.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1454. Is the letter written to you?—No; it is written to a lady who handed it to me.

Chairman.

1455. It is not a letter to you?—No.

1456. Do you know the lady to whom it was addressed?—Yes.

1457. Are you satisfied that it was a bonâ fide letter written to her?—Yes, I am.

Dr. Farquharson.

1458. Was the letter written in reply to voluntary statements made by prostitutes, or as the result of inquiries?—I am not sure whether inquiries led to this, or whether it was spontaneously given to the lady.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1459. You have the letter before you?—I have.

1460. It is a letter written by a nurse, of what Lock hospital?—It has lain by for a number of years, but I believe it is Aldershot.

1461. What is the date of it?—I cannot find a date at present. The name is Rose Wallis.

1462. Do you know the hospital to which she is attached?—No; I never was at Aldershot.

1463. But are you sure that it was the Aldershot Lock Hospital?—Yes, I feel sure about that, speaking now without book. I shall know presently, I think.

1464. Will not the letter tell us?—I think it will, very likely. It is a long time since I read it.

1465. About how many years?—I dare say it is about five or six years.

1466. Are you certain that this woman who writes this letter had not been discharged from the Lock Hospital at Aldershot?—No; I am not certain of that.

Dr. Farquharson.

1467. Do you know if she had been long in the service of the Lock Hospital?—I cannot tell you.

1468. Then do you not know what amount of experience she had?—No, I cannot say.

1469. In your answer to Question 1202 you refer to a statement of opinion that you receive from nurses in the Lock Hospital; how many nurses were those?—Two.

1470. Are you now prepared to give us the name of the second nurse?—The name of the second nurse is E. S. Dowsett.

1471. Is she still acting as a nurse in a Lock hospital?—No, I believe not.

1472. Did she retire voluntarily from that position?—Yes.

H

Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1474. In what public institution?—She is in the Throat Hospital. I do not know where it is exactly.

Chairman.

1475. Is it in London?—Yes, I believe so.

Dr. Farquharson.

1476. Referring once more to the hardening tendency of these examinations, would you not hold that the occupation in which the woman is engaged is really much more hardening than a simple examination?—It is very hardening indeed; I scarcely know which is more so, as a whole.

1477. But surely the profession of prostitution is more hardening than the examination?—Yes.

1478. Then the actual hardening process of the examination, superadded to the effects of prostitution, cannot be so very great after all?—I do not admit that.

1479. At all events, you admit that the greater portion of the hardening, which of course increases as the woman remains longer in prostitution, is caused by the nature of her profession or trade?—I have no means of judging of the exact amount of the hardening influence, comparing one set of immoral influences with another. I cannot measure a thing of that sort; they are both bad.

1480. Do you not think that women would naturally wish to place the responsibility of their degradation on anything rather than the real cause, which comes from their own fault?—That is quite natural.

1481. They would wish to put it on something outside their own action?—No doubt.

1482. And that, in some degree, of course detracts from the value of their evidence about the hardening process?—It is to be taken into consideration, certainly.

1483. In fact, assuming for the sake of argument the hardening process, you would admit that these examinations have a deterrent effect upon the women, deterring them from vice?—Yes; in some cases I think it may be so; in other cases it may act strongly the other way, I think that is in the way of encouragement.

1484. These women have no reason for thinking that that after they have once come under the process of the examination they are so far fixed to their occupation that they have any increased difficulty in escaping from prostitution; would that have any effect in the hardening?—I think the difficulty is increased.

1485. In fact, the facilities of escape are increased?—No; it was that which I did not admit.

1486. Do you not admit that the facilities provided by the Acts and the hospitals for women escaping from prostitution are considerable; we have had a great deal of evidence to that effect?—You may have had evidence to that effect, but my opinion is that there is a much slighter chance of their getting out of their bad habits when they have been from fortnight to fortnight to examination and passing through this process.

1487. But when they are admitted to the hospitals every woman gets an opportunity of escape if she likes, placed within her reach through the agency of the chaplain, and the matron, and very often the medical officer?—I do not know what may be the value of that.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

1488. But you agree that that may be so?—I do not admit it.

1489. You do not admit it, because you have no actual knowledge on the subject?—I am not able to admit it.

1490. But you do not dispute that the women have a greater opportunity and facility of escaping from prostitution by admission to a hospital under the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I cannot think so. It is altogether different from a refuge such as I have spoken of.

1491. But the women will not go into a refuge voluntarily?—They do, sometimes.

1492. And very often they do not?—Very often they do not.

1493. But they are compelled to go into a hospital, and when there they are placed under very favourable conditions for giving up their prostitution?—May I explain, in a word or two, the great difference that I see between being compelled to go into a place to get a blessing and going voluntarily. In the homes that I am delighted to feel an interest in, and take a part in, we have no riots; we have no such cases as police cases against the women who are sent for 21 days hard labour for rioting, of which I have 50 in number here. The disposition called into existence is so different. If I may express it in a word, a patient goes into St. Bartholomew's (Chatham) Hospital, where 70,000 out-patients have passed through during the periods covered by the Acts; amongst those has been a certain proportion of venereal patients, male and female; and we have never heard of such a thing as a policeman being called in to quell a riot in that place. But I have here 50 cases brought before the magistrates for insubordination, and refusing to submit to the regulations of the Government hospital. In one case it is a prison, with bars and bolts, and everything that is forbidding, is presented to the view of the patient; in the other case any patient who desires to be relieved from this restraint would be reasoned with, and they would say to her, "Have you, since you have been in this place, met with anything that does not represent benevolence and desire for your good?" "No, nothing." "Then, will you take the doctor's advice and remain a little longer?" You see what would be the disposition engendered in the one case as compared with acquiescence in the other.

1494. But I think you are assuming that they are treated in the hospital with a want of benevolence, and we have heard nothing of that before?—I am contrasting now the compulsion that runs through the whole of the business in the one case with the presentation of benevolent motives and no others in the other case.

1495. But we have had no evidence that they are not treated in the lock hospitals with perfect kindness and sympathy; have you anything to allege to the contrary?—I know almost nothing of the interior of those hospitals.

1496. But you are, of course, aware that when a woman is discharged cured from the hospital she is legally free from further examination, if she does not return to prostitution?—I understand it so.

1497. Then she leaves the hospital as a free woman, at all events?—I think so.

1498. With regard to the women going to the examination, I think you said that there were occasionally

24 March 1882.]

Mr. WHEELER.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

occasionally disturbances on the road?—Disgraceful scenes.

1499. Why is it that the police, who apparently have been so active in checking disorder in the streets, do not interfere to check these disgraceful scenes, which occur on the women going to the examination room; is it out of their jurisdiction?—Not at all; they have interfered; and if it had not been for that interference these disgraceful scenes would have been more unbearable in Chatham. Owing to certain interferences, that nuisance has been diminished.

Chairman.

1500. A nuisance of which you knew the existence?—Yes; which I had witnessed in that particular thoroughfare.

Dr. Farquharson.

1501. Then do I rightly understand that, at the present time, the nuisance has disappeared?—It has been abated; when I say abated I mean diminished.

1502. But there is no necessary connection between the examination and these disgraceful scenes, beyond the fact of a certain number of women being collected together?—They are on their way to this place for a certain purpose, and when they find themselves liberated they are very jolly, and sometimes very indecent in their language. I speak from my own observation. They are disgracefully indecent, and the language is filthy in the extreme.

1503. But not more indecent, perhaps, than the language that you would hear in the streets from the same women. In answer to Question 1148 you say, that Colonel Fellowes makes a very strong remark about the disgraceful scenes in the streets of Chatham?—Yes; it is both in the streets and near the examination room.

1504. Therefore, wherever you have prostitutes you have disgraceful language; but it has no necessary connection with the examinations?—Yes, the truth is, if I may say it, that we were terribly pressed as to time on Tuesday, and nobody knows how great my embarrassment was on account of this pressure, or else I should have been glad to say, after describing these disgraceful scenes, that they were to be witnessed only on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, between the hours of twelve and two. I went on other days to see how things were then, and there was a perfect contrast; all was quiet and orderly.

1505. I think you are of opinion that soldiers testify that these Acts present a temptation to sin?—Yes, that is what many of them tell me, and I cannot believe anything else.

1506. Do you not think that the real temptation to a soldier to sin is the fact that he is not allowed to marry, but is a forced celibate?—That is an awful calamity unquestionably, but that is not all.

1507. Do you think they calculate about the matter?—Yes, I am sure they do, as far as I can judge.

1508. And do they select women especially on account of their being clean?—Yes, I think so.

1509. How does that harmonise with your statement about the increase of clandestine prostitution?

titutes, because if people go with those women because they are known to be clean, why is it that there is such a large number of clandestine prostitutes about whom there is no sort of guarantee?—The two things may exist.

1510. But do you not think that there is a contradiction in that; if a soldier or a civilian selects a woman on account of her being clean, why should there be such a large increase amongst the women who, for anything anyone knows, may be frightfully diseased, in other words, clandestine prostitutes?—I think the honourable Member has already given me the answer to that. He says that the examination is a deterrent, and therefore I say women will practice prostitution clandestinely rather than go up to be examined.

1511. But if the women were not used by men the supply would naturally fall off?—Unhappily they get a great deal of business.

1512. Then why should the men who, according to your statement, go with women because they think they are clean, go with women about whom there is no guarantee of cleanliness?—Nothing can be clearer. Take a word from the Bible for that, "Bread eaten in secret is pleasant," "Stolen waters are sweet" for some distorted minds. I cannot explain all these things psychologically.

1513. There is nothing more secret in going with a clandestine prostitute than with a public woman. I cannot put the two points together of an increase of sin from using those women who are clean, and at the same time an increase in the number of women about whom there is no sort of guarantee as you have not with regard to clandestine prostitutes?—Soldiers and civilians do go with them, and they risk it; and they suffer fearfully in consequence of it.

1514. Would you wish to shut up all brothels and prohibit prostitution; would your idea go so far as that?—The advocates of the Acts often tell me that prostitution always was and always will be. I have a better hope for the future; but I see these Acts encourage the vice, and I would cease to do this evil at once.

1515. At all events you would not think it possible, or desirable, to try and check prostitution by stamping out all brothels and prostitutes, would you?—To try and stamp them out is one thing; and to visit them every day; paying 30,000 visits for conducting and not for reproving in the course of a year is another; it is a sanction.

1516. But that is not an answer to my question; I only want to know whether, in your opinion, it would be desirable to try and stop prostitution?—I am sure that we all ought to try and stop it; by every effort in my power I am trying to stop it; that is to say, I am subscribing to and helping in my little way a number of such hospitals and refuges as I think are operating in that direction.

1517. Do you not think that it might have a very prejudicial influence on public morality if prostitution was checked?—It would be a blessing; it could not be any other than a blessing if prostitution was stopped.

1518. But do you think that by the mere checking of prostitution you prevent men, many of whom cannot marry, from desiring to indulge
H 2 their

Mr. WHEELER.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

their sexual passions?—No, no human arrangement will prevent that. Nothing but Divine Grace will do that.

1519. Then, if you do not get prostitution, will you not get to a large extent seduction and immorality of that sort which is of a more formidable character?—We get now quite sufficient of all three.

1520. But not so much?—I do not know.

1521. I was glad to see that, in answer to Question 1232, you admitted the beneficial action of the Contagious Diseases Act; you say, "While I am ready to admit that there may be many incidents such as we should rejoice in the administration of these Acts"?—Yes, there may be.

1522. What are the particular benefits which you, apparently, hail with satisfaction?—I cannot deny that women have been sent out of the Lock hospitals into homes. Some have been sent into our home at Chatham Hill. I cannot deny that. But always when I admit that there has been a certain amount of good in that direction, I say that the amount of evil has been infinitely greater. I distinguish between the normal working of it and these mere incidents.

1523. But you admit that there is a certain amount of benefit from the Acts, at all events; we will put the evil effects on one side?—Certain good has come out of them. Good comes out of evil very often through God's mercy.

1524. Just one word about the case of Caroline Wybrow, which I will not go into at length. I presume that before the police entered Caroline Wybrow's room to tell her to go to be examined, they had observed her in the streets under suspicious circumstances?—Yes, they allege that in their letters.

Chairman.

1525. You mean in their reports?—In their reports, dated 16th June 1875.

Dr. Farquharson.

1526. Previously to having visited her in her room they had seen her outside under suspicious circumstances?—I have no evidence that they ever did go into her room.

1527. The writ was served on her in her room, was it not?—If I understand it, the writ was served on her while she was scrubbing one of the rooms below.

1528. Just one word about Dr. Weld. Dr. Weld, according to the declaration of mother and daughter, accused the daughter of "having been with all the soldiers in the barracks, and of having the disease fearfully;" does Dr. Weld himself acknowledge the accuracy of that statement?—I do not recollect that he denies it; but it is to be observed (and we shall notice that all through) that all that Dr. Weld tells us, he says, depends upon his recollection, and is written 12 months after the occurrence.

1529. And what do the mother and daughter go upon?—They go upon recollection, but not upon a recollection of 12 months after, but very promptly afterwards.

1530. As a member of the medical profession I want to ask you whether the statutory declaration of mother and daughter about Dr. Weld was denied by that gentleman?—He denies some of the details, I think, about the food.

1531. The accusation against him is, that without any examination, Dr. Weld apparently accused this girl of having a certain disease fearfully and a discharge. Apparently, on the 1st of February, he had made an examination?—His certificate bears an earlier date than that.

1532. Then he had examined her?—He says, "only indifferently," and the inspector states that he had, two days earlier (Jan. 30), certified her to be diseased on Form K.

1533. We have had a statement here that women have been forcibly examined against their will; you admit that this case shows, that at all events, in the case of this girl, she was not examined until she gave her full consent?—She gave a conditional consent under severe pressure. Virtually, "You will never get your liberty from this place unless you allow yourself to be examined."

1534. We had a distinct statement made in this room by Mr. Shaen, one of the witnesses here, that girls under these circumstances are forcibly examined and assaulted, as he called it, against their will, by medical men; at all events, this case shows that the girl was not forcibly examined?—Mr. Shaen was a lawyer, and meant a legal assault, no doubt. If I put my hand upon a gentleman's shoulder that is an assault.

1535. You admit that, in this case, the girl was not examined until she gave her full consent to the examination?—It was a conditional consent under severe pressure.

1536. But it was a consent; the doctor did not examine this girl forcibly against her will, as has been alleged here in evidence?—She assented, conditionally, under severe pressure, and the condition was that no instrument should be used.

1537. And no instrument was used?—No instrument was used; it was a digital examination and no other.

1538. And all the conditions implied in her consent were fulfilled by the medical man who examined her;—Yes, I do no call to mind any infringement of the conditions. The Chairman will observe that these things occurred a long time ago, and I must ask time to call up my recollections, and I am sure it will be granted.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1539. You were asked a good many questions upon Mr. Stigant's examination; let me refer you to Question 5614, where he is asked this by my honourable and learned friend, the Member for Stockport, "Were you in favour of the Acts from their beginning?" And his answer was, "I hardly know that I had any opinion about them at the beginning, but I may say that Mr. Wheeler called upon me, being a prominent man in Chatham, and being anxious to get my testimony as to the evil of the Acts." I presume that prominent gentleman is yourself?—No, I think he means himself; he is the "prominent man." I am not a prominent man; I am a very humble individual.

1540. But you are the Mr. Wheeler here referred to?—Yes, clearly. If I might remark, there Mr. Stigant makes a great mistake when he says that I appealed to him as a brother dissenter. I never never do such a thing as appeal to any one on such low grounds as that.

1541. May I ask when it was that you called upon Mr. Stigant?—I do not think that it was at his house; I have an idea that it was when he and I rode in a cab together; I offered him a ride, and then I put the question to him. I believe that was the occasion.

1542. But when was it?—It must be seven or eight years ago, perhaps. I speak, subject to my recollection being corrected.

1543. Then he is asked soon afterwards: "How soon after the Acts came into operation were you converted?" And his answer is, "I should say that in about 1873 my attention was more particularly directed to the Acts, and nothing did it more than Mr. Wheeler's endeavouring to engage my attention to the subject, in order to oppose the Acts; I told him I could not conscientiously do so, because my observation led me to a different conclusion." I presume from that that it would be about the year 1873 that you applied to him?—Yes, then my idea as to the time was about correct.

1544. I suppose from that day to this you have made it your business to collect evidence in Chatham against the Acts; is not that so?—When things have come under my notice, fact and testimony, I have taken a note of such as I thought relevant.

1545. And may I say that you have thought it your duty, or made it your business, to collect that evidence from whatever source you could?—I prefer the first phrase: that I thought it my duty.

1546. As a matter of fact, you did it?—Yes, clearly.

1547. I gather that you collected that evidence from soldiers, prostitutes, and other persons, promiscuously, whom you came across in Chatham, or did you address yourself to any particular source of information?—Soldiers.

1548. Did you pick up your information wherever you could?—I picked it up whenever it came in my way, and sometimes, it is true, from prostitutes.

1549. You picked up whatever information you could get. I suppose that the information which was picked up by you in that way is what you called just now testimony; is not that so?—Yes, much of it is.

1550. May I ask you whether you have ever, like Mr. Stigant, filled any official post in Chatham; have you been a member of the local board?—No, I do not live within the boundary of Chatham, but in that part of Rochester which stretches towards Chatham.

1551. Rochester is an incorporated borough, is it not?—Yes.

1552. Have you been a member of the town council, or held any official position there?—No, no public office since I left Strood 20 years ago.

1553. Therefore, I presume (though I do not say it in any way to disparage what you say) that you have acted merely as what one may call a volunteer in this matter?—Entirely so, under a sense of duty.

1554. You spoke a good deal about the influence of these Lock hospitals; may I ask whether you have ever been inside a Lock hospital?—Yes, I have been.

1555. At Chatham?—Yes.

C.75.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

1556. How many times?—I think two or three times.

1557. Then, of course, you can speak of your own knowledge as to what you saw there?—Yes, and it was very little that I saw.

1558. Did you see anything to lead you to think that putting these girls into a hospital hardened them or influenced them for evil?—I do not recollect seeing anything that I could point to that I saw there.

1559. Did you, on the other hand, see anything to lead you to believe that the detention of the girls in hospital was attended by good effects, were you present at the ministrations of the chaplain?—Yes, I attended on one of the occasions of worship.

1560. How were those ministrations conducted?—With great decorum.

1561. Did those unfortunate women seem impressed by the services, so far as you could observe?—I could not judge of that at all. The visit was but a short one, and I did not stand in a position to see their features, for instance; I could only look at them sideways.

1562. But may I ask what was generally the impression left upon you by your visit to the hospital, as regards any religious influence brought to bear upon those girls?—I could not feel any hope that good was being done in that way from anything that I saw; but at the same time I am ready to acknowledge, what I said before, that very often good is brought out of an evil thing through God's mercy.

1563. How many times have you been to this Lock hospital?—Only twice, I think, and then the visits were extremely short.

1564. So that as to what takes place there, you are not prepared to speak from your own personal knowledge?—Very little indeed, almost nothing. I might say that, having occasion to go with a Wesleyan minister, with a hope of seeing a Jewess who was in the place, the Wesleyan minister was admitted; but I stood out in the cold all the time. But that I do not find fault with; it is what I might expect.

1565. Were you refused admittance?—I was refused admittance, but my friend was admitted.

1566. You admit that an improvement has taken place, do you not, in the general condition of the streets and the appearance at any rate of the women in Chatham?—Yes, I have admitted that.

1567. And you attribute that much more to moral and religious influences than to the operation of the Acts?—Yes, clearly, and the local police.

1568. At the same time, I suppose you would admit that what has been called the deterrent effect of the Acts in preventing the less hardened class of women from becoming prostitutes would exercise some good influence in the direction you have stated?—I could not assert that no good influence has come out of it.

1569. Do you know London, or do you speak of Chatham only?—I have come for the purpose of speaking of the Chatham district.

1570. You know London, I suppose, do you not?—Not very much.

1571. Of course you are aware that a great variety of moral and religious influences have been at work on the women in London, and that much has been done to improve the morality and condition of the town; have you seen

24 March 1882.]

Mr. WHEELER.

in the last eight or ten years any improvement in the streets of London similar to that which you have seen at Chatham?—I think so. For instance, a gentleman speaking in favour of the Acts, said: “As I used to walk from my home to my house of business I used to meet 30, and now I meet none.” I replied that cannot be due to the Contagious Diseases Acts, because you have not the Acts in London. He was speaking of Finsbury Square, and from that part to his residence. He was a druggist.

1572. Do you mean to say that the condition of the streets of London has materially improved as regards the disappearance of prostitutes and their better behaviour in the last ten years?—In certain parts I think so; but I am not prepared to speak positively about that.

1573. By “clandestine prostitutes” I suppose you mean unregistered prostitutes?—Yes.

1574. What reason have you for saying that there has been an increase in clandestine prostitution?—It is very large, and I think it is increasing; but I do not know that I have asserted that. I cannot give statistics of that at all.

1575. Would you admit, then, that there has been no increase in clandestine prostitution?—I could not give an opinion upon that at all; but I believe there is a large amount of clandestine prostitution. I am obliged to believe so from the testimony that I have from others.

1576. Is that the testimony that you described just now as derived from conversations?—Yes, the testimony that was not admissible on Tuesday from, I daresay, 15 soldiers.

1577. Do you not think that persons whose duty it is “to hunt out” these women (an expression that has been used before), as it is that of the metropolitan police, would be more likely to form a correct opinion as to the existence of clandestine prostitution than a volunteer like yourself?—Yes, I should think they know more about it than I do, being always at it.

1578. Therefore, they being always at it, I suppose if anyone was likely to be able to form a correct estimate as to the existence and number of clandestine prostitutes in a borough under the Acts, they would be the persons, would they not?—There is this point, that the women’s aim would be night and day, and every hour, to keep out of the way of these men. They would not care to keep out of my way.

1579. But could they succeed?—They would often fail, but that would be their aim.

1580. But Chatham is not a very large place; and speaking, not of a woman who is kept as the mistress of one man, but of women who obtain their living by prostitution, would it not be almost impossible, in a town like Chatham, that they should escape for any length of time the operation of these metropolitan police?—I should think, in most cases, it is not that they are getting their living as much as supplementing their ordinary wages by prostitution. That, I think, is the class.

1581. But those women, I suppose, must, for that purpose, in order to supplement their living, go about and they must see men, and they must be seen in the public streets; what I fail altogether to follow is how, under those circumstances, they could escape the vigilant observation of the metropolitan police, who, according to what some witnesses have stated, are rather over zealous in the discharge of their duties; could you explain that?—A great many of them do not escape, but others do; and in other cases there is so much doubt that the inspector describes it as a fringe of doubtful cases.

1582. Do you give that answer of your own knowledge, or do you give it from surmise?—From information from various persons.

1583. May I ask you whether you have ever seen the register of prostitutes?—Never.

1584. And I suppose you have no access to it?—No, they would not let me see it.

1585. Therefore, when you speak of a woman as being a prostitute, and yet not on the register, you cannot speak from really authentic knowledge, can you?—I should be very cautious indeed, for it would be very difficult for me to describe a prostitute in a way that would satisfy half the gentlemen here.

1586. You have nothing that I should call evidence; when you speak of an unregistered prostitute you have no means of really knowing whether she is registered or not?—Only from testimony. I have already said in answer to the question, that they may be registered without my knowing it.

1587. With regard to these juvenile prostitutes, I think you have stated that there are a good many juvenile prostitutes in Chatham?—Yes, I believe so; I think I spoke of a petition declaring that there are very many.

1588. You are asked at Question 1131, “Have you any reason to suppose that there is an increase in the number of juvenile prostitutes?” and your answer is, “I think there is.” I should very much like to get at the data on which you found that answer?—I think it would come out very much in the interview that I was permitted to have with the chaplain of the Lock Hospital shortly after last Good Friday. The letter was not admissible the other day, but I was permitted to speak of the interview that I had with the chaplain of the Lock Hospital, in consequence of something that appeared in the “Times.”

1589. May I ask who that chaplain is?—His name is Boys.

1590. Is Mr. Boys now a chaplain of the Lock Hospital?—Yes, he still holds the office.

1591. We shall perhaps call Mr. Boys, so that I need not follow this up further; but you say that you derive that opinion as to the increase in the number of juvenile prostitutes chiefly from a conversation which you had with Mr. Boys; is that so?—I could hardly say, chiefly, but from a conversation with a number of residents on the subject, after having read Mr. Boys’ letter.

1592. If you cannot give me the names of the residents, I am afraid that what they said is not of very much value?—I can give you the names; I have them; and they are residents in the lowest parts of Chatham, just the people who are likely to know.

1593. Are you speaking from your personal observation when you say that the juvenile prostitutes have increased in number, or are you speaking from conversations?—From the testimony of the residents; I might say that it is confirmed by my own observation, so far as that is worth

Mr. WHEELER.

worth anything, because I walk up and down the streets very much.

1594. Have you ever been brought into direct communication with any of the women who have been to these hospitals; have you seen them and talked to them after they have been to the hospitals?—Yes.

1595. What account do they give of their treatment there, and of the influences brought to bear upon them in the hospital?—The information that I have relates more to the examination than to the treatment afterwards.

1596. I want to ask one or two questions about those two nurses; you gave us the names of two ladies, one of whom had written a letter?—One wrote a letter.

1597. You were asked, at Question 1200, “Have you made inquiries of nurses attached to these hospitals? (A.) Yes, of nurses from two distinct hospitals; but I should not like to be pressed for the names of those women;” now you have given the names, might I ask you to repeat them?—Mrs. Wallis and Mrs. Dowsett.

1598. One has stated her opinion by letter, has she not?—Yes, and at present I have not found any date upon it.

1599. Whose letter was that?—Mrs. Wallis’s.

1600. Do you know Mrs. Wallis?—Only from meeting her occasionally; perhaps twice, or I may have met her three times; I am not quite sure about that.

1601. To whom was the letter addressed to which you refer, which you say has no date upon it?—I think to a lady residing at Chatham; at all events it was from that lady that I received it.

1602. The letter was put into your hands by that lady?—Yes.

1603. You have a copy of the letter, have you not?—Yes, it is in the room.

1604. Then, having given me the name of Mrs. Wallis, could you give me any idea of her history?—No, not at all.

1605. Can you tell me at what hospital she acted as nurse?—At Aldershot, I believe.

1606. You are not even certain of that?—No, hardly; but I believe it was at Aldershot, always with the reserve that these things are five or six years old.

1607. Do you know when she was appointed nurse?—No.

1608. Do you know the circumstances under which she left her situation?—Not in the least.

1609. You do not know whether she was discharged for misconduct?—No, not at all.

1610. Then I pass to the other lady, Mrs. Dowsett; she did not write a letter, I think?—No, she gave assent to certain statements.

1611. In what way did she give assent; did she give it verbally?—Yes.

1612. To whom did she give verbal assent to those statements?—To me.

1613. What was the date of this assent given to you?—The 15th of June 1878—is at the head of these remarks, and I think it applies to this as well: “Confirms Mrs. Wallis, page 129, as to demoralisation.”

1614. Can you give us any history of Mrs. Dowsett; was she at this time acting as a nurse at the Lock Hospital?—No, she had resigned.

1615. She had not been discharged, but she 0.75.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

resigned; that you know?—Distinctly, as she tells me.

1616. Where had she been acting as nurse?—At Chatham.

1617. Did you know her at Chatham?—No, I think I did not know her until after she had resigned.

1618. Could you tell me how long she was acting as nurse at the Lock Hospital at Chatham?—No, I could not say.

1619. You do not know when she was appointed?—No.

1620. And you do not know when she resigned?—Yes, I can tell you when she resigned; she resigned on the 12th of September 1877. She gave notice, and left on the 12th of October 1877, or thereabouts.

1621. So that her statement to you was made eight months after she had ceased to be connected with the hospital?—Yes.

1622. But you cannot give me any idea of the time during which she acted as nurse, or the amount of experience which she had?—No, I do not think I have anything that throws light upon that.

1623. You spoke of petitions being presented from Chatham for the repeal of the Acts; is it not the fact that public opinion there is very much divided upon that subject?—Yes.

1624. Do you know what the opinion of the Members for the two boroughs of Chatham and Rochester is upon the subject?—I think they are all against us. Perhaps in one case it is hardly right to say that, but I think that in the other cases it is so.

1625. Would it not be fair to say that the leaning of public opinion on the whole was against you in the two places?—I could not deny that if you were to take numbers.

1626. Do you really think so ill of your fellow townsmen as to suppose that that prepossession of theirs in favour of the Acts is caused by a desire on their part to lighten the burden upon their own pockets?—Far be it from me to accuse them of mercenary motives like that; but I know that a man is often influenced unconsciously by that which is profitable and turns away from that which is costly.

1627. That is a bit of ethics; but you would hardly, I presume; go so far as to say of your fellow townsmen that their main reason for being in favour of keeping those Acts, was that the Acts help to save their pockets?—I know they are very sensitive of everything that increases the rates, and I could give illustrations of that; and they are influenced by that, perhaps, unconsciously sometimes; and we all may be.

1628. Supposing a feeling in favour of the Acts to exist, would you say that it was mainly due to a desire to save their pockets?—No, I would not like to say that. I think the main cause is ignorance, want of information.

1629. But surely these people on the spot, particularly people connected with the local board and holding official positions, would be as likely as anybody not to suffer from that ignorance of which you speak; who would be likely to possess information if they do not?—They are divided as well as the people outside.

1630. You say that the petitions for the repeal of the Acts have been signed by 11 clergymen of the Church of England?—Yes, then I was speaking of a petition which is now in course of signature and incomplete; I have it here.

1631. Can you give me any idea of the number of clergymen that there are in the district?—No, but there is a large number, and an increasing number, and there is a much larger amount of preaching of the gospel than there used to be.

1632. I want to know what proportion those 11 clergymen bear to all the clergymen of the district; I suppose the latter are a very numerous body?—Yes, there is a large body of them.

1633. I think you say that three town councillors have signed the petition?—Yes.

1634. What is the total number of town councillors?—I answered the other day, at a guess, 20; but I do not know the number.

1635. Therefore there are three who signed against, say 17, who have not signed?—Yes, possibly.

1636. How many magistrates have signed these petitions?—I think I have three or four.

1637. Can you tell me how many magistrates there are in the district?—I have no idea, but I daresay there are a score.

1638. So that the proportion of magistrates signing to those not signing would be very much the same as the proportion of town councillors?—It looks like it, so far as their opinion has been elicited.

1639. I suppose most of the people of position in the districts have been asked to sign the petition?—I doubt that.

1640. I suppose any person whose opinions were not known to be distinctly favourable to the Acts would be asked to sign the petition?—I could not say that. That would involve a large amount of labour.

1641. What agency has been employed to get signatures to these petitions?—In the case of these 90 names, I have called on those gentlemen myself and witnessed their signatures; but as to the others, they have been collected by dockyard men and other persons who sympathise with us.

1642. I suppose you have left no stone unturned to get signatures to this petition which you have now before you?—I have been diligent, I admit.

1643. I presume that you have used all diligence and zeal to obtain as many signatures to that petition, and as important and influential signatures as you could?—I have used some diligence in that direction; but I have a great deal more to do yet; a great many firms that I have to call on. I have many other duties to attend to, and I cannot do half so much as I wish to do.

1644. Besides that petition which is not completed, you have yourself got up other petitions, have you not?—Yes.

1645. Could you give me any idea as to the number of town councillors, and clergymen, and magistrates who have signed these petitions?—I think very likely they were like this; but perhaps a little more complete.

1646. Otherwise this incomplete petition gives a fair representation of the state of feeling among the classes to which I have referred in the district on this subject?—So far as it goes; I cannot make more of it than it really is.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

1647. And you and your friends have on former occasions, as well as on this occasion, done your best to obtain as many signatures as you could?—We have used diligence.

1648. There was one answer which you gave, as to which I think you must have been under some misapprehension. It is Question 1240; “Mr. Stigant referred to the diminution and mitigation of venereal disease in the Chatham Union of late years”; I suppose you would admit the fact of that diminution, would you not?—I do not dispute his statement. I am not in Chatham.

1649. “And he attributed the improvement in that respect to the effect of the Acts alone; can you point out any other influence to which that diminution may have been fairly attributable?—(A.) Yes, I think that very much is due to the altered aspect of the military authorities towards the discouragement of the use of strong drink; that is to say, that up to just about the time when these Acts were passed there was a disposition on the part of the military authorities, for, of course, their own reasons, to discourage temperance societies being formed in the army.” Do you really mean to say that?—Yes, clearly up to a certain period.

1650. You do not mean to say that officers rather wished to see these men drunk?—Oh, dear, no.

1651. Do you mean to say they discouraged the advocacy of temperance opinions?—Temperance meetings. I am distinguishing now between ordinary temperance and abstinence from strong drink, and temperance meetings and temperance organisations and temperance societies. I am sure the Judge Advocate General will see the difference.

1652. If it was so all that I can say is that it is quite unknown to me. Was there a time, some 15 years ago, when officers and other persons connected with the army did their best to discourage the formation of temperance societies?—I am obliged to believe so; that is, they were looked coldly upon. I have lived in Chatham and felt deep interest in the temperance question for 48 years, and I should have been very glad to have done more in collecting the soldiers together and talking to them on this subject if it had not been for the discouragement.

1654. But you go further than that; you say that they, for their own reasons, discouraged temperance societies; what is the meaning of those words “for their own reasons,” because it is rather a strong indictment to bring against officers?—It is, and of course I would not dare to bring it without some occasion. I can, if necessary, give two proofs, one from the national temperance society fixing the date when the altered aspect of the military authorities towards the temperance work was found, that is, from the report of the National Temperance Society for 1870; and the other is a paper in “Public Opinion,” quoting from the “Broad Arrow.”

1655. Do you say that from papers before you it appears that it is the fact that up to a particular time time which synchronizes (to use your own word) with the passing of the Acts the military authorities discouraged temperance, and that from that time they encouraged it?—Not fixing it to a particular year, but to a year or two. For instance, I spoke of 1870 in another case, and the Regulation that I refer to is called, paragraph 362, Section 7 of the Queen's Regulations (the Regulations at the time of course), and the Regulation is this: Officers and non-commissioned officers and soldiers are forbidden to institute or take part in any meetings, demonstrations, or processions for party or political purposes in barracks, quarters, camp, or elsewhere." That it is argued in this paper was strained to forbid temperance meetings being held and temperance societies being formed. I fix that period as marking an increased approval of temperance work.

1656. But can you, of your own knowledge, say up to what time the soldiers were forbidden by the Queen's Regulation to attend temperance meetings, because it is quite new to me?—I do not say that they were forbidden; I know that we should have been very glad indeed to have held temperance meetings with soldiers if we could, but we could not up to a certain time.

1657. Do you actually say that the military authorities discouraged temperance societies by holding that under one of the Queen's Regulations, forbidding the soldiers to attend political or party meetings, they were prevented from attending temperance meetings?—It is stated broadly in this paper that I quote.

1658. From what time was permission given to attend these temperance meetings?—The favourable aspect of the authorities dates from about 1869 and 1870.

1659. Do you say that up to a certain time soldiers were forbidden to attend temperance meetings, and that from that particular time they were allowed to do so; I cannot show the prohibition, but I know that the work commenced from that time.

1660. You made a very definite charge against the military authorities, and I think that unless you can support it in some better way than this, you ought not to persist in it?—I still think that there is an altered aspect, comparing 1869 with 1880.

1661. I want to ask you a few questions about this case of Caroline Wybrow, which, if I remember rightly, happened about the year 1875; what was the precise date of her examination?—Late in January 1875.

1662. Of course you can refresh your memory by referring to your notes; can you tell me the precise time at which you took up this case?—Yes, it was very shortly after she was examined; I think I have the date exactly; for the present, I may say that it was very shortly after the 29th of February 1875.

1663. You say that you first became acquainted with the case in the year 1875?—Yes, shortly after her detention in the Lock Hospital.

1664. What steps did you take in the first instance, upon becoming acquainted with the case?—I went to a neighbour's, a man and wife, and asked if they would help me to have an interview with this girl and her mother.

1665. Can you give us the date of that interview?—Yes, I think I can. On the 17th of 0.75.

May 1875, I met the mother and daughter with a neighbour.

1666. That was three and a-half or four months after the event occurred?—Yes.

1667. Was that the first time that you were introduced to the mother and daughter?—Yes, I think so, according to my notes.

1668. When was the matter brought by you, or by anybody, before the authorities; I think not for nearly a year after that, was it?—Yes, in November of the same year.

1669. What were the steps taken in November?—In November she made her statutory declaration before a magistrate for the county.

1670. On what day in November?—On the 30th of November 1875.

1671. So that this statutory declaration was made more than 10 months after the event had occurred?—Ten months after.

1672. May I ask why all this was not done before?—I have many other duties to attend to. I do not think I lost time needlessly; I endeavoured to be diligent, but I had other things to do.

1673. In fact, it took you 10 months to get up this case; may I put it in that way?—Yes, it was 10 months before I was ready to go to the magistrate.

1674. You spoke of yourself as being retired from business, and as having no particular business or occupation?—I am out of commercial business now.

1675. But still it took you 10 months to get this case up?—Those were not my words.

1676. As a matter of fact 10 months passed before this statutory declaration was made?—There were a great many occasions for delay. One was that I heard counter statements made, and every counter statement required investigation. I might have found perhaps, at a very early stage of the matter that it was all a myth, and that I had better give up the trouble; so that I was anxious to sift every counter statement, and all that occupied time.

1677. Did it take you 10 months to find out that it was not a myth; this statutory declaration is only made on the 30th of November?—Just so.

1678. At any rate more than 10 months elapsed between the occurrence and the statutory declaration, which I understand is the foundation of your case against the metropolitan police?—Yes, you will remember the time when I heard of it; I could not move in it until I had heard of it.

1679. You did not hear of it until May?—Yes, it might be early in May.

1680. Am I right in saying that the next steps taken was to lay a complaint before the Home Office?—It was forwarded to the Home Office eventually.

1681. When was that done?—I cannot give the date of that, but I believe that there are documents that would show it, say January 1876.

1682. It was before the 31st of January 1876; so that in fact it comes to this, that the complaint of the treatment of this girl is not made to the Home Office until more than 12 months after the occurrence which led to that complaint?—Yes, my object was to move very deliberately and carefully, and I am not aware that I wasted a day; I did my best, and that is but little.

I

1683. You

Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

1683. You had, in fact, 370 days to do this, supposing that you dated it from the time when you ascertained the facts, which I think you said was about the beginning of May, you had at least 250 days, and out of those 250 days you did not waste one; is that so?—I am not conscious of having lost any time at all. Indeed, I thought there would be a great advantage in moving deliberately, if I did not want to be tripped up and lose my labour.

1684. You circulated a leaflet, did you not, upon this subject?—Yes.

1685. When was that?—At several different times. Several editions have been printed.

1686. Would you give me the date of the appearance of the first of these editions?—That would be soon after the replies from the Home Office.

1687. Could you give me the date of that?—I think that if I refer to my conversation with the doctors that will help me to the date, because the print was made very soon after the conversation with them. My interview with Dr. Jardine was on the 27th of September 1875.

1688. Then, in fact, this leaflet was circulated a month or so before the complaint was made to the Home Office; is that so?—No, not so; I feel confident that I printed no papers before the replies came from the Home Office.

1689. Could you refresh your memory by looking at your notes?—I do not know how I could find it out, but my general idea is that I was very deliberate indeed. I did not know how complete the answers might come from the Home Office, and therefore I might spare myself all the printing and trouble.

1690. That is why I asked you whether this leaflet which went through several editions was issued with your name attached before or after the complaint was addressed to the Home Office?—I feel sure it was after, because I waited to see the result of the application.

1691. Mr. Sloggett's report to the Secretary of the Admiralty was dated the 6th of July 1876?—I have not seen that document.

1692. You may take it from me that it was the 6th of July. Have you seen the statement of Dr. Jardine?—Yes.

1693. That is dated the 12th of February 1876, is it not?—Yes.

1694. Have you a copy of your leaflet?—Yes.

1695. Is there a date upon it?—No, it does not bear a date, I think (handing it to the Committee).

1696. I do not see any date upon it. I should be exceedingly glad if you could give me any idea when it was issued. Cannot you, speaking from your own recollection, tell me when the first edition was printed?—It certainly was not very long after the replies from the Home Office.

1697. I do not see that there is any reference to the report of Dr. Jardine. You cannot give me the date within a week of the issue of the leaflet?—No, but I think it is almost certain that I should wait very deliberately for the result of the application to the Home Office. I was always prepared to find that something might occur to enlighten me upon it.

1698. Having seen the report of Dr. Jardine, you issue this leaflet, in which you give what you call "An authenticated and shocking illustration of the working of the Contagious Diseases Acts." Having seen Dr. Jardine's statement, do you still say that this is an honest and fair account of this case?—At present that is my opinion, subject to anything that I can learn.

1699. Notwithstanding that you saw Dr. Jardine's report?—Yes.

1700. As I take it, the foundation of every statement in this leaflet is the statutory declaration of this girl and her mother, or had you any other evidence of any kind?—I think it mainly rests upon that; but I am not prepared to say that there is nothing else.

1701. Would you say what else there is?—I cannot say, but I think it mainly rests upon the statutory declaration.

1702. You have not communicated with the nurses or any of the hospital people who were present, have you?—No, only the two doctors.

1703. I think it is stated, or at least it is implied in your evidence, is it not, that Miss Webb gave five shillings to this girl?—I said that she gave it to the mother for the girl.

1704. As hush money?—No, I do not state that; I know that they thought it was hush money, they looked upon it in that way, but I do not designate it as such.

1705. Are you aware that there is a fund placed at Miss Webb's disposal by private charitable persons, by means of which she has for many years been able to assist numbers of young women to get into service?—I do not know it of my own knowledge, but I think it is very likely; I think that as a judicious woman, she would only give it to those that she thought specially deserved it.

1706. Did Mrs. Wybrow admit to you that she went to Miss Webb after those occurrences?—Yes.

1707. For what purpose did she go?—As I understand her, I think it was to ask for that which she thought was available in certain cases, namely, a supply of clothing, or money in place of clothing; and I think that is the object of the fund that has been spoken of to encourage servants to remain in their places.

1708. She went to Miss Webb to ask for pecuniary assistance?—Yes, she had heard that there was such a fund available, and she went to talk about it.

1709. At this time did she tell you that she had made any complaints of her daughter's having been improperly detained in hospital, or having been ill treated?—I know of nothing that passed between the woman and Miss Webb then.

1710. She did not tell you that she had made any complaint to Miss Webb of the improper treatment of her daughter, or of her improper detention?—Not to Miss Webb. Her complaint was made, I should think, to the doctors. She made her complaint; that is in the declaration.

1711. Did she make any complaint to Miss Webb?—Not that I am aware of.

1712. Do you know when she went to Miss Webb to ask for pecuniary assistance?—No, but it was after her liberation.

1713. Do you know how long after?—I cannot

24 March 1882.]

Mr. WHEELER.

not say; very shortly after, I think, because she went to work.

1714. She did not state to you that she made to Miss Webb any complaint of her daughter's improper treatment or improper detention?—I have not heard of it before, I believe; or if I have heard of it before, I have forgotten it.

1715. I understand that Mrs. Wybrow went to Miss Webb after her daughter had been discharged from the hospital, asked her for pecuniary assistance, and did not make any complaint as to the treatment or detention of her daughter, as far as you know; is that so?—So far as I know, she made no complaint. It was not an application for pecuniary assistance; it was to inquire about some clothing that she thought was available for girls when they undertake a situation in a family, as she tells me.

1716. Will you kindly tell me what Mrs. Wybrow, whom you saw, I think, several times after these occurrences, told you had passed between her and Miss Webb upon the occasion to which you refer?—She stated to me that she applied to Miss Webb to know whether she could have the clothing of which she had heard mention, seeing that her daughter was about to undertake a place in a family; and that Miss Webb, instead of giving her clothing, gave her two half-crowns. That is as far as I go. I can tell you no more about it.

1717. Did she state to you at that time that she had made any complaint to Miss Webb of the improper treatment of her daughter?—No, she did not; or if she did, it is entirely gone from me. I do not believe she did.

1718. I think you said that that interview between Miss Webb and Mrs. Wybrow, to which Mrs. Wybrow spoke, took place very soon after the discharge of her daughter from the hospital?—I think it was, without giving dates.

1719. That would probably be, would it not, because Miss Webb was doing her best to get the girl into a situation?—I do not think Miss Webb did anything; she gave her advice where to go, or something like that.

1720. Therefore, there was between that interview between Miss Webb and the girl's mother and the making of the statutory declaration an interval of at least eight months; is not that so?—It may be so, somewhere thereabouts.

1721. Were any complaints made by Mrs. Wybrow, to your knowledge, to the police or to the magistrates, or to any other person than yourself, of the treatment of the daughter?—I do not know of any except my own.

1722. Therefore, as far as you know, the first complaint made by these people, the girl and her mother, was made to you, and was made in May 1875?—In answer to my inquiries and previously to my informants, of course.

1723. But what put you upon the inquiries?—Because I heard that a girl had been detained in the hospital improperly by mistake, and that led me to make an inquiry on the spot.

1724. How did you get to hear this?—I heard it through a neighbour, a person living in that neighbourhood.

1725. That put you upon inquiry?—Yes.

0.75.

1726. Then you communicated with the girl and her mother?—Yes.

1727. And then, some six or seven months afterwards, this statutory declaration was made, and then again, about two months after that, the complaint was made to the Home Office; was not that so?—Everything was done very deliberately, that is manifest. I should have been very much to blame if I had acted hastily in a case of that kind, involving the proceedings of two medical men. I ought to be very careful. I saw them both first.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

1728. With regard to these Acts, I should like to know whether you are aware that considerations of humanity actuated many of those Members (of whom I was one) who supported these Acts on the first occasion, when they were introduced?—Far be it from me to judge of your benevolent motives.

1729. You will not perhaps be surprised to hear that we, who were actuated by these considerations of humanity, have not been disappointed in the results?—If you say so, I accept it as your view. You say what you believe.

1730. With regard to the influences which have been brought to bear upon these people, I understood you to admit to my honourable friend the Member for West Aberdeenshire, that much good had been done?—I admit that good in many cases comes out of evil.

1731. That is not an answer to my question?—I do not think I said "much good," but good has been done.

1732. I understood you to admit that in many respects the Acts have produced good results; did you say that or did you not?—I do not think I said "in many respects;" I think I said in several incidental cases.

1733. Did you say that the Acts had done good?—Good has come out of them; I do not think I said that they had done good.

1734. Do you say that the Acts have done good, or do you not?—They may have done good.

1735. Have they done good, or have they not?—It is a very large question indeed. If I answer conscientiously and straight, I say that I believe they have done more harm than good. That is not an answer, perhaps, but that is my answer. I do not want to be entrapped into any admission. I believe they have done more harm than good. That is an admission, as I understand it, that they may have done some good. Good may have been done without my being aware of it, some good that I have never learnt; and therefore I ought to give a cautious answer.

1736. In the first place, under these Acts have not influences which did not exist before, and which otherwise would not have existed, been brought to bear upon young girls?—Yes, no doubt about it.

1737. Are you aware that it is the practice of the metropolitan police employed in this duty to warn young girls whom they see entering on a course of prostitution?—I feel sure that they do sometimes, if they are men.

1738. They warn the girls?—Yes.

1739. Are

24 March 1882.]

Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

1739. Are you aware that it is their practice, under instructions from head quarters, to warn the girl's parents immediately upon finding a young girl entering on a course of prostitution?—I do not know that.

1740. Supposing that to be the practice, do you not consider that likely to do a great deal of good?—Yes; any one of us may do the same thing without an Act of Parliament.

1741. Are you aware that in certain subjected districts the local police have not instructions to do this?—I do not what their instructions are at all.

1742. Assuming that the Contagious Diseases Acts' police, as a practice, under instructions from their superiors, warn the parents and the ministers of the religious denominations to which the young girls belong, do you not think that that is a practice which is likely to lead to great good?—It is a very good practice indeed for any one to adopt, whether he is a policeman or not.

1743. Is it within your knowledge that the Contagious Diseases Acts' policemen act in this way?—I do not recollect a case having come to my knowledge; I might recollect a case but I do not at present.

1744. As regards treatment in hospitals, I do not recollect at this moment whether you told my right honourable friend whether you had ever been in a Lock hospital?—Twice.

1745. How long ago was the last time?—Seven or eight years, perhaps, speaking without books, but I can refer to dates, if necessary.

1746. Practically you have no extensive knowledge of the work that is carried on in lock hospitals?—No, not an extensive knowledge, unless it be by hearsay or by reading.

1747. You have of late years no practical knowledge of the system that is carried on with regards to these women in the lock hospitals?—Not from my own observation; I have not been inside one lately.

1748. With regard to the alleged indecent behaviour in the streets on the part of the women when they go to the examination, I understood you to say that you had on two occasions personally been present?—I have been present on occasions when they have been going to and from the examination room.

1749. Some of them, you told the Committee, conduct themselves with great decency?—I did not use the word "great."

1750. Were all the 40 that you saw go indecent in their behaviour?—No.

1751. What proportion of them should you say were indecent?—It is very difficult to speak to the number.

1752. Not many of them, perhaps?—No, there were not so very many that were indecent.

1753. Only a few?—Certainly the smaller proportion.

1754. They knew you by sight, I suppose?—I am not sure; I cannot tell; they might.

1755. Some of them must have known you on account of the very unfitting and improper remarks that they made concerning you?—It looks like it. They must have been told something, I think.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

1756. Do you not think that your presence on that occasion might, perhaps, have aggravated their conduct?—It might have led to those remarks certainly, but not to the other things of which I complain.

1757. And if you had not been there there would probably have been less uproarious conduct?—That remark would not have been made. My presence did not lead to other things, though.

1758. I understand that this particular act of indecency which you allege against one of these women was that of rolling or falling on the ground with a carter; why did you not have the carter and this woman charged with an indecent act; there was a remedy in your own hands?—I did not think it was my duty to do that.

1759. They might have been punished for that; why did you not take steps to have them punished?—I had no idea that it was my business to do that. I came intending to make my observations and to go quietly home.

1760. And you did not inform the local police that any of these scenes were taking place?—No.

1761. You took no steps whatever to put the local authorities in possession of the facts as to these alleged acts of indecency?—No; I went for information, nothing else.

1762. Going back for a moment to the condition of the prostitutes, I think you told the Committee that they are much better off at the present day than they were?—They are better dressed.

1763. And better off, I think you said?—Very likely so. They have more money in their pockets, I think; they earn more.

1764. And, therefore, their condition in that way, you say, is improved, and their condition of health has been improved also?—I cannot speak to that; I know that cleanliness leads to good health.

1765. Do you not know, as a matter of fact, that before these Acts were passed a number of these women were suffering terribly from disease?—I should expect so.

1766. Do you not know that they were almost dropping to pieces with disease?—No; I do not dispute it.

1767. You do not dispute that as regards health the condition of the women is much ameliorated since the passing of the Acts?—In the case of some of them, unquestionably, I think.

1768. You told my honourable friend, did you not, that you considered that prostitution was an evil that could not be got rid of?—It is not to be got rid of by these laws, if that is what is meant.

1769. I certainly understood you to say that prostitution had existed in all times?—No, I was quoting the opinion of persons with whom I converse. I am continually met with that: "Prostitution always was and always will be." I do not believe it.

1770. Is it not your opinion that the conditions of health of prostitutes have been greatly improved since the passing of these Acts?—It is possible in the case of those who are licensed and registered.

1771. You

1771. You have told us that one of your objections to this system is the co-operation of the police?—Yes, that is my main objection.

1772. The Right honourable Gentleman put this question to you at No. 1232 when you were last examined: "I understand that, in your opinion, this kind of open relationship and co-operation between the brothel keepers and the police has a very bad moral influence." I do not quite understand what is meant by an "open relationship and co-operation between the brothel keepers and the police;" will you explain what that means?—Their constant visitation to these houses, not in the sense of reproof but in the way of conducting the business.

1773. How do you know that there is no reproof?—I learn it from Captain Harris's Report for 1878, and from the statement also of this brothel keeper with whom I conversed.

1774. But how do you know that he is a brothel keeper, because I am informed that he is not a brothel keeper?—Not John and Fanny Ware! If he is not I have something to learn. When I called upon him I thought I ought to say something to introduce myself, and I said: "There was a girl a few days ago who, on her way from your place to the examination, sunk on the road and was removed to the union house and died in four hours" (her name was Oswell; I forget the first name). He said: "Yes, she died from drink." Then I think I said, "And from other vice?" And the brother keeper or his wife said, "Yes." I cannot distinguish between the two, because they both joined in the conversation. So that I knew from that that it was a brothel, and that this was only one of his women.

1775. But how do you know that this woman had not been lodging there?—She had been lodging there.

1776. A woman who engages in prostitution to a certain extent more or less may lodge in a house; but that is no reason why the house in which she lodges should be called a brothel?—I know, so far as one can know anything of this kind, that it is by repute a brothel, and that this was one of the women on her way to the examination, and that the man and the woman both say that the visits of the Contagious Diseases Acts' detectives to that house are sometimes made three times a week and sometimes three times a day, just as they may find it necessary to look after the women.

Chairman.

1777. When you speak of the detectives, do you mean the Contagious Diseases Acts' detectives?—Yes.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

1778. How do you know that the Contagious Diseases Acts police visit that house?—The man and his wife tell me so; and more than that, they go up into the bedrooms without a warrant.

1779. That rests upon his statement?—Yes, his and his wife's. That makes it out a brothel, I think, clearly.

1780. Do you know why the police visit these houses?—Yes.

1781. It is to try and find any women who are not upon the register, is it not?—Captain Harris says that it is for the purpose of warning women to attend to examination, and for conducting the women to examination, if they have been declared diseased by the visiting surgeon, and for that alone.
0.75.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

1782. Are you aware that it is also for the purpose of warning young persons who are entering upon a career of prostitution?—That does not appear upon Captain Harris's statement. He declares what the sole object of the visit is.

1783. With regard to the case of Caroline Wybrow, about which my Right honourable friend asked you, you are responsible for this paper, I understand; your name is signed to it?—Yes; if I did not write it all, I will be responsible for it until I am further instructed.

1784. In the third paragraph there occurs this statement: "Hundreds of terrified girls have signed this crafty form under the threat and terror of imprisonment"; what is your authority for that statement?—I cannot say other than that I believe it.

1785. You have no authority for it?—I could not refer to a hundred cases.

1786. Can you refer to one?—Yes.

1787. Are you a member of the Society for the Repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Yes, I belong to the National Association.

1788. Are you a subscriber to it?—Yes.

1789. Are you aware that there has lately been an active distribution of these leaflets?—Yes.

1790. Especially in Canterbury?—Most likely.

1791. Are you aware that these leaflets and other similar ones, containing details, which I will not characterise as regards decency, have been delivered openly at the houses of respectable people?—No, I am not aware of that; you are speaking of Canterbury; I live at Chatham.

1792. Would you approve of such a practice as that of giving away these papers open, to fall into the hands of young girls?—I am careful to avoid that result.

Chairman.

1793. Do you approve of it, or do you not?—I do not approve of their being given to young girls, and I am careful to avoid it.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

1794. Now let us go back to these "hundreds of terrified girls who have signed this crafty form under the threat and terror of imprisonment;" can you tell me the name of any one terrified girl who has signed this form under the threat and terror of imprisonment?—No; I cannot name any cases at present except this one that we have before us.

1795. Then, putting it in the very mildest phraseology, that statement is wholly incorrect?—No; I do not say that.

1796. You sign this "Frederic Wheeler;" the title is "Authenticated and shocking illustration;" and one of the most important paragraphs is this: "Hundreds of terrified girls have signed this crafty form under the threat and terror of imprisonment;"

24 March 1882.]

imprisonment;" and when I ask you to substantiate it by one single case, and not by hundreds, you say you cannot; and yet you will not admit that the statement is incorrect?—The one that is before us is the only one that is substantiated by name; but I think I have read of very many, and I have no doubt that I could call many to mind.

1797. If you refer to this "Authenticated and shocking illustration," the inference is, is it not, that there was nothing at all the matter with this girl, and that the girl was entirely free from any sort of venereal disease whatever on her first attending the hospital?—I think so.

1798. Are you aware that Mr. William Weld, surgeon major and chief medical officer, on the 12th of February, writes as follows: "When examined by me," (that is referring to the girl) "on the 1st of February (only indifferently), I found she was suffering from a copious thick discharge which to all appearance had the character of a gonorrhœal one"?—Yes; I have that letter here.

1799. Do you believe that statement to be true?—I am obliged to receive it as he presents it. He says he writes that relying entirely upon his own recollections after the lapse of 12 months, with no books or notes to refer to. He does not say that there is no book or note to refer to, but it appears that there are none, and he says that he relies entirely upon his own recollection, after the lapse of 12 months.

1800. Then you do not believe that what the doctor says is true?—I receive it with great caution under those circumstances. He makes me cautious from the way in which he puts it. You would not receive my statement in that way.

1801. I only ask you whether you believe him or disbelieve him?—Does that question involve the whole of the letter, or that particular point?

1802. Do you believe or disbelieve the statement of Mr. Weld, that she was suffering from a copious thick discharge which from its appearance had the character of a gonorrhœal one?—I would not dispute that. He says, "Which to all appearance had the character of a gonorrhœal one."

1803. If you will kindly turn to page 2 of the leaflet, these are the alleged events of Friday, 5th February: "The scene that followed was such as cannot be printed. Their mistake is discovered; she is no prostitute, but a virgin." What is your authority for that statement?—I do not think that is in this edition, but I have no objection to be responsible for that statement.

1804. If that is withdrawn that is all I want?—I do not withdraw it; I say I am responsible for it. "The scene that followed cannot be suitably printed." I believe that is overleaf.

1805. Are you aware that that statement is absolutely denied by both those medical gentlemen?—No.

1806. Supposing that Dr. Jardine and Mr. Weld, both of them, state positively that this girl was not a virgin, would you receive their statement as correct?—I should like to hear them state the grounds on which they make the assertion.

1807. Will you be good enough to tell the

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

Committee what are the exact grounds, so far as you know, upon which that statement is founded?—In the first place the girl's statutory declaration, in which she solemnly avers twice that she has never known a soldier or any other man, in one phraseology or another.

Chairman.

1808. Are there any other grounds for your statement?—Yes.

1809. What are they?—Another ground is that I learnt from professional medical men that a digital examination would give pain in the case of a virgin, if I may say that without being required to mention the names of them. The woman says that he did give her pain, Dr. Jardine's statement to the contrary notwithstanding; and I think the woman was the best judge. Again, I find that in nine months and a few days after her marriage, she becomes a mother. Those are the grounds upon which I think I am justified in saying that she was a virgin. I think, further, that it is not denied, either in the letter of Dr. Jardine or Mr. Weld.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

1810. This case of Caroline Wybrow took place as long ago as 1875, did it not; have you known of any cases of the same kind since?—No.

1811. Have you known any cases of injustice to women in that way since?—I am not here to state any cases. I have heard of cases, but I have never investigated them. This one I did investigate, and it was a deal of trouble.

1812. Have you ever heard of cases of the molestation of respectable women by the Contagious Diseases Acts' police?—I cannot name any at present from memory, and I have no wish to do so.

1813. You have not known any cases of misconduct on the part of the police, either towards prostitutes or towards respectable women, in the last few years?—I could not answer point-blank "No" to that, though at present I am not ready to give any cases.

1814. Cannot you try and recall some of those cases?—No, I cannot indeed, for six years, and I will not attempt it. I should very likely say something imprudently.

1815. I will ask you now a question which you need not answer, unless you please. On the part of a great number of very religious persons there is a strong objection to these Acts on the ground that venereal disease is what is called a "God-made punishment for vice," and that they are an attempt on the part of man to abrogate a penalty that it has pleased God to put upon vice; do you hold that doctrine or not?—No, I do not hold that. I am doing all I can to alleviate the sufferings of mankind in this way apart from Contagious Diseases Acts.

Mr. Hopwood.

1816. You were asked about Mr. Stigant referring to your having applied to him as a brother dissenter; did you ever apply to him in that sense?—Never; I never speak to anybody in that sense.

1817. As I understand you met him or you travelled with him somewhere, and you took his opinion opinion upon these Acts?—Yes, I was going the same way as he was, in a cab, and I asked him to get up and ride with me.

1818. And you found that he differed from you, or was beginning to differ from you, at that time?—I think he gave a hesitating answer.

1819. In applying yourself to the study of this matter, and to the observance of the effect of these laws, have you had any other motive or object than that of performing the duty of a good citizen?—No; and as being bound to support every good law, and being bound to secure the repeal of every bad one; that is my idea.

1820. And you have applied yourself throughout with that object?—Yes.

1821. Have you been careful and slow in deliberation in the reception of facts, and tracing them as facts?—Very cautious.

1822. Have you given many hours, and may I say days or weeks, to this question?—Yes, no doubt.

1823. And you have made it your business not to shrink from unpleasant contact with bad characters, such as prostitutes, and so on, in your desire to obtain the real facts that might guide your judgment?—Yes; it was needful, sometimes.

1824. You were asked whether you were a member of a local board or town council; do you know any facilities for observing these things that a member of a local board or town council would have which are superior to those which you have had?—No; I think we have pretty much all alike the same access to facts.

1825. But you, as I understand it, have had more leisure, for you have not been in business, either public or otherwise?—Yes; I have taken great pains, perhaps as much as anyone, to understand it.

1826. You were asked (I do not know whether any offence was meant by it or not) whether you are a mere volunteer; are you a mere volunteer in the sense that any other citizen is who seeks to labour publicly for the good of his country?—That is my position, I believe, strictly.

1827. You have been inside a Lock hospital two or three times; have you offered to go more than those two or three times?—Yes; once I went and was shut out. It was to see a Jewess, with a Wesleyan minister.

1828. But you were refused admission?—Yes.

1829. And after that, probably you have never applied again?—No, I think not.

1830. You were asked about the ministrations of the chaplains doing good and the singing and the praying; did it strike you that there were other matters connected with the hospital that might produce an opposite effect; take the question of curing them for their profession or trade?—Clearly; that was always before me.

1831. Was that something which to your mind more than nullified the impression made by the good influences?—Yes, clearly. The result is bad.

1832. When you were asked whether these Acts had produced any good, do I rightly understand you that as regards the occasional ministrations of the chaplain, or the occasional influence.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

ences in the hospital, they may do good, but that on the whole the effect is bad?—Yes, bad in every way as a whole.

1833. Is that the sense in which you answer that the Acts have done more harm than good?—Yes, that is what I mean.

1834. In saying that the Acts do more harm than good, are you speaking of the effects only on the prostitute class, or upon society at large?—Upon society generally.

1835. I understand you to repudiate the idea that you have ever had any notion that because this was a disease which followed upon gross indulgence, therefore it was not to be cured by the best human means?—I am constantly doing all I can in my little way, subscribing to hospitals where such disease is treated; such as Bartholomew's Hospital, and a number of others.

1836. As to the reduction of disease either at Rochester or Chatham, if that be so it is attributable to the employment of State surgeons at the State expense, and would not the same effect be produced by hospitals supplied by private agency?—I think the same result is obtained, and a better result in fact.

1837. You were asked about unregistered prostitutes, and how you know them to be unregistered prostitutes; do I correctly understand you to say that you have no official means of information, but that you use the same intelligence that any other resident in a town does?—Yes.

1838. And you notice that there is a large class which, in your judgment, ekes out its living, supplementing it by prostitution?—Yes, I am obliged to believe that from what I hear more than from what I observe.

1839. You were asked about public opinion in regard to these Acts at Chatham; have there been petitions sent up from Chatham to the House annually, or nearly annually?—Yes, for a number of years past; I think every Session of Parliament.

1840. Largely signed?—Largely signed.

1841. And the one with which you are now proceeding is not yet complete?—No.

1842. But have a considerable proportion of the signatures to that been affixed at your request, and in your presence?—Yes, the first 90.

1843. Are others proceeding to increase the number of signatures to the petition in other directions?—I have a roll already in, and others are calling upon persons.

1844. Then, to assume that four magistrates, and three town councillors, were all that were going to sign, would be a very unfair assumption?—Yes, I expect others; I intend to call upon a number.

1845. Even as to the proportion of the clergy that have already signed, it would be a very unfair assumption that those are all whose signatures you hope to obtain?—I hope to get a great many more, and I have left a blank on purpose.

1846. As to officers discouraging temperance, it seems to shock someone who asked you; but was it the fact that formerly many officers of the army did discourage temperance societies?—I believe so, from what I have read; certainly.

1847. And you find that stated (and you were giving us some references) by some society?—

I 4

Yes.

24 March 1882.]

Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

Yes. The papers that I was about reading state the fact.

1848. Returning to the case of Caroline Wybrow, did you see the mother and daughter a number of times?—Several times.

1849. And did you inquire about them from neighbours?—Yes.

1850. And did you arrive at a judgment as to the truthfulness of the two women in relation to these statements?—Yes.

1851. Were you firmly convinced of the truthfulness of the two women?—Yes. I cannot recollect anything that ought to induce me to think them false.

1852. As a matter of fact the mother did get at some time two half-crowns from Miss Webb?—Yes. If there is anything at all that impugns truthfulness on the part of the girl it occurred at a later period than this.

1853. You were asked why, because you learnt as to the two Wares, that a prostitute lived there; you called it a brothel; do you observe that the reason given by the police for saying that Caroline Wybrow was in a brothel was that there was a prostitute resident there?—Yes, it is a very singular statement. I know that the policeman says that he found her in a brothel; but it admits of a very different aspect when it is explained.

1854. When you are asked about the good condition of the prostitutes I think your answer is that they have more money in their pockets; may I ask whether the trade is apparently more flourishing and more profitable?—Yes, I think so.

1855. With regard to hundreds of terrified girls having signed this form, are you aware that, in the first place, and for a considerable time, the orders of the police were, by authority, to tell girls that they must sign, under penalty of going to gaol, and that that order was withdrawn by the Admiralty. I quite understand that from what I read.

1856. Does that convey to your mind the probability that hundreds of girls might be terrified, and were terrified, into signing the submission?—Yes; and it is also confirmed by the statement that comes from Scotland Yard of a very large number of girls that have been examined without any application to the magistrates; and, therefore, I conclude that some other influence must have been used, and I think that is the influence, the threat.

1857. You find it difficult to believe that girls would give up their liberty unless they were coerced by some such pressure?—I think so.

1858. And, finding that so many submit, you draw the inference that a good many are terrified into it?—Yes, I think it is done under pressure.

1859. With regard to the girl Wybrow, I see that the statement by Mr. Weld is not that she was diseased, but that she had a discharge, to all appearance of the character of a gonorrhoeal one; I believe you saw both those gentlemen afterwards?—Yes.

1860. Did either of them deny that this girl was a virgin. Just take Mr. Weld first: what did he say?—I had better refer to my notes of that. About the 25th of October 1875, in front of his residence, Clarendon Villa, I spoke to him of the Wybrow case, and he replied, "A man may make a mistake once in his life."

1861. What did you say to him in regard to the Wybrow case?—I complained that this girl had been examined wrongfully, and made a prisoner.

1862. Did you say anything about her turning out to be an honest girl or a virtuous girl?—I do not recollect all the conversation that took place. The only note that I have made that was relevant to the point was that, I think.

1863. That a man may make a mistake sometimes?—Yes, once in his life; and he turned round on his heel, and left rather promptly, I think.

1864. He was not inclined to discuss the matter at all?—I judge so.

1865. Did you see the other gentleman, Dr. Jardine, about it?—Yes.

1866. Do you remember what reference you made to this case when you saw him?—Yes, I introduced the case very much in the same way. I complained that this girl had been imprisoned and treated as a prostitute, when I believed that she was not so. The conversation was not confined entirely to that point.

1867. You have a memorandum there, as you have in Mr. Weld's case?—Yes; when I stated the case, he said, "I recollect the case; I promised her that I would not use the instrument. Dr. Weld felt undecided about the disease, and they determined (that is, he and Dr. Weld together) to see her together; they did so. She had a discharge but no disease. Miss Webb pitied her, and gave her money, or something. The girl exaggerates. I always have the assurance of the police that they have explained the voluntary submission. They are, as Mr. Childers says, extremely prudent and careful; but in this case the blame rests with the police." The rest is irrelevant.

1868. What is the date of that?—That is the 23rd of December 1875.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1869. That was before the complaint was made to the Home Office?—I should think it was certain to be. I should not make a complaint to the Home Office without seeing these gentlemen first.

Mr. Hopwood.

1870. As to the girl exaggerating, what was Dr. Jardine referring to; had you told him what the girl said?—I cannot tell now what it refers to.

1871. Do you think that she had or had not at that time made her declaration?—Yes, she had made her declaration then.

1872. Did you take any pains, or did anybody, to your knowledge, take any pains to place the declaration before Dr. Jardine or Mr. Weld?—I do not think that I showed him the declaration, but I endeavoured to explain the leading points of it, both to him and to the other doctor. It was a courtesy that was due to them.

1873. Was it part of her assertion and her mother's assertion that she was a virgin at that time?

24 March 1882.]

Mr. WHEELER.

time?—Yes, clearly, in the declaration. It was the mother's assertion so far as she could assert it.

1874. To your mind does this promise not to use an instrument confirm that; that the doctor was informed that she was a virgin, and that he avoided using the instrument?—No, not on that ground, I think.

1875. But the declaration was sent to the Home Office, and I dare say we may assume that it was submitted to both of the doctors?—Yes, because they both replied.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

1876. What I wanted to know was whether you could help me to the date, or the time, or the fact of whether your interview with the doctors was after the declaration had gone to the Home Office or not?—That is easily seen by the papers.

1877. As far as we can see here, it was not until the January following, about a month after the interview with the doctors?—That is quite likely.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. FREDERIC WHEELER, re-called ; and further Examined.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1878. Do you think that by altering the hours and possibly the place of these examinations, the scenes to which you have very properly called attention might be prevented?—Not prevented altogether, but certainly a certain amount of scandal might be removed.

1879. Have you any suggestion to make upon that point?—No, not any. I hope to see them entirely removed.

Mr. William Fowler.

1880. You were asked, with regard to the distinction that you drew between the effect of examination upon a woman when made by her medical adviser, and with her own consent, in the ordinary course of medical practice, and the effect of examination against her will, with the object of procuring her freedom from disease for the purpose of enabling her to carry on the trade of prostitution. I do not think that the answer that you gave was altogether clear. If I understood correctly what you meant, it was this : that there is all the difference in the world in the moral effect of such an examination according to the circumstances in which it is made ; is that what you mean?—Yes ; and I could not imagine that there is any parallel with this in ordinary life.

1881. You mean no parallel with the examination as ordered by these Acts?—Just so. There is no choice of doctors, no choice of time ; it is done under duress or confinement, and the woman has to be examined every fourteen days, whether she is healthy or sick. I know of no parallel, and believe that I shall never find one.

1882. It comes to this, does it not, that in the one case it is done with the object of procuring a cure of the disease for the purpose of ordinary life, and in order to restore health ; in the other case it is merely done with the object of securing health, not for the benefit of the woman, but for the benefit of those who consort with her especially?—I understand it so, clearly, and the women declared it to be so on examination day, 29th July 1881.

1883. That is the idea which underlies the Acts?—Yes, to render prostitution innocuous, to use a common expression.

Mr. William Fowler—continued.

1884. You spoke in answer, I think, to the honourable Member for West Aberdeenshire, at Question 1483, about the deterrent effect of the examinations upon the women. I did not quite clearly understand what you meant by that. You are asked this : “ In fact, assuming for the sake of argument the hardening process, you would admit that these examinations have a deterrent effect upon the women, deterring them from vice ? ” And your answer is : “ Yes ; in some cases I think it may be so ; in other cases it may act strongly the other way, I think ? ”—My meaning was that I think if it is deterrent to any extent from vice, it acts to a much greater extent in promoting concealment, the concealment of vice, and therefore tending to clandestine prostitution. That was my idea.

1885. You mean that the woman, being afraid of coming under this (to her) obnoxious examination, would take care and conceal the fact that she was so engaged?—Just so. Everybody knows that the moment a policeman is looking after me, my aim is to evade him. Again : if I were disposed to go to Chatham for once, an exception to my usual life, in order to indulge in vice, should I go to one of these licensed persons ? No ; I should go to a private practitioner, for reasons which all can understand. Hence the great demand there is for clandestine prostitutes.

1886. I think the honourable Member put a question to you something like this : if it be a fact that a soldier prefers a woman who is registered, and who, therefore, is assumed to be more safe, how can you account for the increase which you allege to exist in clandestine prostitution ? Do you recollect that question?—I think there was a question of that kind ; but if it operates to any extent in the way suggested, I think it operates much more extensively in the other direction.

1887. That is to say, does it not come to this ; that the woman hiding her profession and being very anxious to conceal the fact that she is so engaged, is less likely to consult a doctor than she otherwise would be?—Yes, clearly ; I have abundant testimony of that.

1888. Would not the effect of that be, taking the circle of women outside the Act, that their health would be rather worse than it otherwise would be, inasmuch as that they would not be so careful over their own health, for fear of exposing the fact of their profession?—The very concealment tends to exacerbate the disease.

1889. So that it might turn out really, might it not, that while so far as the registered women were concerned, there was a better state of health so far as the unregistered body, who were in many cases at any rate a very large body, were concerned, their state of health would be worse than under the ordinary system?—Clearly, from the concealment.

1890. That concealment, leading to an absence of taking medical advice at the right time?—Neglected disease.

1891. You gave a very strong opinion, as I understood it, that whatever the cause might be (you have indicated, at any rate, in your opinion, one cause), clandestine prostitution had not decreased in your district?—It has increased, is my opinion.

1892. Of course no statistics can possibly be given as to that?—No, because it is clandestine prostitution.

1893. You based it partly upon observation and partly upon what you had heard from others; is not that so?—Yes.

1894. I do not ask, of course, for figures in that case, because it is obviously impossible to give them?—Yes.

1895. You were asked by the honourable Member for West Aberdeenshire also, I think, with regard to what is called the stamping out of prostitution, and you expressed, I think, no very clear opinion as to the possibility of stamping it out, or as to the advisability of so doing if it could be done. I think there was a definite question asked you, whether you thought it would be in the interest of the morals of the community to make a law stamping it out; but is it not a fact that the present law, except as modified by these Acts, contemplates the putting down of prostitution?—Yes, all houses of prostitution.

1896. The law, so far as it goes, is not a law of regulation, but a law of prohibition?—Clearly; excepting only the Contagious Diseases Acts.

1897. And supposing that you have an admitted evil or crime, is it not the general principle of our law to prohibit the evil and not to regulate it?—Invariably, as I understand it.

1898. And you would disapprove of any attempt to regulate the evil; you prefer a law which would endeavour to prohibit the evil?—The regulation inevitably involves a sanction.

1899. But you did not express a very clear opinion as to the moral effect of the stamping out or prohibition of prostitution?—I should have said if I had had a little more time to deliberate, "At present I cannot study that question with respect to constructive legislation for putting down prostitution. My present object is as much as possible to secure the repeal of this law, because it is so clear to me that it increases and encourages the evil." I say, first, cease to do evil, and then learn to do well.

1900. Supposing that you could, by constructive legislation, as you call it, or destructive legislation, put down every house of prostitution in Chatham, would you or would you not think that an advisable step?—That is the aim of the law generally, and a very proper one, in my estimation.

Mr. William Fowler—continued.

1901. That is to say, that the morals of the neighbourhood would be benefited rather than injured if that was done?—I certainly think so.

1902. There was another point which I do not think you were quite clear about. You said I think that there was an improvement in the character of the streets; that is to say, the streets were not so disorderly as they were formerly?—Yes, I think I said that.

1903. You do not attribute that to the Act?—By no means.

1904. To what do you attribute it?—To such influences as the 233 cases of conviction of women for indecent and unbecoming behaviour in the streets.

1905. You mean before the magistrates?—Before the magistrates; with a larger number, as I believe, of prosecutions of men.

1906. That is to say, you attribute it to the action of the ordinary police regulations, and not to the action of this handful of police sent down for the purposes of this Act?—Just so.

1907. Do you know how many of the ordinary police you have in your district?—No, I have not any very definite idea.

1908. What is the population?—The population of the three or four towns, together within the limits of this district under the Contagious Diseases Acts, is 70,000 at a guess. Within that population of 70,000, there are all the police belonging to the city of Rochester, and they are very effective. May I say, in connection with the police of Rochester, that they have a very effective bye-law that operates in the city in relation to indecent words or conduct.

1909. That is as regards indecent conduct in the streets?—Yes.

1910. But that does not apply in Chatham, because it is not an incorporated borough?—No.

1911. You spoke a good deal in your original evidence, I think, about what you may call the relations of the police to the brothel keepers?—I did.

1912. Something was said about that in cross-examination. I think I clearly understood you to say, that your objection to that is, that it affords a quasi sanction to the business, because the police are in continual and sometimes almost daily intercourse with the brothel keepers, and obtaining information from them, not with the idea of at all stopping their business, but with the idea of seeing that they do not harbour any diseased persons, and of taking care that they know all the people who are in their houses. Is not that the idea?—Yes, to see that the thing is properly conducted.

1913. That is to say, that the police appointed by the law are dealing with offenders against the law, because that is really what it comes to?—Yes, against such laws as the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 5.

1914. They are dealing with offenders against the general law, which is opposed to prostitution, as if they were not offenders for this purpose?—Just so.

K 2

1915. And

28 March 1882.]

Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. William Fowler—continued.

1915. And they are officers of the law, in a certain sense, conniving at an offence against the law?—Yes; and I ought to say, in addition to what I stated before, that feeling this difficulty, I have conversed with the chaplain of the Lock Hospital and with Inspector Nutt on the subject; and I learned from them the opinion that anything in the way of remonstrance against this illegal and immoral trade would be incompatible with the purpose of their duty; that it would interrupt the smooth working of their office.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1916. Who told you that?—The chaplain was one, Henry J. Boys, he who wrote the letter that I spoke of in "The Times," and the other is Inspector Nutt; they both assure me that anything in the way of remonstrance on the part of these men when they go to visit these houses would be incompatible with their purpose in going.

Mr. William Fowler.

1917. Who is Inspector Nutt?—Inspector Nutt, of the Contagious Diseases Acts police.

1918. Is he the head of the Contagious Diseases Acts police?—Under the superintendent of the police in the dockyard.

1919. Then the inspector is the next in command to him?—Yes.

Mr. Hanbury-Tracy.

1920. Has the superintendent in the dockyard anything to do with the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Yes. Superintendent Smith is over the Contagious Diseases Acts' police, with an office in the dockyard. The superintendent of the dockyard is Rear Admiral G. W. Watson, R.N.

Mr. William Fowler.

1921. Then he has an inspector under him, who reports to him?—Yes.

1922. And this man, having that official position, has expressed, in fact, the opinion that he cannot remonstrate with the brothel keepers, because that would disturb his business?—Yes, and he draws a parallel; he says, "If a carter is called upon to deliver goods, and departs from his duty, and leaves his horse and cart, you see that would be wrong;" he endeavours to set up a parallel, but I do not see it.

1923. Nor do I?—No, it is a failure; there is no analogy.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1924. Are you aware, with reference to Nurse Wallis, that before September 1872 she was discharged from the Lock Hospital, at which she was a nurse, for improper conduct?—No, I was not aware of that.

1925. I think you said that you did not know under what circumstances she left?—I did.

1926. With regard to Mrs. Dowsett, are you aware that she was a nurse on probation only at Chatham?—No, I was not aware of that until now.

1927. You are, no doubt, right in saying that she discharged herself; but are you aware that she left on being reproved by the matron for irregularity of conduct in reference to some other occurrence?—I do not understand exactly what occurred, but I believe there was some difference of view between the authorities and her, and that led perhaps to her resigning.

1928. But you are not aware, are you, that the cause of her discharging herself was, that she was reprimanded or reproved by the matron for some irregularity of which she had been guilty?—I know that there was a point in dispute between the authorities and her.

1929. You do not know that she left because she was reprimanded or reproved for irregularity of conduct?—I understand that she left on account of this discrepancy of view between herself and the authorities at the hospital.

1930. Who told you that?—She did.

1931. She said that she left on account of a discrepancy of view?—She did not say those words, but that was the substance.

1932. She did not give you to understand that she had left because she was reprimanded for some irregularity?—No; but she admitted her complaint against them, and their complaint against her.

Mr. William Fowler.

1933. At Question No. 1758, you were asked this: "Why did you not have the carter and this woman charged with an indecent act; there was a remedy in your own hands?" And you say: "I did not think it was my duty to do that;" I did not quite understand that?—Clearly I did not think it was my duty for these reasons; in the first place I went there that morning for the purpose of testing the accuracy of Mr. Stigant's evidence with respect to the unbroken order and decency that prevailed on those occasions; and having assumed that post of observation, and being still desirous of collecting the information that I might make no mistake, I felt inclined to retain my position. In the next place I should have to walk a long way to get a policeman, for there was not one of the ordinary policemen in sight. I had reason to believe that there were two or three of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police within the walls of the hospital, for I believe they are always there on examination days, and I think I had seen them go up; but if I had attempted to give this man and woman in charge at the time, I should have remembered that which is rather singular and applicable to the case, that Superintendent Coppinger of the Kent County Police declared before the magistrate on the 13th of this month in a case of alleged indecent assault, that the police under the Contagious Diseases Acts do not act in police cases.

1934. That means, I presume, that they have no power to take up people in ordinary police cases?—They do not do it at all events, and I suppose they have no power; I do not find any power in the Act. I can give the date of these things, if necessary.

General Burnaby.

1935. With reference to some answers that you gave on the last occasion to the Right honourable Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven, inasmuch as you have admitted that that statement in Leaflet D., viz., that "hundreds of terrified girls have signed this crafty form under the threat and terror of imprisonment," cannot be proved proved to be true, I wish to ask whether you would do your best to get that portion of the statement withdrawn?—If I find that it cannot be sustained, I shall withdraw it most happily. We only seek the truth.

1936. From reading the evidence you gave upon the last occasion, I understand that you distinctly state that you cannot prove it to be true, except in this one single instance; whereas your statement in the paper which bears your name, that “hundreds of terrified girls signed this crafty form,” is a very different thing from one girl?—I believe it is true; but I was not prepared at the moment to give the proof in facts.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1937. Are you prepared now to give the proof?—No, I am not; I think it will come by-and-bye. I shall have to show by-and-bye the grounds that I have for the statement.

Chairman.

1938. Are you prepared to-day to prove that statement?—Yes, I am prepared to show the grounds for believing this statement to be true.

General Burnaby.

1939. There is a statement bearing your signature in which you say: “Hundreds of terrified girls have signed this crafty form under the threat and terror of imprisonment,” and only one case is mentioned; hundreds is a very vague term, and leaves the public to imagine that it applies to a very large number of people; do you know when this was circulated?—Quite recently, and I am responsible for it.

1940. Then the test would be easily applied; at Question 1785, one of the members of the Committee asks you this: “You have no authority for it?” and your answer is: “I could not refer to a hundred cases;” the next question is: “Can you refer to one?” and your answer is, “Yes;” can you now refer to any more cases?—I can refer, if this is the proper time, to the statements that I have read on which that opinion is based.

1941. This is a serious statement to make and to put your name to, that “hundreds of these terrified girls have been induced to sign this crafty form under the threat and terror of imprisonment;” your attention was called to this when you were last examined, and I take it that it is natural that you would have done something in the meantime to ascertain how you could clear this up by reference to some memoranda from whence you derived it?—I should refer to the evidence of Mr. R. B. Williams before the Royal Commission; but I acknowledge that I am not prepared myself thoroughly with a reference to every paragraph which I have read, which I think sustains this statement. There are certain instructions to the police in the Appendix to the same volume, page 487.

1942. Is there anything beyond that?—That is all that occurs to me at this moment. I am not prepared with chapter and verse in these cases at the present moment. I expected this to come up again at the next sitting.

1943. Then you would be prepared at the next 0.75.

sitting to explain this statement in the leaflet; but should you feel unable then to do so, you would do your best to get the leaflet withdrawn with that paragraph in it?—If I find that I have made a mistake, I shall be delighted to correct it.

Dr. Farquharson.

1944. In your answer to Question 1809 you say: “Another ground is, that I learn from professional medical men that a digital examination would give pain in the case of a virgin, if I may say that without being required to mention the names of them.” Are you prepared to furnish the names of the medical men on whose authority you made that statement?—I should rather not.

Chairman.

1945. Do you decline to give the names?—On second thoughts I am sure I need not withhold the names. Dr. John Dann Brown of Rochester, M.D., Edin., was one, and Charles Bell Taylor, M.D., of Nottingham, was another.

Mr. Hanbury-Tracy.

1946. In one answer that you gave you said that this Act, in your opinion, might make women conceal their state of health; I suppose you mean from the public examination; but it would not prevent them from seeking private medical advice, would it?—No, not at all. If they were very poor, they could receive it gratuitously at Bartholomew's Hospital, the voluntary hospital that I spoke of.

1947. Just in the same way as though the Act did not exist?—Yes.

Chairman.

1948. How long before the transaction with the Contagious Diseases Acts police did you know Mrs. Wybrow and her daughter?—Not at all until that took place.

1949. You said that the daughter got married to a soldier; do you know when that marriage took place?—Yes, on 9th November 1876.

1950. Did you see much of her between the time of the correspondence with the Home Office and her marriage with the soldier?—I saw her occasionally; probably until the regiment went to Ireland.

1951. Had you any reason in any matter connected with this transaction to doubt her perfect veracity?—Nothing of that kind occurred until after she had been in a situation, and I went to the mistress who had employed her, and who had discharged her, and she said the girl was not truthful, I think. I can turn to the exact words if necessary, but that is the substance of it. That is the only complaint that I ever heard of her being untruthful. But I must observe, in justice to her, that this was after she had been nine days at the Lock Hospital, and her mother complained that she got no good by going there; and more than that, I ought to say that she heard there statements that were not consistent with the truth, and that was teaching her not to be truthful. I mean such a statement as this: the doctors both telling her that the only way for her to regain her liberty was to submit to examination. That was not truthful.

1952. Do

28 March 1882.]

MR. WHEELER.

Chairman—continued.

1952. Do you know when she entered into this situation?—It was very soon after this transaction.

1953. Do you know whether she was discharged from it, or whether she left it of her own accord?—No. I cannot tell you, but I think her mistress discharged her, though not for that untruthfulness.

1954. Do you know for what cause she discharged her?—I think it was for incompetency. I am not sure, because I cannot refer to my paper.

1955. Do you know how long she held that situation?—A very short time indeed.

1956. You remember a conversation you had with Doctor Jardine on the subject of this case?—Quite well.

1957. That conversation, as I remember, was held on the 23rd of December 1875?—Yes.

1958. Doctor Jardine, as well as I remember, gave you a detailed statement with reference to the part that he had taken in this case on that occasion?—Very little detail compared with what he gives in his letter. I have noted very little indeed as coming from him; it is an indefinite term, but it is very little; it is rather more than I expected.

1959. Dr. Jardine told you that he recollected the case?—Yes.

1960. Did he appear to have any difficulty in recalling the details of the case?—No, he did not hesitate, so far as I recollect.

1961. He told you that he had promised that he would not use an instrument?—He said, "I promised her that I would not use the instrument."

1962. He appeared to remember that Mr. Weld felt undecided about the disease?—Yes, "They determined (that is he and Dr. Weld together) to see her together, and they did so."

1963. And he admitted that in this case the blame rested with the police?—Those are his words. Before we come to that, there is another point which should not be overlooked. "She had a discharge, but no disease. Miss Webb pitied her and gave her money, or something."

1964. You say that the rest of your conversation with Dr. Jardine is irrelevant?—I thought it so at the time, and therefore I would not trouble the Committee with it; but I will read it if it is desired.

1965. Will you read for me what you consider irrelevant in the remainder of his conversation?—I think the readiest mode is to read it all rapidly.

1966. Had the irrelevant matter anything to do with this girl's case?—I think it had more or less relation to it.

1967. Was it a statement of some details which you and I would probably agree in considering irrelevant?—Perhaps so. I will read my notes of the interview: "Object, courtesy. Stated salient point in Caroline Wybrow's case. Recollects the case. 'I promised her I would not use the instrument.' Dr. Weld felt undecided about the disease, and they determined to see her together; did so; she had a discharge; no disease. Miss Webb pitied her and gave her money, or something; the girl exaggerates. 'I always have the assurance of the police that they have explained the voluntary submission. They are, as Mr. Childers says, extremely prudent and careful. But in this case the blame rests with the police. It is a merciful law; the career of a prostitute was five years, now it is 10 or 11. F. W." Is that good or bad? Mum; looks on ye floor. "This girl had associated with prostitutes.—Answer: Poor ignorant pauper, soldier's daughter; what could she do? Glad to pick stones or wash linen even for the lazy prostitutes in the court. F. W." Cowardly, mean, unmanly, &c., to take advantage of such. Dr. J. "Prostitution always was and always will be."—Answer: So you may think as to thieving; but no regulation of this: all suppression; continuous immoral influence, polishing and apologising for sin; tramples marriage; invites to fornication, &c. Dr. J. 'My departure is hygienic only.' Yes; but bought at a price as much too dear as the soul is more precious than the body. You may not overlook this, if you will. Think of it this night, Doctor. Confusion of good and evil, righteousness and sin; Guise and good character. Admits that prostitutes if found diseased at Maidstone, Gravesend, or Sheerness, have fare paid to Chatham for treatment. No poor honest woman has this privilege; what resource is there for her? None. Then is it not a premium on sin?—Answer implies a reluctant admission."

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1968. Were these notes taken in Dr. Jardine's presence?—No; immediately after I left him.

1969. They were never submitted to him?—Never. All these notes were made in that way.

Chairman.

1970. The interview which you have detailed took place upon the 23rd of December 1875?—Yes, according to my notes I believe it was that day.

1971. Dr. Jardine's letter to the superintendent of police (which is printed in the Appendix) was written upon the 12th of February 1876, was it not?—Yes, I believe it was.

1972. You did not find in Dr. Jardine's statement of the case, on the 23rd of December 1875, any traces of failure of memory or inconsistency?—He spoke very promptly.

1973. Did you find anything inconsistent in his statements on that day?—No, I do not recollect anything.

1974. You do not impugn his memory with regard to the statements which he made to you on that day?—No, I thought he seemed to recollect it. He said at first, "I recollect the case."

1975. When did you make these notes of the conversation with Dr. Jardine?—Immediately after the conversation, as I always do.

1976. Did I correctly understand you, in the course of your examination or cross-examination, to say anything like this; that Dr. Jardine's statement in his letter of the 12th of February was a statement made when his memory of the matter was weakened?—No, I spoke of Dr. Weld, who qualifies the whole of his letter by saying, "as far as I can recollect." He appears to have no notes or book to refer to. That remark related to Dr. Weld only.

1977. Then I understand you not to impugn on the

Mr. WHEELER.

Chairman—continued.

the ground of want of memory (not talking of any other ground of impugning it), the accuracy of Dr. Jardine's statement?—No, and I never did, I think.

1978. With regard to Dr. Weld's statement, you rely upon his expression "as far as I can recollect," as showing that his memory of the transaction which he narrates in that letter may not have been accurate?—Yes, just so.

1979. Can you point to any statement in Dr. Weld's letter of the 2nd of February which, either from internal evidence or upon any other ground, you can give reason for suspecting to be inaccurate; what do you refer to in that as showing evidence of defective memory, and as being inaccurate?—It does not agree with the statutory declaration of the girl.

1980. Will you point out to me the first point upon which Dr. Weld's letter differs from the statutory declaration of the girl?—At present I do not see any one earlier than this; that he says that she didn't fall off the table; and she says, in her statutory declaration, that she did, and that he picked her up. I think that the two statements may be largely reconciled by this; that he caught her by the arm, and said, "You have a nice fat arm," so that she did not really fall on the floor. She said in conversation once that she felt the hurting of her arm for days afterwards.

1981. Do you see that Dr. Jardine, as well as Dr. Weld, denies that Dr. Weld took hold of her arm?—I do not think Dr. Jardine denies it.

1982. At least, he says, that he did not see it?—He did not see it.

1983. Are you aware that he was in the room upon the occasion, taking part in the operation?—Yes.

1984. Are you aware that he says, "Nor did I see Mr. Weld take hold of her arm?"—Yes, but that is entirely negative, it will be observed.

1985. As I understand your reason for doubting the accuracy of Dr. Weld's statement lies in the words which he uses, "as far as I can recollect?"—Yes, pretty much so.

1986. Have you any other reason for doubting the accuracy of his memory in the matter?—Nothing occurs to me at this moment. I had several conversations with him.

1987. Nothing occurs to you except this, "as far as I can recollect," to cause you to doubt the accuracy of his memory?—Yes, there is something else. He writes something about her complaint with respect to the food. I never heard of any complaint except that. She states the fact that she had tea and water and bread.

1988. And he states the fact that he never heard that there was any complaint?—He states the fact that she was not badly fed.

1989. But does she state that it was to him that she made the complaint as to want of food?—No, I think not. Here is another point upon which he differs from the girl's statement, "Also that I stated to her mother that she had been with all the soldiers in the garrison is a downright falsehood, and that I held her down while Dr. Jardine examined her is equally untrue."

Chairman—continued.

1990. Then your reason for doubting the recollection of Dr. Weld, so far as it is founded upon what you just now referred to, is because he and the girl differ?—And on account of the lapse of twelve months between the occurrence and his letter being written.

1991. That is another matter; but what you now refer to is the difference between his statement and the girl's?—Yes; clearly.

1992. So far as his conversation with you went, as I understand, you saw nothing in them to make you impugn Dr. Weld's memory?—I do not recollect anything at this moment.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

1993. With regard to this leaflet, I think you told me that it was issued, as far as you can recollect, soon after February 1876?—It is very possible that there may have been something of the same kind, but there have been several editions.

1994. It must have been after 9th November 1876?—Yes.

1995. Could you give me any idea of the time when it was first issued; would it be soon after the end of 1876?—I could not give any definite idea. I waited until we had the replies from the Home Office. So far I feel sure.

1996. It was some time in the year 1876 that this was first issued?—It would be after the communication from the Home Office certainly.

1997. How many editions of this leaflet have been issued?—I can recollect three, but they were not all like this.

1998. Then it has been altered, has it?—Yes.

1999. Will you tell us in what respect it has been altered or modified?—This foot note has been added.

2000. Has it been qualified in any way?—There has been nothing since to qualify this that I am aware of.

2001. Then, in fact, this statement to which my honourable and gallant friend called your attention, that "hundreds of terrified girls have signed this crafty form under the threat and terror of imprisonment," has been circulated by you continuously from the year 1876 down to the present time; is that so?—No; not this. This is more recent than that, I believe. However, I acknowledge that I have freely circulated it. That would be sufficient, I should think.

2002. For, we will say five or six years, you have freely circulated the statement that "hundreds of terrified girls have signed this crafty form under the threat and terror of imprisonment"?—I cannot say how many years I have circulated it, but it has been circulated freely and liberally.

2003. You have continuously, for several years, circulated that statement?—Yes.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

2004. And down to the present date?—Yes.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

2005. When was the last of these leaflets circulated?—I cannot tell; very likely not a month ago.

K 4

28 March 1882.

The Rev. HUGH RYVES BAKER (M.A., of Trinity College, Dublin), called in ; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2006. You are, I believe, Vicar of St. Michael and All Angels, Woolwich?—Yes.

2007. How long have you been in charge of that district?—I have been in charge of the district nearly 17 years, but I have only been vicar for the past three years.

2008. As I understand from you, your district has been made a parish for about three years, during which time you have been the vicar?—Quite so.

2009. Have your ministerial duties in Woolwich afforded you great opportunities of becoming acquainted with the condition of prostitution in that town?—Yes; one of the worst parts of Woolwich is in my parish.

2010. Does your parish comprise some of the poorest parts of the town, most inhabited and frequented by prostitutes?—Yes.

2011. Can you name one of the places?—Martyr's-passage.

2012. That is a well known resort of prostitutes in your parish?—Very well known.

2013. Have you any curate?—No.

2014. Having no curate, all the practical work of your parish in the way of visitation, I presume, is done by yourself?—Yes; by myself, with the assistance of district visitors, and a mission woman.

2015. How many inhabitants does your parish contain?—Five thousand two hundred.

2016. Are they sparse or close upon the ground?—Very close.

2017. Are you from your lengthened residence in Woolwich also acquainted with other parts of the town?—Yes, tolerably well.

2018. Have you heard the allegation that one of the beneficial consequences of the Contagious Diseases Acts in Woolwich has been the reduction in the number of brothels?—Yes; I have heard that.

2019. You are not prepared to deny the fact that there has been some reduction in the number of brothels?—No; I am not prepared to deny that brothels have decreased in number, but I am prepared to deny that that lessens the number of prostitutes; because I know, from my own personal experience in my parish, that when brothels have been closed, prostitutes have simply gone to other parts; to houses in contiguous streets.

2020. To houses which would not come under the category of brothels?—Yes.

2021. You have probably known of the closing of brothels in Martyr's-passage to which you referred?—Yes, I have known that Martyr's-passage contained nothing but brothels, but some of the houses have been pulled down.

2022. Do I rightly understand you to say that the brothels which have been closed in Martyr's-passage have simply been closed by the fact of the houses being pulled down?—That is so.

2023. Have two been pulled down upon a plot of land, with respect to which you have some plans?—Yes, some two have been pulled down with a view to building a mission chapel in the place.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

2024. Take the case of brothels that have been shut up in Martyr's-passage, have none of them been re-let to respectable tenants?—Yes, there are four at the present time that is re-let to a respectable tenant.

2025. But those cases are very few?—Yes, it is quite exceptional; ultimately we hope to clear the place out.

2026. But the character of the place has been and still is bad, consisting, in the main, of houses used as brothels?—Yes, quite so.

2027. And so far as the number of brothels in Martyr's-passage is diminished, the consequence, in your opinion, and as the result of your observation, has not been a diminution of prostitutes, but their removal to other places?—Quite so.

2028. Do you know the houses to which the women, removed from Martyr's-passage, have gone?—In some cases I have known the houses.

2029. The effect, therefore, as I understand, in your opinion, of this reduction of the number of brothels has not been necessary to diminish the number of prostitutes, but rather to scatter them more widely abroad, as centres of moral contamination?—That is so.

2030. Are you able to say that this opinion of yours is shared by other people in Woolwich, who have had somewhat similar means of forming a judgment upon the subject?—Yes, Father Cotter, the priest of the Roman Catholic church there, is of the same view that I am with regard to the Acts. The agent of the houses that we have been speaking of did say to me when we were conversing with regard to the closing of these houses, and the pulling down of some of them, that he, for his part, could not see that there was any advantage to be gained, because they only went to other parts and spread themselves about.

2031. Have you read the evidence of the Rev. Mr. Tuffield before this Committee?—Yes, I have read it, and I should be prepared to contradict a great part of it.

2032. In that evidence he spoke of the improved condition of the town, did he not, during recent years?—Yes.

2033. Do you agree with him in that opinion?—No, I cannot say that I do agree with him.

2034. Do you consider the present condition of Woolwich in respect of common women in the streets frequented by them to be better, or worse, than it was in former years?—I do not consider it to be better.

2035. Have you, yourself, for instance, in Martyr's-passage, to which you have referred, seen sights inconsistent with decency and order in the streets?—Yes, I have done so.

2036. What have you seen?—I have seen the women almost naked.

2037. Very much undressed?—Very much.

2038. So as to leave no doubt of their character, or of the purposes for which they were there?—None whatever.

2039. Would you go further than that, and say that what you mean is that they were undressed to an indecent extent?—Yes, and I have also seen the women in Warwick-street, which is the street into into which Martyr's passage opens, behaving in a very horrid way, exposing themselves; and, on one occasion, when the Salvation Army happened to pass through the streets at the time, several of these women put themselves at the head of the procession and danced about and partially exposed themselves in a very scandalous and horrid way, considering that the street is tolerably respectable.

2040. Did they at the same time use any indecent language?—They were singing ribald songs of some kind or other. I could not catch all the words, but they were evidently not what they should be.

2041. Then you are not prepared to admit any change for the better in the streets of Woolwich in recent years?—No.

2042. Have you observed any change for the worse?—I have in one respect.

2043. What respect is that?—That I have noticed within the last two years or so, perhaps a little more, a certain class of young girls coming on the streets that I have not noticed before; a better dressed class. Although these girls may not be absolutely prostitutes, yet at the same time they certainly very frequently behave in a way which would lead one to suppose that they were.

2044. Your inference I gather would be that those girls were what we call sometimes clandestine prostitutes?—It might be so.

2045. You do not believe that they were registered prostitutes?—No, they were certainly not registered, I should say. I would not like to say, positively, that they were absolute prostitutes, but they were certainly, I should consider, on the high road towards it. I merely mention that in order to show that I think the condition of the streets is certainly not better.

2046. What has there been in the conduct of that class of young girls to whom you refer, which has led you to draw these conclusions?—I have seen them standing about in two's and three's in the streets, and at the corners of the streets, and, as it were, waiting for young men.

2048. Indulging in loud talk and laughter?—Yes, behaving in a very light manner.

2049. In fact, conducting themselves in a way in which no modest girls would conduct themselves?—Quite so.

2050. On the whole, is it your conviction that a larger number of young girls are leading immoral lives in Woolwich than in former years?—Yes, I should say so.

2051. You do not by that mean, I presume, girls living on the wages of prostitution entirely?—No, not altogether.

2052. Taking your own parish, have you, yourself, known cases of quite young girls who have gone astray, and whom you have rescued?—Yes, several girls of 13, 14, and 15.

2053. You can speak from personal experience to the reclamation of clandestine prostitutes at 13 years of age?—Yes.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

2054. By what agencies?—By sending them into homes.

2055. How were those girls discovered?—They were discovered by myself, and by my assistants.

2056. Your assistants would be missionary women?—Some of them have been discovered by myself, and some by my mission woman.

2057. With the assistance of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police?—Yes, on two or three occasions.

2058. Have you any means of judging whether those young creatures were on the register or not?—I have no means of judging, but I should say that they were not. In fact, I may say that I know that in those particular cases of these young girls that I mention they were not on the register.

Chairman.

2059. Do you mean those whom you re-claimed?—Yes.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2060. And you understood from them that they were not on the register?—I did.

2061. Of what period are you now speaking?—Of a period extending over, I may say, all my ministry there, but latterly within the last six or seven years.

2063. Referring to Captain Harris's return at page 16, with regard to Woolwich, if we take the years from 1868 down to 1880 we find, in 1875, one child between 14 and 15 years of age?—I have got a list here of those who have passed through our own Home (or rather refuge, as we call it; it is not meant to be a home because we pass them on from it; it is a very small place, and will only accommodate seven), and this is a memorandum of the number of young girls under 20 admitted into the refuge, beginning at 1869 down to the present time. In 1870 there was one of 13, two of 15, and one of 16.

2064. Now will you turn to Captain Harris's report, and look to the same year in column 6. In 1870, it is admitted that there was one girl on the register between 17 and 18, and no girls younger?—No.

2065. Therefore, those girls whom you re-claimed who were younger were not upon the register?—Quite so.

2066. Now will you take the next year, and give the number and ages in your return?—In 1871 there were five of 15 years of age, five of 16 years of age, five of 17 years of age, and five of 18 years of age.

2067. Now, if you refer to Captain Harris's return, you find, do you not, one under 17 years of age, three under 18 years of age, and three under 19 years of age?—Yes.

2068. Now will you give the number in your return for 1872?—In 1872 there was one of 14 years of age, one of 15 years of age, six of 16 years of age, and eight of 17 years of age.

2069. Captain Harris's figures are considerably less than yours?—Yes, they are less.

Rev. H. R. BAKER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

2070. May I take it from you that the figures of subsequent years would be very much like the figures you have read to us?—About the same.

2071. Will you cast your eye for a moment again to Captain Harris's return; are you not able to say that his figures in the later years into which we have not yet gone, do not agree with your figures?—They do not agree.

2072. Will you put in that return?—I will. (The same was delivered in.) I should like to say that our experience is that about half of those who pass through this Home have been registered, and that of these registered women, or girls, not more than three or four have been reclaimed; while we find about 30 per cent. or more reclaimed on the other side.

2073. I assume that in your own mind you call them registered, or not, in accordance with the information which they themselves give you?—Yes, quite so.

2074. And you see no reason to doubt that information?—No reason.

2075. And, relying upon that information, you find that about half of those who pass through your institution are registered, and half are not?—About that proportion.

2076. But that would not apply to the earlier ages?—No, not to the earlier ages.

2077. There you find a great portion not registered?—That is so.

2078. As a whole you find about equal quantities registered and unregistered?—Yes.

2079. And of those you find the unregistered immensely more easy to reclaim?—Quite so.

2081. Are you under the impression, from your observation, that sexual immorality of late years commences in the young men of Woolwich at an earlier age?—I believe it does.

2082. To what do you attribute that fact of the earlier depravity of more recent years, if it be a fact?—I think the general tendency of the age in the higher and lower classes is in that direction. The young of both sexes go out into life to work for themselves much earlier than used to be the case; they lose the influence of home, and become independent. This greater freedom at a critical time brings with it greater temptations; hence immorality. That would be my own experience.

2083. You have read, have you not, the evidence of Mr. Krause before this Committee last Session?—Yes.

2084. Have you had as many special opportunities as Mr. Krause of observing in detail the conditions of persons in this class of life?—I have not had the same opportunities that he has had; he has made it his special work, so to speak, to ascertain all the details which we find him giving in his evidence. But on the whole I can quite confirm what he said in his evidence.

2085. Let me take you to Mr. Krause's evidence on the subject of the conduct of women going to and from the examination room; can you confirm that evidence from your own observation?—I can: I have observed them behaving very badly indeed. The street in which the house is in which the inspection takes place is in a very public part of the town, and in rather a bettermost part, so that one has frequently to pass through it; and I have often, myself, observed them. They go in considerable numbers together, and they stand about the house outside, and both going in and coming out they behave badly.

2086. Have you seen them there under the influence of liquor?—I believe that they have been under the influence of drink; they appeared to me to be so.

2087. You are connected with the Rescue Home; can you give us any information as to whether the experience of that House shows that the registered, or as they are sometimes called, "Government women," are more or less difficult to deal with than the others?—I am quite sure that they are more difficult to deal with from my own experience of them; in fact, I should say, from my own experience, that it was almost impossible to reclaim one of the so-called Government women.

2089. You have expressed, or implied, I think, an opinion, that the prostitutes stay longer in the practice of their calling and are of a greater age than in former years?—That is so.

2090. I will ask you to turn to page 16 of Captain Harris's Report and seek for confirmation there of that opinion of your own. You may take it from me that it is in evidence before the Royal Commission, and, therefore, be before this Committee, that the Acts were brought into operation in Woolwich in 1869; I take the year 1869 because there is a drop afterwards; in 1869 do you not find that the number of registered prostitutes in Woolwich, of 31 years of age and over, was 11 out of a nominal total of 215?—Yes.

2091. And when we come down to the year 1880 do we not find that that number 11 has grown to 36, with a reduced total of 151?—Yes, that is so.

2092. And those figures confirm your personal observation of the increased age of the women who practise prostitution in Woolwich?—That is so.

2093. There has been, in fact, a continuous rise since the year 1873, has there not?—Yes, there has been on the whole a continuous rise.

2094. And

28 March 1882.]

Rev. H. R. BAKER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

2094. And I understand that those figures and facts are, in your mind, most unfavourable as affecting the operation of the Acts?—Yes, certainly.

2095. There was a case of reclamation mentioned by Mr. Tuffield, in answer to Question 4308; have you any remarks to make upon that case?—I have read that case, and it seems to me to prove nothing as regards the point that he is trying to make.

2096. What was that case; was that the case of a girl who was met by a Contagious Diseases Acts policeman and warned?—That was the case. It seems to me that it was owing to his own influence, whatever that may have been, rather than to the influence of the policeman, that the reclamation took place. Then he seems to dwell very strongly on the fact that it was impossible in those days to get a poor girl in that condition into a hospital; that she would not go in; and he implies that now, under similar circumstances, she would have been forced to go in. Well, if the Acts were supposed to provide for the moral training of the girls, there might be something in it; but it seems to me that the Acts only provide, practically, for the sanitary condition of the girls. This refusal, which she obviously made to allow any sort of moral suasion to be brought to bear upon her might have happened under the Acts as well as before they were put into operation. But I would go further even than that, and say, that even supposing that we grant what he seems to lay such stress upon, viz., the fact that the girl in that condition was dying, and did die, before the Acts were brought into operation, my own feeling would be that it would be better that a young girl should die at that time of her life, notwithstanding the very dreadful circumstances that she did die under as described by Mr. Tuffield, than go on leading a life of sin for years and years, as we believe the great majority of those do who come under the Acts, simply going to the hospital and coming out, going on with their sinful life and going back again, and then coming out again and going on with the life again.

2097. You have been present to-day, I think?—I have.

2098. At the close of the examination of Mr. Wheeler we had an expression of opinion quoted to us, I think, by Mr. Wheeler, from Dr. Jardine, to the effect that the Acts added to the length of the lives of the prostitutes. What I understand from you is that, in your opinion, legislation which enables and practically compels a woman to lead a life of prostitution for a greater number of years than she otherwise would, is not, morally speaking, beneficial legislation?—That would be quite my view. The Act enables sin to be committed with impunity; that is really my objection to the Act.

2099. Therefore, when you find upon these returns a constant tendency to arise in the age of prostitutes, you regard that, not as a fact in favour of the Acts, but as absolutely condemnatory of the Acts upon moral grounds?—Yes, upon moral grounds I do so.

2100. As I understand, upon moral grounds you hold that the State has no right, for the sake of some speculative hygienic benefit, to bring influences to bear which shall result, as these Acts have resulted, in keeping women longer in a career of prostitution than they would otherwise have remained in it?—Yes, that is my opinion.

2101. Let us go a little further into that question of reclamation. Do you take a favourable or hopeful view of the probabilities of reclamation under a system of compulsion?—No.

2102. Given two hospitals, one voluntary and the other where women are driven into the hospital by the process of compulsory examination, and kept there by the process of compulsory detention, in which of those hospitals would you expect moral and religious agencies to have the better chance of effecting reclamation?—I should expect in that hospital which was free, and into which the girls went of their own free choice.

2103. That is not merely a speculative opinion; can you not give us evidence in support of that opinion?—Yes, I can give you evidence that I obtained at the Lock Hospital, in London.

2104. I will take you first to your own Rescue Home in Woolwich?—Our own Home shows us that, and I myself have found, in dealing with the two classes that we are speaking of, that it is much more easy to deal (and much more likely to be effectual) with those that are not registered, and that never have been subject to a compulsory examination. I make that a very strong point.

2105. You referred to the London Lock Hospital, upon which we had a good deal of evidence from a Mr. Lane, a surgeon, a Session or two ago, I do not know whether you have seen that?—I have seen it.

2106. Did I correctly understand you just now to say that you have obtained further evidence upon this question of the comparative value of voluntary and compulsory arrangements, with respect to the prospects of reclamation?—I have been recently at the Lock Hospital, and I may say that I obtained some evidence without knowing anything whatever about Mr. Lane's.

2107. I will ask you to put, in your own way, before the Committee the facts which you have recently ascertained at the Lock Hospital?—I have here the report of the Female Lock Hospital and Asylum for the year ending December 31st, 1881. It is, in fact, the last report.

2108. Is it published yet?—No, it is not published yet.

2109. From whom did you obtain this draft support?—I obtained it from a person whom I presume to have been the secretary. The chaplain, the Rev. Flavell Cooke, asked the secretary to supply me with it.

2110. Is that since found to be Dr. Cooke?—Yes.

2111. I observe, on that paper, that besides the printed matter, there are some figures filled up in pen and ink; who filled up those figures?—Those were filled up by the secretary.

2112. In your presence and that of Dr. Cooke?—In my presence, but not in Dr. Cooke's presence. Some of those figures at the side are my own calculations.

2113. Does that return distinguish between prostitutes who are registered and Government prostitutes and other prostitutes?—Yes, there

28 March 1882.]

Rev. H. R. BAKER.

is a column headed "Government," and I may say that when I spoke to Dr. Cooke upon the subject he called them Government women, plainly.

2114. And the heading in that column is "Government"?—"Government." I asked Dr. Cooke, before he gave me this paper (in fact his giving me the paper was an answer to one or two questions which I put to him), what average number might be said to be reclaimed of those passing through the hospital in the year.

2115. Without repeating conversations between yourself and Dr. Cooke, will you give the results of these figures which were handed to you at the hospital?—I find that under the head of "Government" the total number of women in the hospital for the year ending 1881, was 537, and out of those 24 were reclaimed. I find that 474 were discharged cured to former stations (that practically means that they were sent back to lead their bad life again); four were sent to service; four were restored to friends; 14 were sent to the asylum. And here I may say that that is made a very important point with regard to the visitations and the work of the chaplain in the hospital. He told me that when first a girl or woman goes into the hospital, either he or his curate, I presume, sees her, and that they press her very much to go to the asylum, because it would appear as I gathered from him, that it is only in the asylum that any hope of reclaiming her exists. I take it that the asylum is a sort of inner house in the hospital, belonging to it.

2116. The asylum is in connection with the hospital?—Quite so; it is within the walls. But I gathered that after that if they decline to go into the asylum, there is little or no use in visiting them in the hospital itself. Fourteen were sent to the asylum, three were sent to other homes, and 17 remain. Then we come to those in the asylum; 22 were in the asylum on 31st December 1880; since admitted, the 14 that I have mentioned above out of those one was sent to another home, and 13 were sent to service or restored to friends, seven left at their own request, four were dismissed, one was returned to her parish, and there are now remaining nine. That is at the end of the year. That gives, on analysis, the numbers which I have read to you already, viz., 24 reclaimed out of a total of 537. Then we come to the next column, "Ordinary," which means the voluntary side. The total there is 642. But of these 272 have been reclaimed; 94 were discharged cured to former address (that would correspond to the 474 in the other column); 107 were restored to friends as against four; 115 were sent to the asylum as against 14; 83 were sent to other homes as against three; 17 were sent to unions (those, I think, we might take as reclaimed, most likely); 64 left at their own request; and 25 left for misconduct. Then, coming to the asylum inmates, we find that there remain there from last year 70 ordinary patients, as against 22 Government patients; since re-admitted, 115; sent to other homes, 9; sent to service, 45; restored to friends, 11; left at own request, 29; dismissed, 13; returned to parish, three; died, one.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

2117. Have you carried out the per-centages of any of those figures?—The reclamations under the head of "Government" are a little over 5 per cent., I think, and the others are something like 40 per cent.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

2118. Has that report been published?—It has not been published yet, but it will be published. This I take to be a draft of this year's report.

2119. Who gave it you?—The clerk, I presume.

2120. Do you know his name?—I do not know his name, but it was given to me by him at the request of the chaplain. The chaplain was not present when it was made out for me.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2121. You say that this report will be published?—I presume it will.

2122. Then, subject to whatever correction may arise when Dr. Cooke is before us, that return will be put in?—Yes. (The same was delivered in.)

2124. They provide, do they not, first of all for the registration and periodical compulsory examination of all known common women?—Yes, quite so.

2125. If a woman is found on examination to be free from disease, what happens under the Acts?—She is allowed to go back to her former calling.

2126. She is free?—She is free.

2127. What happens to her if she is found to be diseased?—She is obliged to go to the hospital.

2128. And am I not right in saying that it is only in those cases where she is diseased and goes to the hospital that she comes under the influence of religious and moral instruction?—That is so. There is no provision made in any way in the Acts for putting down immorality. The Acts, practically, as I read them, give the sanction of the law to that which is sin, and enables persons to commit sin with greater impunity than they otherwise would be able to do. That is, in a few words, my objection to the Acts; and I find there are two points in the Acts that I think bear out that, because in one clause it is said that the women shall have their journeys paid to their homes, if they so desire; but in numberless cases their homes are brothels. If, for instance, women leaving this place of which we have been speaking, and which is in my parish, viz.: Martyr's-passage, return to their homes, their journey is paid to Woolwich, and their home is in Martyr's-passage. That is in effect paying them to come back to their former life. Of course the clause says that that may be at their own choice, but still the fact remains the same, that their expenses are paid to return to their former life. Then there is another point; that under another clause it is made penal to keep women who are diseased, but only if they are diseased. You may keep 50 women in your house

Rev. H. R. BAKER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

house as prostitutes if they are not diseased, but the moment they become diseased then it becomes penal. So that the Act does not aim at the suppression of vice in any degree, and my opinion is that it rather assists it than otherwise, inasmuch as it enables sin to be committed with impunity.

2129. With supposed impunity?—Yes.

2130. Therefore, as I understand you, you regard the Acts as obnoxious to morality?—I do, distinctly.

2131. On two grounds: on the ground first of all of their contents; the whole system you think is a premium upon vice?—Yes.

2132. And, secondly, upon the ground of their defects, because they contain no powers intended to be exercised for the reduction of vice?—Quite so.

2133. With regard to the opinion in Woolwich of the clergy of all denominations, upon that subject opinion is probably divided?—Opinion is divided.

2134. It is divided amongst the clergy of the Church of England?—It is so.

2135. There are those who agree with you, and there are those, on the other hand, who are disposed to believe in the moral influences of the Acts?—There are those who believe with me, and there are also some who are perfectly neutral in the matter, not having given their minds to the subject.

2136. Have you knowledge enough of the opinions of the Protestant Nonconformist ministers of the district to be able to tell us what their opinions are as to these Acts?—I have. With one exception, that of Mr. Tuffield, who gave evidence. I think I may say that all the other Nonconformist ministers are in favour of the repeal of the Acts; and, as I have already stated, Father Cotter, the priest of the Roman Catholic Church, is also in favour of the repeal of the Acts. I have his letter which I can put in, if you wish.

2137. May I ask you upon what occasion that letter was written?—I wrote to him to know what his opinion was.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

2138. Have you a copy of your letter?—No, I have not.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2139. Do you remember the terms of your letter?—As far as I can remember, it was simply asking him what his opinion of the Acts was. I told him that I was about to give evidence before the Committee, and that I should be glad to know his opinion.

2140. What does he say?—"My dear Sir,—In reply to your note I give you briefly my opinion. The Act does not prevent nor punish moral crime, but steps in to mitigate the punishment consequent upon it. This in some measure seems to perpetuate if not sanction the commission of evil. I was once told by a military superior on this question, that he regarded it as a necessary evil. My reply was, I was ashamed of such a doctrine. My opinion, therefore, is that sin is legally propagated. I am your obedient humble servant, J. Cotter."

0.75.

2141. Speaking for your own parish, the population of which consists mainly, I believe, of the working classes, what do you say is the general public opinion as to the Acts in your parish?—I should say that the general public feeling would be against the Acts. I know that numbers of women in my parish, mothers who are heads of families, have signed the petition against the Acts; it has been signed by a considerable number of my own people.

2143. You told me, I think, that you had read Mr. Tuffield's evidence; are there any other parts of his evidence with regard to which you would desire to make any suggestion or remark?—Yes; for instance, he makes rather a strong point about what used to happen. He says: "In the olden days when they had to submit to a cross-examination by a number of maiden ladies and others who took an interest in these things;" and he seems to think that the present system is better than that. I can quite contradict that, because my own experience is that women are the best persons to deal with these poor women. I had also an opinion of the same kind from the present chaplain to the Woolwich Union, who is himself an opponent of the Acts; and this letter I can put in if you wish.

2144. What is the effect of that letter?—The effect of it is that he, himself, cannot do nearly so much amongst them, or in those cases in which he comes in contact with them, as lady friends of his who visit amongst them outside.

2145. He is speaking of coming into contact with them where?—In the union.

Dr. Farquharson.

2146. I think you do not admit any improvement in the condition of the streets of Woolwich?—No, I cannot say that I do.

2147. Do you think that things are worse than they were?—In some ways they are.

2149. Do you think that Mr. Tuffield's opportunities of observation were not sufficient to enable him to give an opinion?—His opportunities are very large, certainly; but I differ with him as to the opinion which he has formed with regard to the results.

2150. You allow that he has good opportunities of observation, at all events?—Yes, I think so; but he has not as good opportunities of judging of the condition of these women as I have.

have, because he is not a Parochial Minister; he has no parish under his charge; he does nothing in the way of personal visitation, at present, I know.

2151. I think you are not in favour of closing brothels. We have heard some people say that it was in the interests of morality to close brothels, but you find that the more brothels you close the greater the number of prostitutes becomes in a district?—I did not say so; I said that the closing of brothels did not lessen the number of prostitutes. I do not know as to their being increased, and I will not commit myself to the statement that I would rather preserve the brothels. But the law ought to be preventive, as I understand it; the law ought not to regulate vice; the law ought to stop vice, if possible. I will not say that I have formed a definite opinion as to whether brothels ought to be closed by law by violence. I may have an opinion that the closing of them in that way would not lessen sin, because somehow or other, as long as human nature is what it is, I much fear me that this sin will be committed. But surely the law ought not to regulate vice; it ought, if possible, to abolish it; but the true way to abolish this vice, or rather this disease (which, I presume, is really the great object of the Contagious Diseases Acts), is, as far as possible, to put a stop to the vice.

2152. How do you know that sexual immorality is beginning in Woolwich among the male population at an earlier age than formerly?—I have a great deal to do with young men and young lads, and I know numbers of those who work in the Arsenal, and I know that in certain shops in the Arsenal, particularly in the laboratory, where hundreds of young lads are employed, there is a vast and fearful amount of immorality.

2153. But that you consider due to what you call, I think, the tendencies of the age?—Partly that; and I certainly believe that the tendency of the Acts is immoral. I will not commit myself to saying that these young lads that I speak of know very much about these Acts, or have read them up, or have gone into them, or considered them, but I believe that the whole thing is demoralising. It is certainly known generally that these women are what are called "Government women," what Dr. Cook called "Government women;" he used the word quite freely; and it is known that they are under examination, and all that has a tendency to encourage immorality.

2155. Then if you believe that sin is committed with impunity, at all events you give a powerful testimony in favour of the hygienic success of the Acts?—I should qualify that by saying, to a certain extent, with impunity. Whether that is really the result, I cannot say; but the object of the Acts is to enable the sin to be committed, so that those who commit it shall be free from disease.

2156. Then you admit that, up to a certain point, at all events, the Acts have been successful in diminishing disease, and enabling, as you say, sin to be committed with impunity?—I presume that up to a certain point they have been successful. As I said in the case of that poor girl who died, so I say in this case, that no amount of good which your hygiene could do, would, to my mind, make the Acts desirable.

2158. Do you think it is at all likely that any medical man would examine a woman who was in liquor, under these circumstances?—There are, of course, different degrees of drunkenness. I do not say that I have seen the women drunk to such a degree as to be incapable; I think, under those circumstances, no medical man would examine a woman; but I certainly believe that the women I have seen have been under the influence of drink, and I can fancy that that need not necessarily deter a medical man from examining them.

2159. I think you said you thought it better that women should be allowed to perish from disease rather than go on in prostitution?—I did say so, in combating the view that Mr. Tuffield put forward; I still say that I think it was better for that poor girl to have died as she was, and in that state, than to go on leading a life of sin year after year, and year after year; but at the same time I do not say, and I would not wish you to so understand me, that there should be no endeavour made to check this disease. By all means let there be hospitals for the disease, and let the disease be checked as you would check any other disease, but not in this particular way.

2160. But this particular girl might have repented and given up prostitution, if she had lived?—She might, but there is nothing to show that she did not repent as it was; I am far from saying that she did not repent as it was.

2161. You would not withhold all treatment from prostitutes unless they promised to abandon their vicious courses?—No, certainly not.

2163. Just a word about the statistics as to these women in the Lock Hospital. Are you able to tell us that all those women on the voluntary side were necessarily prostitutes; may not some of them be women who have caught disease accidentally, say, from their husbands, or in any other way, and who, therefore, cannot be compared absolutely with those on the Government side?—I suppose they were not necessarily prostitutes; but that I cannot say much for, one way or the other.

2164. They

28 March 1882.]

Rev. H. R. BAKER.

[Continued.]

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

2164. They are simply diseased women?—I presume so.

Dr. Farquharson.

2165. Of course the returns are returns of the number of cases, and the women may come back over and over again; can you tell us how many individual women are included in the returns of the Government women?—That I cannot tell you without the paper.

2166. That is much more likely to be the case on the Government side than on the other side, is it not?—That would be so, no doubt.

2167. Therefore that, to a certain extent, makes the statistics a little unequal, does it not?—This list, as I understand it, gives you for one year all the individual cases, and not return cases.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

2168. I gather that these numbers are not the number of individual women, but the number of cases that came to the hospital; that is to say, that out of these 485 cases, the same women may have come three or four times; that is so, is it not?—No, I should not say so.

Dr. Farquharson.

2169. Can you give us any statistics as to registered women from your own Home in support of your statement as to the difficulty of reclaiming the women who have been a longer time in prostitution?—I know myself, from my own experience, that that is so.

2170. But you have no actual figures to give us?—I have no actual figures; but I have frequently dealt with both classes of women, and I know that those who are under inspection are the most difficult to deal with.

2171. Is there not a difficulty in the reclamation of prostitutes, in the fact that there are a certain number of women in all large towns who have deliberately adopted prostitution as a profession, just as any other person may have chosen another profession, and would not the difficulty of reclaiming such persons be always very great?—Yes, the difficulty is very great in every case; but it is greater in the case of those who are under inspection, and who are registered; and for this reason, that you have just suggested, and that has been brought before me, that they go back over and over again.

2172. Then you admit that they do go back over and over again to the hospital?—Quite so; I do not deny that they go back, because Dr. Cook himself told me that they did go back.

2173. Do you not admit that the Acts deter large numbers of young girls from becoming prostitutes who are just on the brink or fringe, as it has been called?—No, I would not admit that. I have often thought of that, and I cannot say that I would think so, for this reason: that I think the Acts would not be deterrent in that way, because young girls do not consider these matters at all; they are led astray, they are seduced in one way or another before they go on the streets; and it is only after they have been led astray, or seduced in other ways, that they go on the streets. They do not begin by becoming prostitutes; and the effect of the Acts upon them at first is to harden them; the hardening effect takes place at the first inspection, or perhaps, the second. After it has gone on for some time over and over again then they do not care for the Acts. But at first it has produced its effect upon them.

Colonel Digby.

2174. Can you tell me the reason why, in 1869, a Home was started at Woolwich for these young girls; what was the origin of it?—For the purpose of assisting these poor girls and getting them out of their sin and sending them to homes.

2175. But do you know why it was started particularly in 1869?—I believe the Home had been in existence before 1869.

2176. I thought you said that it was started in 1869?—I have taken the numbers back 12 years, that is all; I do not think I said that it was started in 1869.

2177. I thought it was possibly in consequence of the Contagious Diseases Act, 1869?—I cannot say whether there was any connection between the two things.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

2178. Does it not strike you that it is not quite fair to make a comparison between women who go voluntarily and women who are admitted compulsorily into these hospitals?—Of course all the women who are compelled to go there are professional, and possibly hardened prostitutes. On the other hand those who go voluntarily are, many of them, I suppose, not prostitutes at all; in fact, they have only this in common, that they are diseased; they may be married women who have been diseased by their husbands, or who have contracted the disease in some other innocent way. Surely it is not quite fair to make a comparison between those two classes, is it, for this purpose? I find that in that list that I have put in there is a larger number of persons on the voluntary side than on the other side; and I take it that there would be quite as large a proportion on the voluntary side as on the other side, who are really bona fide prostitutes.

2179. You say “I take it,” but do you know that of your own knowledge?—I cannot say that I know it absolutely of my own knowledge; but I believe that the statistics of this hospital will show that the great majority of those who go into the voluntary side are also prostitutes.

2180. I want to get the data upon which you found your answer; have you been informed that that is so by the secretary or by any of the officers of the institution?—I cannot say that I have.

2181. Do you know that they distinguish in the hospital reports between the women who are professional prostitutes and those who are admitted simply because they are diseased?—I believe they do. I have got a report here which makes some distinction. This is the printed report of the year before last (producing the same).

2182. In order to justify the admission of what are called “Government women” into this hospital it is necessary, of course, to show that they are prostitutes. In the case of the other women all that is necessary is to show that they are diseased; they need not be prostitutes at all; 50 of them I see were married women: does it not follow from that that when you deal with "Government women" you are dealing with an entirely different class: a class more difficult to reclaim, because they are professional prostitutes, whereas, in the other case, you are dealing with a class, some of whom may never have been prostitutes at all. It was with a view of ascertaining how far you could distinguish the prostitute class from the non-prostitute class among the voluntary patients that I asked you whether the hospitals kept any register, or had any means of distinguishing between those who were prostitutes and those who were not prostitutes?—I cannot say of my own knowledge; but I presume that, as a matter of common sense, they have the means of distinguishing; of course your object is to nullify, to a certain extent, my opinion.

REV. H. R. BAKER.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

2183. You must understand, if you please, that that is not my object. My sole object is to get at the truth, and for that purpose I am trying to test the grounds upon which your assertions rest. If you have any explanation to offer with reference to the London Lock Hospital I shall be very happy to hear it?—No, I have nothing further to say with regard to that point. My object also is to state the truth.

2184. Is it not a fact, too, that a prostitute who voluntarily goes to the hospital, and thence to an asylum, has already begun to make, what I may call, a reclamatory effort of her own; you would expect to find that a woman who was influenced to go of her own accord to a hospital, and thence to an asylum was, so to speak, more in the way of being reclaimed than a woman who was compelled to go to the hospital, would you not?—Yes, that is so; but, on the other hand, supposing that there was no compulsion in the other case, I hold, contrary to the opinion of Mr. Tuffield, that a number of these poor women and girls would go to the hospitals if the hospitals were open to them.

2186. That is to say, there are some women who have been compelled to go to a hospital, and have been in consequence reclaimed, who, but for that compulsion, would never have been reclaimed at all?—That is possible in the case of a few.

2187. You said, I think, that you had read these Contagious Diseases Acts?—I have read the Acts.

2188. May I call your attention to Clause 12 of the Act of 1866: "A hospital shall not be certified under this Act, unless at the time of the granting of the certificate adequate provision is made for the moral and religious instruction of the women detained therein under this Act"; are you aware of that?—Yes, I am quite aware of that.

2190. Have you, yourself, been present at any of the religious ministrations which have taken place in these Lock Hospitals?—No, I cannot say that I have ever been at any of the services; I know the sort of services that take place.

2191. Do you know personally what goes on in these Lock Hospitals, and what sort of influences are brought to bear upon the women there?—Not personally.

2192. It is the fact, I think, that if a woman desires to be sent home to her parents, she would have her expenses paid?—Yes.

2193. Therefore, supposing she wished to be sent home to her parents, I suppose the Government would pay her expenses?—Certainly.

2194. With regard to the opinion of the inhabitants of the district of Woolwich, I suppose that there, as in other places, opinion is divided on the subject of the Acts, is it not?—It is.

2195. You have referred to petitions which have been sent up against the Acts?—One large petition signed by about 8,000 persons has been sent up.

2196. What is the whole population of the district subject to the Contagious Diseases Acts?—The population of the whole district of Woolwich, Charlton, and Plumstead, I should think, would be between 30,000 and 40,000. The parish of Woolwich itself has 25,000.

2197. Did you get up that petition; did you collect signatures for that petition, yourself?—My mission woman and others of my people did; I did not, myself; but I signed it myself.

2198. So to speak you were privy to getting it up?—Yes, it was done by my wish and desire.

2199. Could you tell me how many magistrates signed the petition?—Not any that I know of. I never saw the petition further than the part of that I signed, so that I cannot speak to that.

2200. Could you tell me how many clergymen signed the petition?—My name was, I believe, the only Church clergyman's name. Latterly, I think, there was a petition signed by one of the chaplains some little time ago, but he afterwards went to Canada.

2201. May I ask how many clergymen of the Church of England there are in the district?—About 15, I think; but I would say, that we had an informal meeting not to consider these Acts at all last Monday week, but about other church matters, and there were nine of us present; three were strongly against the Acts; two were in their favour, and the rest were neutral.

2202. With regard to magistrates, I think you said that no magistrate had signed the petition?—I cannot speak to that.

2203. I suppose you have a local board in Woolwich, have you not?—We have.

2204. Did any member of the local board sign?—That I cannot say.

2205. Do you know what is the opinion of your Members of Parliament on the subject?—That I cannot say.

2206. Is it not the fact that a good many women who are not domiciled or permanently resident in Woolwich come there from London for the purposes of prostitution; it is but a short distance, is it not?—I should not have said that there were many; I do not think so from my own experience.

2207. You

28 March 1882.]

Rev. H. R. BAKER.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

2207. You have told us a good deal about the unregistered prostitutes with whom you are acquainted; how do you know that those women whom you call unregistered are not upon the register; you have never seen the register, I suppose, have you?—I have not.

2208. And you could not see it, I suppose?—I could only tell from their own information. Of course there are certain women that are leading a life of prostitution, practically that one is morally certain are not registered. For instance, I know of several cases of married women whose husbands do night-work; I know of one very bad case of a woman who is, practically, a prostitute, and I am morally certain that she is not registered. That is one instance.

2209. I suppose that woman, if she lived by prostitution, although she was married, would be registered?—She is not living by prostitution. I say that she is, practically, a prostitute to all intents and purposes, but she is not living by it; she is not supposed to be a prostitute.

2210. What has puzzled me a good deal throughout this inquiry has been this, it is said that these Acts are very oppressively worked; have you had any such complaints made?—No, that sort of thing has not come under my actual knowledge.

2211. Then you would not say that the Acts have been, to your knowledge, oppressively administered, or that virtuous women, or quasi virtuous women, have been brought on the register?—I have never known a case of it.

2212. Do you know Inspector Nutt?—By name, not personally.

2213. But does it not strike you that men whose special object it was to discover whether women are prostitutes or not, with a view of putting them upon the register would be much more likely to ascertain whether women were registered than a volunteer like yourself; what ground, except of course the statement of the women, have you for the belief that these women who say they are not upon the register are upon the register?—It is part of my business in dealing with these women.

2214. But it is not your business to find out whether they are on the register, or to put them on the register?—Not actually, but it comes within my duty and knowledge, in order that I may know how to deal with them.

2215. But you are obliged to be content with their own statement, are you not?—I am. Of course I know that I could find out by going to the police.

2216. But you have never done so?—I have never done so.

2217. Do you think that the statements of these women are always truthful and reliable, particularly as to their own life?—No, their statements certainly are not always reliable; but in that particular thing I should have no doubt as to their truthfulness.

2218. You said that you had never been present at any of the religious ministrations in hospital; have you ever visited any patients in the Lock Hospital in London, or in any other Lock hospital?—No.

2219. You have never been, so to speak, 0.75.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

through a Lock hospital?—No, not in that way.

2220. With regard to this poor woman, you said that it was better that she should die than that she should go on leading a life of prostitution. I do not want to press you as to your opinions, but would you say that it was better that these women should be diseased than that they should be restored to health, if the result of their being restored to health is to enable them to go on leading a life of prostitution?—I should desire them certainly to be cared for, and to be restored to health, and hospitals to be opened for them; but I should desire it to be voluntary and not to be guarded by the State.

2221. Do you believe that if it was perfectly open to these women to go to the hospital they would, if they were allowed to go or not, just as they pleased, voluntarily submit themselves to hospital treatment?—I believe they would, of course on the supposition that there were hospitals for them to go to. Every effort would be made on our part, and by other agencies, for the purpose of drawing them in.

2222. May I ask what grounds you have for that belief; is it your own surmise only?—It is my own opinion formed from my dealings with the women themselves.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

2223. I understand that your principal objection to the Acts is upon religious grounds?—Mainly so, religious and moral.

2224. You consider that these Acts regulate prostitution?—Yes.

2225. Will you kindly explain to me in what sense you use the expression "regulating prostitution"?—I mean to say that the Acts provide for the commission, with greater impunity, of a sin which is forbidden by God. By the Acts we make provision "for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof."

2226. You mean to say that the law recognises and deals with this particular Act which you call a sin; is that your meaning?—That is so.

2227. Does not the law do so now in many other instances?—Not in the same way, I think.

2228. For instance, if a prostitute walks down the main street of Woolwich and accosts passers-by, without behaving disorderly, and demonstrates to the passers-by her character, she will be arrested by the police and charged by them; if, on the other hand, the same woman goes down the street for the same purposes, and it is equally obvious to all passers-by what she is, but does not conduct herself in a demonstrative or remarkable manner, the police will not meddle with her at all; is not that so?—I presume that is so.

2229. Then does not the law now really regulate prostitution?—The reason that the police interfere, is because the woman interferes with somebody else. That is quite a different thing from regulating prostitution; it is not because the woman is a prostitute, and it is not because the woman is in the performance of a sinful act, or because she is leading a sinful life, but it is because she interferes with somebody else.

2230. If a woman walks up and down the street, M sreet, and does not accost anybody at all, and if she is obviously there for the purposes of prostitution, it is quite open to the police to arrest her and charge her; it is not necessary that she should be guilty of any overt act; do you know that to be the law?—I do not pretend to know all the ins-and-outs of the law upon the subject; but I presume that it would be illegal for a woman to stand about in that way, if she was thoroughly well known to the police to be a prostitute.

2231. Does not the law interfere with and tolerate, and regulate prostitution in the cases that I have brought under your notice?—The law would interfere, but with the very express object of not tolerating.

2232. Does it not tolerate prostitution if, when the authorities see prostitutes in the streets, they know, and know that they are there for the purposes of prostitution, they do not arrest them?—Yes, in so far as that goes that is toleration; but those cases to my mind (of course I am speaking merely from my own personal feeling) are different from that recognition which is given them by the Acts.

2233. I dare say they may be; but I am now asking whether it is not the experience of every day in the principal streets of London, that you see prostitutes there, and you also find the authorities not interfering?—Yes, the law tolerates a great many other things besides that.

2234. If the law does interfere with these prostitutes, it interferes with them by an Act, as it were of repression, that is to say, an act of charging them with an offence, and perhaps consigning them to prison?—Which Act are you speaking of now?

2235. When the police take notice of and regulate these acts of prostitution in the streets, is it not in the direction of repression and punishment?—It would be so.

2236. And the same with regard to brothels?—I presume so.

2237. You know, I dare say, that there are a great number of brothels in every town in England that are tolerated by the police?—Yes, I should say so.

2238. Therefore, where brothels are suppressed, any action of the police is in the direction of punishment?—Yes.

2239. When the police interfere under the Contagious Diseases Acts with prostitution, is not their action in the direction of humanity, that is to say, is it not for the purpose of putting the prostitutes into hospitals where they will be cured?—That is not so. I do not think that is in the direction of humanity.

2240. Is it not humane where an unfortunate woman is suffering from a terrible disease to take her into a hospital, to treat her kindly, and to cure her?—No, it is not in the direction of humanity in the result.

2241. As a clergyman of the Church of England, and in charge of an important mission, you say that where an unfortunate woman, suffering from a terrible disease of which she cannot cure herself, is taken by the authorities into a hospital and cured, that is not an act of humanity?—Not in the result.

Chairman.

2242. Will you explain, briefly, what you mean by that?—What I mean is this: that the evil which accrues to that woman under the whole system of the Acts, considering what she has to go through with regard to inspection and all the matters connected with it, is greater than the good.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

2243. Then it would be more humane to leave her as she is?—It would be more in accordance with God's law.

2244. You would prefer then that, instead of taking these unfortunate women, many of whom are perishing from disease, and putting them into a hospital and curing them, they should be allowed to perish miserably?—No, I do not say that.

2245. Then what do you say?—I have said nothing of the kind, because the supposition which underlies the whole of my principle, in all the answers I am trying to give to you, is that I would make all possible arrangements for these women to come into the hospitals where they would be cured, but not under such a system as that of the Acts.

2246. Are you aware that it is a matter of fact that they do not come into the hospitals where they will be cured?—I am not aware of the fact.

2247. Have you ever read the evidence of Dr. Bond?—No, I cannot say that I have.

2248. Nor the other evidence given by Mr. Lane and other medical authorities?—Some of it.

2249. Have you never read their evidence on the subject of the voluntary examination?—No amount of evidence that I could read would alter my opinion.

2250. Therefore, if it was proved to you by the greatest authorities in the world, that voluntary hospitals were practically ineffective, you would not believe them?—What I mean is this: that nothing that could be put in favour of the present system would justify it to my mind.

2251. There being no voluntary hospitals available for these women, and there being the Government hospitals available for them, are you still of opinion that it would be better to get rid of the Government hospitals?—Yes, if the compulsory hospital carries with it the system of examination I should desire to see it done away with.

2252. You have said that the prostitutes of old standing are difficult to reclaim?—Yes, very.

2253. And that, consequently, they almost always go back to their old calling?—Almost always.

2254. Do you know how many registered prostitutes there are in Woolwich?—I cannot say that I know the exact number.

2255. Would you believe it to be about 150?—About that number, I should say.

2256. I understood that your complaint against these prostitutes was that many of them continued in their trade, and that they were hardened, because they were old standing?—That is so.

2257. And

28 March 1882.]

Rev. H. R. BAKER.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

2257. And that that was the effect of the Acts?—The Acts assist that result, I think.

2258. And it was one of your complaints against the Acts that it kept women continuously in prostitution?—I think so.

2259. I suppose it would hardly be considered possible that there would be at any time less than 150 prostitutes in a district like Woolwich; do you think that the Acts have had the effect of increasing the number of prostitutes?—On the whole I should imagine that they had.

2260. Supposing that there is a normal number of prostitutes always exercising their calling in a place like Woolwich, if those women did not consist of the old and hardened prostitutes, their places would be supplied by younger women, would they not?—It is possible; I cannot say that they would.

2261. Therefore, there would be a continual flow and re-flow?—Possibly so.

2262. Do you not think that it is much better that innocent people should be kept out of prostitution as much as possible?—Quite so.

2264. But do you not consider prostitution a necessary condition of society?—It ought not to be.

2265. But is it not?—No; I say boldly that it is not.

2266. Will you name to me any part of the world where there is no prostitution?—I cannot name any; but that does not make it necessary.

2267. I say a necessary condition?—It is not a necessary condition.

2268. You cannot name any place in the world where there is not prostitution?—Possibly not; but that does not make it a necessary condition.

2269. Do you not consider that it is desirable to contract the field of prostitution as much as possible?—Yes, in certain ways.

2270. Are you aware that, as a rule, it is the practice of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police in all these subjected districts to warn young persons who are commencing a career of prostitution?—I take it from you that it is so, but that might be done without these Acts.

2271. But do you not think that that is a very desirable and beneficial practice?—In itself it is.

2272. How could it be done without the Acts?—Any policeman, or any one who knew that a child was going to ruin, would interfere if he had the desire of doing good and the love of God before his eyes.

2273. Have you any information that the local police have any such duty imposed upon them?—No, I am not aware that they have; but of course these are not the particular points or features of the Acts that I object to. The local police have often assisted me in reclaiming young girls.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

2274. Have the local police ever come to you and told you that such and such a member of your congregation was entering upon a career of prostitution?—No, I cannot say that they have.

2275. Do you know of any case in which they have told other ministers of religion so?—No, I do not know any other cases.

2276. Are you aware that it is the habitual practice of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police, whenever they find a young person in danger in this way, to take this course?—They may do it, but I am not personally aware of it.

2277. I think you told my Right honourable friend the Judge Advocate General that you had no complaint to make against the Contagious Diseases Acts' police?—No.

2278. You never heard of any complaint?—I never heard of any complaint.

2279. Nor of any established case of undue interference with a prostitute, or with a respectable woman?—No.

Dr. Cameron.

2280. You said, did you not, in answer to the Right honourable Gentleman, that in no case had the local police brought to your knowledge any case of a young girl connected with your congregation going astray?—Yes, I think I said that; but I also said that they had often assisted me in such cases.

2281. I wish to ask you, in supplement to that question, whether, in any instance, any policeman under the Contagious Diseases Acts brought such a case under your notice?—No, never.

2282. I think you further said that, in no instances with which you were acquainted, had the ordinary police brought such cases under the notice of clergymen?—No.

2283. Does the same remark apply to police constables working under the Contagious Diseases Acts?—It does, so far as I am aware.

Mr. Hopwood.

2284. You said that you objected to this law on religious and moral grounds; you have given us the religious grounds; may I ask you as to the moral grounds, whether you do not think that these laws set a bad example to the morals of the community, even if we could separate the moral from the religious view?—Yes; I think, apart from the religious effect, the effect upon the women themselves is demoralising.

2285. Has the fact of its being known to the young of a place that women are examined for this purpose, and examined with a view to the continuance of the immoral lives they are leading, to your mind a very strong effect as a bad moral example?—It has certainly.

2286. Must it lead necessarily to remarks and comments about it amongst themselves by the young?—Yes; I cannot substantiate it absolutely, but I have the best reason for believing that the children in my parish play at what they call "inspection."

2287. You were asked, first, whether prostitutes are not recognised by the law, and then my Right honourable friend, instead of that, substituted the word "tolerated." In the same sense a thief is tolerated by the law, is he not; he has the right to go along the streets; he may be known to be a thief, either going to commit some theft, or having committed some theft, and yet he may not be arrested?—Quite so; and the same sort of observations would apply to drunkenness.

2288. As to the law tolerating it, is it not that the law is not severely or strictly enforced; would not that rather better explain it than the word "tolerate"?—I think that would better explain it.

2289. You know, probably, that brothels are unlawful, and that there is power to suppress every one of them?—Yes.

2290. The law is not enforced against them?—That is so.

2291. But you do not admit that therefore the law, in the sense of my Right honourable friend, tolerates them?—Quite so.

2292. I am afraid you are not lawyer enough to answer me, but is it not the fact that prostitution in any sense is by law illegal?—I was not aware of that.

2293. It is called illicit, is it not?—Yes.

2294. Illicitum is unlawful?—Quite so.

2295. As regards the curing of these poor people, do I understand that your feeling is strongly that they should be cured?—Most decidedly.

2296. But you differ from these Acts, and the originators of them, as to the mode in which that should be done?—Quite so; and the means by which we desire to carry out the cure.

2297. Do you believe that if those Government hospitals were made private, or voluntary hospitals, by the endeavours of yourself and other ministers of religion, and people interested in reclaiming prostitutes, you could get the women to avail themselves of the curing powers of the hospital?—I do believe that myself.

2298. And you would hope to operate upon them mentally with better effect than you think you can now?—Yes.

2299. You are pressed as to whether you do not think prostitution a necessary evil, and my Right honourable friend puts it to you whether it has not always existed; it may be true that it has always existed, but that does not prove that it is a necessary evil?—That is my point.

2300. The same may be said of many another vice, or many another wrong-doing, that it has been more or less from the beginning, but moralists do not admit that such things are necessary in the sense that they must be allowed?—That is so.

Mr. William Fowler.

2301. To carry that point a step further, take the case of stealing; has not stealing always existed?—I imagine so.

2302. Has it ever been recognised as a necessity by any code of laws in the world?—Not that I am aware of.

2303. And would it not be a monstrous thing if it was?—I think so.

2304. Would not the doctrine that prostitution is a necessity involve the doctrine that all unmarried men should be continually consorting with prostitutes?—Yes.

2305. Then you repudiate that doctrine?—I do, utterly.

Mr. William Fowler—continued.

2306. Is not the whole fabric of these laws based upon that idea?—I think so, and that is the reason why I object to them.

2307. Is it not really a system for cleaning up women, at the expense of the State, for profligate men?—That is my view of it; and I should like to say, if I may, that another strong objection that I have to the Acts is that they are wholly and entirely one-sided, and that whereas they fall heavily upon one class of people, upon one sex, the other sex, who are quite as much to blame, and equally sinners, go scot free.

2308. In reference to that, I should like to ask you a question or two upon the point of the closing up of brothels. Last year we had evidence from the great city of Glasgow that, as regards a large part of that city, they had closed the brothels, and I asked the principal police officer, who was here, whether any inconvenience had arisen, and whether any complaints had been made by any class of people whatever, and he said "No"; would you not think that the same thing would result in your town?—I think there are some people who might complain that in the closing up of the brothels you had simply scattered the women all over the place.

2309. Of course the closing of the brothels would not put an end to prostitution?—Certainly not.

2310. At the same time that would be carrying out the idea of the existing law to repress, not to regulate the evil?—Yes.

2311. That also brings me to another point; something was said by the Right honourable Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven with regard to the number of women in the district, and he asked you whether 150 was a reasonable number, and you objected to that expression; you did not like the idea of any number being considered reasonable, because you were not prepared to admit that any number was necessary at all?—Quite so.

2312. But in your opinion is it not the fact that there are a great many besides those you have already told us, and that the great probability is that the number is very much larger than 150 of those who live to some extent at any rate by prostitution?—Quite so.

2313. I am not sure whether you were asked whether, since this system of the Acts was introduced, that number of outside women had increased or not; have you any opinion upon that point?—Yes, I should say that it had. I cannot say exactly when the Acts came into operation in Woolwich, but latterly I think on the whole it has increased.

2314. There is another point that I should like to ask you about as to this question of the women going in and out voluntarily; there has been a great discussion about it as you are aware ever since this question was raised; and I understand you to say that you have a strong opinion that if all your influence and the influence of other gentlemen in your position was brought to bear upon them a large number would go into hospitals if hospitals were provided, and would remain there for the purpose of cure?—I think so.

2315. The question was put to you whether, if

if it was proved that they would not, you would still adhere to your opinion; what I understood you to mean was this: that, as far as your information and observation went, you were strongly of the mind that they would go in, and that the mere opinion of any other man would not alter that opinion of yours?—That is what I meant. No present knowledge of mine has shown me proof to the contrary of what I think about it.

2316. Something was said about the instructions to the police; are you or are you not aware that there is nothing in the Acts by way of instruction to the police to bring to bear any moral suasion upon the women?—Nothing whatever.

2317. Nor to advise parents, nor anything of that kind?—No.

2318. In fact the whole framework of the Acts is intended to affect the question of disease, and not the question of the moral condition of the women?—Quite so.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2319. With reference to the return from the Lock Hospital for the year ending on the 31st of December 1881, which you put in, the Judge Advocate General asked you whether you thought it was fair to compare the two columns of "Government" and "ordinary" patients on the ground that the ordinary patients would include not only prostitutes but other women suffering from venereal disease; you are aware, are you not, that this Lock Hospital is the one to which London prostitutes are enabled to resort?—Yes, I am aware of that.

2320. Are you aware, that in the evidence of Mr. Lane last year, he stated that the voluntary side of the hospital was always full, and that they had to make a selection, and take only the more serious cases?—Yes, I saw that from his evidence.

2321. It would therefore seem probable that these cases are serious cases, and that in the great majority of them, they are cases of women practising prostitution; that I take it is your belief?—That was my belief, and that was what I meant.

2322. But I did not understand you as meaning that these figures were to be taken as, in your mind, representing an absolutely accurate comparison of results between those two classes; you gave these figures, did you not, for what they are worth?—Quite so.

2323. And as we have now the expectation of having Dr. Cooke before us, probably you will not wish to carry that part of your evidence further?—No.

2324. The Judge Advocate General spoke to you about the chaplain's ministrations, and their probable good effects; I take it that, in your opinion, the ministrations would be likely to be more effectual in a free than in a compulsory hospital?—That is so.

2325. But so far as the instructions are concerned, you are probably aware that the ministrations of the chaplain are of a very limited character. We have before us the instructions; would you have the kindness to read to the Committee the instructions to the chaplain?—"The chaplain will visit the hospital at least twice a week, and read prayers, selecting an hour convenient to the 0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

hospital routine. He will perform Divine Service at least once every Sunday, Good Friday, and Christmas Day. On such occasions the matron and the servants of the hospital should be present with the patients."

2326. Is that all?—That is all.

2327. Those are the instructions laid before this Committee, under date 1879?—Yes.

2328. The Judge Advocate General also asked you, I think, with reference to local opinion at Woolwich, if you could give the Committee any information as to the opinions of the Members for the locality; is not Woolwich in the borough of Greenwich?—It is.

2329. May I direct your attention to the division list of the House of Commons of the 23rd of June 1875, on the second reading of the Bill for the repeal of these Acts; may I ask you if you find there the name of one of the then Members for Greenwich, and will you read us the name?—"The Right Honourable W. E. Gladstone."

2330. May I take you to the year 1876, and will you do the same?—The same again, "The Right Honourable W. E. Gladstone."

2331. Therefore, when the present Prime Minister was Member for Greenwich, including Woolwich, he twice voted for the repeal of these Acts?—Yes.

2332. My Right honourable friend the Member for Whitehaven has put some questions to you with the view of ascertaining whether you would desire to shut up these Government hospitals; I understood your evidence to be that you were against the whole system, including the compulsory examination and the compulsory detention?—That is so.

2333. But have you, from a moral or religious point of view, any objection to the most complete possible provision of medical care for those who are physically ill, whatever the cause of their illness may be?—None whatever.

2334. Therefore, you would agree with me in the opinion that there ought to be ample provision of that kind, though not of a compulsory nature?—For that disease as for any other.

2335. And you would probably share with me the hope that if these Acts were repealed, that provision would in some other way be made?—Yes.

2336-7. My Right honourable friend ventured upon a serious proposition, I think, when he asked whether it was not better that the Government should create a few hardened ones on the chance of keeping the innocent out of the pale. With reference to that question of the Right honourable Gentleman's, I would ask you this: first of all, if the system tends to increase the period of time during which women lead a life of prostitution, does it necessarily follow in your mind that it also tends to reduce the number of women and girls who practise prostitution?—No, I think not.

2339. In fact would you be disposed to express this view: that the system fostered by these

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

Acts increases the demand for prostitutes, and therefore, by a natural law, increases the supply?—Quite so.

2340. In the second place, supposing that it were within the power of the Legislature, or of the Government by administration, or by law, to limit the flow of young women through the ranks of prostitution by creating a more permanent caste, do you consider that that would be within the true functions of Government or of Parliament from a moral and religious point of view?—Certainly not.

2341. I gather, therefore, that in your opinion it is not consistent with Christian morality that on any speculative chance either of improving the physical health or of lessening the temptations of a certain portion of the population, the Government should create a class or caste of permanent prostitutes who devote their lives to that calling?—Certainly I do not think they should.

2342. My Right honourable friend spoke of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police as making it a practice to warn and to save young girls; but we have before us the very latest instructions to the police, dated June 1881, and I put those instructions into your hands, and ask you whether you will take it from me that there is no reference whatever to wavering in those instructions?—I find no such reference.

Chairman.

2343. The number of young girls of tender years, we will say, passing through your Refuge is much larger than the number of young girls of similar age revealed by the register and by Captain Harris's report; is not that so?—Yes.

2344. As to those young girls who go through your Refuge, and who do not appear on the register, I wish to ask you whether those young girls had been actually on the streets?—Many of them.

2345. Not all?—Not all.

2346. I suppose some of them are young girls who have been detected in an act of private immorality, not done in the character of a prostitute?—Yes, some of them.

2347. Immorality carried on with their companions?—But the greater majority of them have been on the streets, even of the young ones.

2348. Even of those who do not appear upon the register?—Yes, that is so.

2349. Could you at all say what proportion of the young girls who go through your Refuge, and do not appear on the register, have been on the streets?—Taking that first column, I should say that perhaps out of the seven, there may have been two who were quite private, and got from their own homes, leaving the five. I should say that that would be about the proportion.

2350. Taking the cases of the other five, and girls in an analogous condition, would they be girls caught up off the streets through the instrumentality of your charitable organisation, very early in their career of vice?—They must necessarily be so; they are so young themselves.

2351. And I suppose in those cases they would be rescued from the streets before they had come under the notice of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police?—That would be so.

Friday, 31st March 1882.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.
Mr. Burt.
Dr. Cameron.
Colonel Digby.
Dr. Farquharson.

Mr. William Fowler.
Mr. Osborne Morgan.
Mr. O'Shaughnessy.
Mr. Stansfeld.
Colonel Tottenham.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. FREDERIC WHEELER, re-called; and further Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2352. THE other day, in answer to the honourable Member for West Aberdeenshire, I understand you to admit that you could not undertake to distinguish a registered from an unregistered woman, and that, therefore, it was beyond your power to say, with any exactitude, what number of prostitutes not on the register there might be?—Yes.

2353. Turning to Captain Harris's report, page 8, under the head of "Chatham," and taking column 15, according to those figures the number of registered women in Chatham has decreased tolerably regularly, with some exceptions, for upwards of 10 years, and now stands at 164?—Yes.

2354. Do you feel able, from your own observation and from your knowledge, to say that you cannot accept those figures, and that the total number of prostitutes is considerably larger than 164?—I quite believe so from what I have heard; and my observation, so far as it goes, confirms it.

2355. I would put it in another way. These figures show a decided decrease; for instance, the Act was put into force in Chatham in 1869, and I find that in 1869 Captain Harris's return admits a number of 287 registered prostitutes, now reduced to 164; do you believe that there has been any reduction in the amount of prostitution in Chatham, whether carried on by registered or by unregistered prostitutes, between the years 1869 and 1880?—I cannot believe it, judging from the information that I have received.

2356. And you do not believe that those figures which profess to represent the total number of women practising prostitution in Chatham represent that total number?—I do not believe it. So far as I can speak to that, my answer would be more emphatic as relating to the later years, that is to say, comparing 170 prostitutes with 164.

2357. To put it in another way, independently of any general conviction of that kind, you are positively persuaded of the fact, are you not (I think you have given evidence already to that effect), of the existence of clandestine prostitution in Chatham; that is to say, women practising prostitution more or less, who are not on the register?—I think I am warranted in coming to that conclusion from the information which I received.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

2358. You were further asked also by the honourable Member a question upon the moral and religious influences of the hospital; you are aware, are you not, of the argument which is sometimes adduced by supporters of these Acts, that the system of compulsory examination and of committal to hospital of women upon that compulsory examination found to be diseased, secures the passing of a large proportion of those women through the hospital in the course of each year, during which they cannot avoid receiving the benefits of the moral and religious ministrations and advice of the chaplain and the matron of the hospital?—That is so.

2359. The question that I would put to you is this, and I would ask you to base your answer upon your own experience in rescue-work: Are you prepared to say that moral and religious influences operate at great disadvantage under a compulsory system?—Yes, I feel that very strongly, and I have already stated that to Dr. Farquharson.

2361. And you would not, yourself, expect, would you, having some knowledge of endeavours to exercise moral and religious influences upon portions of the population, to succeed as well with a class of people who are compelled by force of law to listen to you as those whom you persuaded to listen to your moral and religious arguments?—There is a wide difference, I consider.

2362. From your own experience in this matter, and your knowledge of the opinion of other people engaged in similar rescue-work, have you any doubt that they would feel much more hopeful as to the effect upon the minds of the persons to whom they addressed themselves

Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

if they dealt without the compulsion of the law?—Yes.

2363. You were further asked again, I believe, by the honourable Member whether the mere fact of the practice of prostitution was not so hardening that there is no reason to attribute to the periodical examination the hardened character of those women. If I understand your views rightly, you would admit that the practice of prostitution was hardening, but you would also hold that prostitution, plus the periodical examination, was more hardening still?—Very much more so.

2364. And you would say, would you not, that in expressing that individual opinion of your own you express the opinion of persons with whom you have been very much accustomed to associate in rescue-work?—Yes, including the matrons of our home.

2365. Who, you told us, I think, have found, or believe that they have found, that difference in the character of the women who have passed through these homes?—Yes, which I have already spoken of.

2366. You were asked further about the facilities for escape from the life of prostitution which are afforded by this system of sending prostitutes, who were diseased, through the hospital once or twice a-year, and offering them opportunities of escape into a happier life when they find themselves there. Turning to page 14 of Captain Harris's return, do you not find that in 1869 the number of prostitutes of the age of 31 and over was 163?—Yes.

2367. Looking at the total, do you not find that the total of known common women was at that time recorded as 2,557?—Yes.

2368. Carrying your eye down to the year 1880, is not the number of prostitutes of 31 years of age and over raised from 163 to no less than 398, although the total number of common women during the same period is supposed to have dropped from 2,557 to 1879?—Yes, it is so.

2369. Turning to page 16, and taking the case of Chatham, do you not find that, in the year 1869, the number of prostitutes of the age of 31 and over was 16, which was reduced to 11 in the year 1870, with a total number of 287 prostitutes on the register?—Yes.

2370. And coming down to the year 1880, do you not find that the 16 and the 11 are raised to 31, whilst the 287 are reduced to 164?—Yes.

2371. I would ask you what inference you draw from those figures as to the practical effect of the Acts in affording facilities to prostitutes for escape from their vicious life?—I think the result is manifestly that they remain for a longer series of years in their sinful career.

2372. And you find, do you not, casting your eye down these columns, that that is an increasing tendency of the system of the Acts?—I think so, clearly.

2373. I think the Judge Advocate General asked you whether you were not bound to admit that the Contagious Diseases Acts police must know more about the number of clandestine prostitutes than yourself, and you naturally admitted that they must?—Yes, I think I admitted it.

2374. But is it not the duty of the police, under the Contagious Diseases Acts, to do away with clandestine prostitution, by placing the name of every prostitute upon the register?—Yes, clearly.

2376. Although, therefore, you admit that they must probably know more about the number of clandestine prostitutes, nevertheless you yourself, as I understand, are not prepared to admit the accuracy of their own figures, even with their superior knowledge?—I do not.

2377. You maintain that they have not succeeded in placing the names of all prostitutes in Chatham upon the register at Chatham?—That is quite my view.

2378. Although they speak in one sense with greater authority, though not perhaps with an absolute and indubitable impartiality, you have more or less followed the evidence given before this Committee, and you have observed, I take it, that the opinions of the police are not entirely unanimous upon this subject?—That is very clear.

2379. Have you referred to the evidence of the heads of the local police at Devonport, Plymouth, and Stonehouse?—I have.

2380. And are you able to say, having referred to their evidence, that they entirely dispute the accuracy of the figures of Inspector Anniss, of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police, in those towns?—Yes, emphatically.

2381. And I presume that, speaking of the police as we sometimes do of doctors, you would say that where they differ you may venture to entertain an opinion of your own?—Yes.

2382. You admitted very candidly, in reply to one honourable Member, that there might occasionally be good results traceable, if not to the Contagious Diseases Acts directly, at least to the action of those who worked them?—Yes; I think I called them incidental cases.

2383. You had no difficulty in making that admission?—No, not at all.

2384. You could say the same probably, could you not, of any law?—Yes, of most laws.

2385. And of any human institution?—Yes.

2386. The same thing was said, was it not, and said with truth, of black slavery?—Yes.

2387. And you do not wonder that it is said of the white slavery with which we are dealing now?—No.

2388. I take it that your view is this: that the way to judge legislation is to judge of the balance of good or evil in its influences?—Clearly; I think I said that.

2389. And you said that the balance here is, in your opinion, heavily against the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Yes.

2390. You were asked by the Right honourable gentleman the Member for Whitehaven to say, I think, that the health of the women had improved. We have had evidence of conditions of disease when the women were not in any sense cared for, and had no homes to live in, but when they lived in the ditches and the drains; and we know that the state of things, so far as the physical condition

31 March 1882.]

Mr. WHEELER.

condition of the women is concerned, has improved since then. But, as far as the operation of the Acts themselves and the system of periodical examination are concerned, I would ask you to turn again to page 5 of this return of Captain Harris's. If you look down column 31 you will find the annual ratio per cent. of cases of disease calculated on the average number of women on the register. In the year 1869 the number of cases per cent. was 194; that is to say, that every woman was admitted as diseased nearly twice a year. Two years previously it was only 140. We then come to the year 1870, and we find a commencing figure of 148. Casting your eye down this column, do you not find, after a certain time, a tendency to increase in the proportion of disease, and is not the figure for the year 1880 no less than 176·48 per 100?—Yes.

2391. Therefore, so far as those figures convey an impression to your mind, they do not convey the impression that the permanent effect of the administration of the Acts has been to reduce the proportion of disease amongst the women?—Quite so.

2392. I bring you now to the Caroline Wybrow case. Have you before you Paper No. 5, which you handed in, and Paper No. 6 which came from the War Office; and have you also before you the evidence given before this Committee last year?—Yes.

2393. You have read this further Official Paper No. 6?—Yes, within the last 24 hours; not before that.

2394. I want you to help us to see clearly the facts which are explicitly admitted upon the face of that correspondence. First of all, I will ask you what you find to be admitted, and then I will ask you to refer to the passages in the Papers Nos. 5 and 6, which prove to your mind the correctness of your statements. You are of opinion, are you not, that it is clearly admitted upon these Papers that the police ordered Caroline Wybrow to go up for examination?—Yes.

2395. They did not invite her to sign the voluntary submission, or to go before a magistrate, but they ordered her to go up for examination?—Yes.

2396. When you turn to Appendix 5, page 5, the report from Inspector William Capon, do you not find these words: "I called on her, and directed her to attend for medical examination?"—Yes.

2397. Upon the same page there is a letter from Captain Harris to Mr. Liddell; in that letter do you not find this expression: "Prior to the police warning her to attend the Lock Hospital for medical examination?"—Yes.

2398. You told us the other day that this ordering of Caroline Wybrow to go up for examination was, in your judgment, illegal?—I thought so.

2400. At the end of paragraph 1, the opinion of the Secretary of State is expressed in these terms, is it not: "If such an order was given" (as was 9.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

given in this case) "it would not be illegal, only of no legal validity, but it would be an irregularity liable to be misconstrued"?—Those are the words.

2401. Does not this appear further: that the police officer backed up this order, which we may call "illegal, or of no legal validity," with a threat that if the girl did not obey she would be sent to Maidstone Gaol; is that admitted and not denied upon this Paper, Appendix 5, page 3, paragraph 2, of the statutory declaration of the girl Caroline Wybrow?—Yes.

2402. And do I read correctly these words: "he" (that is, Mr. Capon) "said, if I did not go" (that is, say, to the Lock Hospital) "I should be sent to Maidstone; I suppose he means to Maidstone Gaol"?—Yes.

2403. Then, if you turn to page 2, paragraph 2, which is the statutory declaration of the mother, does she not say, "I saw the constable who came on the second occasion, and he said she had been with soldiers and girls, and would be sent to Maidstone Gaol if she did not go"?—Yes.

2404. If you turn to Appendix 6, page 1, paragraph 3, the very last paragraph of the letter of the Secretary of State, what are the directions given in that paragraph by the Secretary of State?—"The Secretary of State desires especially to impress that instructions should be given to the constable employed under the Contagious Diseases Acts to abstain from directing any woman to attend at the hospital unless she has either signed a voluntary submission, or expressed herself willing to do so."

2405. Of course it is not within your knowledge exactly how far that direction may have been obeyed; but, supposing that those instructions have been given to the police under that direction of the Secretary of State, are you able to point to cases since that date in which the instructions have clearly not been obeyed by the police?—I have read of some, but I am not familiarly acquainted with the details of them.

2406. You have before you, have you not, the evidence of last year?—Yes.

2407. Will you turn to the cases of Ellen Vokes and Elizabeth Burley?—The case of Ellen Vokes was one that I meant.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

2408. Do you know anything about these cases from your own knowledge?—No, only from reading.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2409. You refer us to the case of Ellen Vokes at page 478 of the Appendix to the Report of 1881, and to the case of Elizabeth Burley at Questions 6987-91?—Yes.

2410. A second fact, which, I think, clearly appears upon those documents, is, that the medical officer ordered the girl Caroline Wybrow to be confined in hospital as a punishment, instead of proceeding under Section 28 of the Act of 1866?—Yes.

2411. You would consider that course illegal?—Yes, clearly.

2412. What is the Home Secretary's opinion of that course? in Paper No. 6, page 1, the Secretary

tary of State considers it "irregular," does he not: is not that the phrase?—Yes.

2413. And he indicates that the proper course would have been to take criminal proceedings against the girl under Section 28 of the Act of 1866?—That is what he says.

2414. That "irregular course" appears to have been thought more lenient by the Secretary of State than the procedure indicated by the Legislature itself?—Yes, he says so.

2415. But that "irregular course" was imprisonment without legal authority?—Yes.

2416. The third fact that I want to bring out is, that the woman was not diseased. That was the result of the examination of February the 5th. Turning to Paper No. 5, page 6, where you will find Dr. Jardine's letter of the 12th of February, does he not state that on the second occasion he did examine her, and came to the conclusion that she was not diseased?—Yes.

2417. And the Home Secretary, upon that, in Paper No. 6, page 1, paragraph 2, states: "Nor does there appear to have been any reasonable ground for a belief that the girl was affected with disease"?—Those are the words.

2418. To pass rapidly over this part of the case, if you turn to Paper No. 6, page 5, do you not find that the action, neither of the police, nor of the medical officers, was approved by the authorities?—Clearly.

2419. The entire case has been called a very trying case, and I suppose you would think it very trying to the girl?—Yes.

2420. Does it not appear upon these Papers that it was treated by the superior officials entirely upon the assumption that the girl was a common prostitute?—Yes.

2421. I want to be very clear upon this subject. Turning to Paper No. 5, page 5, does not Captain Harris there say: "Prior to the police warning her to attend the Lock Hospital for medical examination, it is alleged that she was the constant companion and associate of prostitutes and soldiers, a frequenter of brothels, and in every respect conducted herself in such a way as to warrant the police in bringing her under the operation of the Acts"?—Those are his words.

2422. Will you look at Paper No. 6, page 5, which contains the letter of Mr. Ralph Thompson, where he, speaking for the Secretary of State for War at that time, says: "Mr. Hardy cannot accept the view of the assistant visiting surgeon, that the mere facts of this woman being a common prostitute, and refusing to be examined, were sufficient grounds for detaining her on suspicion of disease." It appears to you, does it not, upon those statements, that it has been assumed, from first to last by the authorities, that this woman, whether diseased or not, was a common prostitute?—Yes.

2423. You utterly disbelieve that imputation;—Yes, I do.

2424. Upon what does that assumption rest, as far as the evidence before us is concerned; there was no judicial investigation?—Not any.

2425. It rests entirely upon the assertions of the police, does it not?—Entirely.

2426. Let us look for a moment to the nature of those assertions. Turning to Paper No. 5, pages 5 and 6, there are a number of general assertions, are there not, by police constables Chapman, Armstrong, Green, and Clarke, that Caroline Wybrow was nightly or frequently seen in company with soldiers and prostitutes and in brothels?—Yes.

2427. Did you ever apply to the police for the name of any brothel in which she had been so found, or the date of her being seen in such company?—I did.

2428. To whom did you apply?—To Inspector Capon.

2429. Did he decline to give you any information?—He did.

2430. To whom else did you apply?—He referred me to the superintendent, and I applied to the superintendent to let me know the street or the place where this brothel was.

2431. Did he decline?—He declined.

2432. Your question to him was with reference to this girl having been seen in a brothel?—Yes, I wanted to know where it was.

2433. Then, did you apply to Captain Harris?—The superintendent said that he could not give me the information unless he had authority from Scotland-yard, so I wrote to Captain Harris.

2434. Did you receive a letter from him?—Yes.

2435. Do you produce that letter?—Yes (producing the same).

2436. Is this the letter: "4, Whitehall-place, 7th October 1876. I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letters of the 8th and 26th ultimo, asking certain questions with reference to a report made by Inspector Capon in the case of Caroline Wybrow, and to acquaint you in reply that I decline to give the information for which you apply"?—That is it.

2437. These allegations of the police are all in very general terms. Can you refer us to any specific allegations of time and place in these Papers?—There are the statements of Armstrong and Chapman.

2438. What are their allegations?—"On the 20th of January last, at 7 p.m., she was seen in company with two soldiers and a prostitute in the High-street, Chatham, and went into the 'Golden Cross' beerhouse, a house frequented by soldiers and prostitutes. She remained there till 8.45 p.m., when they all came out together; and immediately they saw us, the prostitute covered Caroline Wybrow's face over with her handkerchief, to hide her face from us, she being the worse for drink at the time."

2439. That was on the 20th of January 1875?—Yes.

2440. What was the date upon which the police constable saw her, and ordered her to attend the examination?—In the first instance upon that day in the morning.

2441. On the morning of that very day an order was conveyed to her to attend the examination; you find that, do you not, in the statement of Inspector Capon, Paper No. 5, page 5, and the statutory declaration of Caroline Wybrow, Paper No. 5, paragraph 3, page 1?—I find that in the declaration, but Inspector Capon does not give the date, I think.

2442. But

31 March 1882.]

Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

2442. But it does appear, does it not, upon the face of these Papers, that upon the morning of Wednesday the 20th of January, she was ordered to attend for examination, and that the only specific allegation of time and place on the part of the police of her having been seen at what they call a beerhouse frequented by soldiers and prostitutes, refers to the afternoon of that day?—Yes, at seven o'clock in the evening.

2443. So that first of all, they illegally ordered her up to the hospital for examination as a prostitute, and then in the afternoon of that day they endeavoured to obtain evidence in support of that illegal action?—Yes.

2444. Did you make special inquiry into the character of this public-house or beerhouse, the "Golden Cross"?—I did, of the police.

2445. What did you find?—It was the clearest and fullest exculpation of the keeper of the house.

2446. I understand that the information which you received was to the effect that this house does not at all partake of the nature of a brothel; that it is a public-house open to the public, but that, if it is attended by soldiers and prostitutes, it is not for the purpose of prostitution?—Just so; that was clearly stated by the police themselves to me on the 2nd of May 1876, at the police office.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

2447. Do you mean the local police, or the Contagious Diseases Acts' police?—The local police.

2448. Of whom did you inquire; of the local police, or of the metropolitan police?—The local police; the Kent county constabulary.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2449. As far as this particular occasion is concerned, you do not find that they speak of the "Golden Cross" beerhouse as a place conducted as a brothel, but only as a place frequented by soldiers and prostitutes?—Yes, and that might be said, perhaps, of almost every public-house.

2450. In fact, this house was a house with a kind of concert-room attached open to the general public, was it not?—Yes.

2451. And the public that frequent houses of that kind are not able to be very nice as to those who sit by them?—They are sure to have some of those customers.

2452. Then this girl is treated by the nurse, Miss Webb, is she not, on the assumption that she has been leading a sinful life; you find that clearly, do you not, in Miss Webb's letter, which is contained in this Paper No. 6?—In Paper No. 6, page 3.

2454. You do not find, do you, any positive admission of her virtue made directly in this correspondence by the officials concerned?—No.

2455. They assume her character as a prostitute; they find that she is not diseased; she is freed; she is never again molested; they are unable to deny her statement that she was a virgin?—They do not deny it.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

2456. But they do not any of them, apparently, think it incumbent upon them to make an admission which would have tended to restore her character in the public eyes?—They do not make such an admission.

2457. Now, with regard to Miss Webb, she seems to have had something to do with recommending the girl to a place; the girl goes to that place, and after staying two or three days there, according to Miss Webb, she is discharged by her mistress as being an improper character; you find that, do you not, in Miss Webb's statement?—Yes.

2458. Do you think it likely that a girl, who no one can deny was a virgin at the time she left the hospital, should have chosen the first two or three days of her stay in service to conduct herself as an improper character?—No, not in that sense.

2459. You think it incredible, do you not?—It seems very unlikely.

2460. Therefore, your interpretation would be, would it not, that she was dismissed by her mistress, as far as we can rely upon Miss Webb's statement, because of the fact that she had been in the hospital, and that her character had been damaged by having been compelled to go there?—So far as appears upon the face of this letter.

2461. There is no evidence of any impropriety of conduct upon her part?—Not in this letter.

2462. She is never afterwards molested, is she?—No.

2463. The whole case, as it is now before us, is, in your mind, a typical illustration, is it not, of the way in which officials may compel girls to go upon the register and to submit to examination, being themselves practically free from the possibility of resistance, or of any legal proceedings?—I think it is like other cases.

2464. Do not the officials under these Acts, who in this case are admitted to have behaved illegally, enjoy a remarkable immunity under Section 42 of the Act of 1866?—They do.

2465. These official documents in Paper No. 6, which are all dated in the year 1876, were never communicated, were they, by the authorities to Mr. Shaen, or to the association for the repeal of these Acts, who first drew their attention to the subject, in the correspondence in Paper No. 5?—I believe not, or I should have seen them earlier than yesterday.

2466. And they were not produced before the Committee until after your evidence was given?—No.

2467. Supposing that you could have seen these documents in Paper No. 6, you would have somewhat modified your leaflet, would you not?—I think I should; at all events I should have collated the two things.

2468. In some respects you would have modified it by strengthening it, would you not?—Yes, certainly.

2469. You would have shown that the action of the medical men and of the police have been admitted by the higher authorities in this case to have been illegal?—Yes.

N 2

2470. On

31 March 1882.]

Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

2470. On the other hand you would have made the admission that their conduct had been so judged, and that directions had been given to avoid a repetition of it?—Yes.

2471. But that course you could not take because this correspondence was not made public until after you gave your evidence here the other day?—Yes.

2472. I want to bring you to your statement that hundreds of terrified women have been coerced into signing the voluntary submission; I do not understand that you are prepared to withdraw that statement now?—No.

2473. The “terrified girls,” in your mind, would not, I take it, be the old habituées who have been up over and over again, but the girls who were new to a life of prostitution, and who, for the first time, were coerced into signing the voluntary submission and attending for examination?—Clearly.

2474. And you cite the case of Caroline Wybrow, with all the particulars which I have tried to bring into compass to-day, as a typical case of the kind of pressure and coercion that they bring to bear?—Yes.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

2475. You have stated it as a fact, in your leaflet (believing it to be true, I quite admit), that hundreds of terrified girls have been coerced or threatened into signing that submission; would you be so good as to mention one single case within your knowledge out of those hundreds?—My statement is founded on the evidence of Mr. E. K. Parsons, Commons Committee, 1866, Questions 399 and 400. There is also the case of Caroline Wybrow.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2476. I may take it that you admit that you cannot have, within your own personal knowledge, case by case, hundreds of girls who have been coerced into signing this submission?—No.

2477. I understand that your general statement to that effect is based upon evidence which has convinced your own mind?—Yes.

2478. I will ask you to refer to a case or two. Do you refer us to Answers 27 and 28 of Mr. Sloggett's evidence before the House of Commons Committee of 1869?—Yes.

2479. Do you refer also to the evidence of Mr. Williams before the Royal Commission, Questions 20,297 to 20,300?—Yes.

2480. Do you refer also to the Admiralty instructions, confirmed by the police instructions of 1881?—Yes.

2481. This is a document suspended in the Albert Hospital: “Contagious Diseases Act, 1866 to 1869. Periodical examinations of common women, paragraph 2. Should any woman object to sign, she is to be informed of the penal consequences attending such refusal,” and so on. Then, these are the police instructions, which were issued in the year 1881, paragraph 10: “It is desirable that all the common prostitutes should be brought under the Acts by voluntary submission; but if any refuse to submit voluntarily, the Commissioners' authority is to be applied for to bring them by summons before a magistrate, paragraph 19: The police employed under the Acts should explain to the prostitutes, as cases arise, the consequences of not submitting to the Acts, and thus endeavour to prevail upon them to submit voluntarily without proceedings being taken.” I understand your view to be this, that this so-called voluntary submission is not really voluntary in its character, because the police are instructed to point out the penal consequences of refusing voluntarily to submit?—Yes.

2482. And your belief is founded upon the evidence to which you have referred us now, which evidence justifies your expression of opinion that they have in many cases been terrified into that submission?—Yes, I think it does.

2483. Therefore, what I understand is that you are not prepared to withdraw, but that you abide by your statement in that leaflet?—By that statement, certainly.

2484. As a matter of inference it may be right or wrong; but to the best of your information and belief, that is true?—Yes, it was made bonâ fide.

2885. And you published it bonâ fide for the public benefit?—Yes.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

2486. You have your leaflet before you. That statement that hundreds of terrified girls have signed this submission is not an expression of opinion, but it is an assertion of a fact, is it not?—It is a statement of a fact, clearly.

2487. You have given us one case of a terrified girl who has been coerced, as you say, into signing this submission; that is Caroline Wybrow, but one is not a hundred; can you give me a single other case upon which that assertion of fact is founded?—On the spur of the moment I am not prepared to name another; I am not quite sure about the two that have been named.

2488. But two are not a hundred; you say that this assertion was made bonâ fide, and I am quite willing to accept your statement; but, after all that has passed, do you still adhere to that statement, as a statement of fact, that hundreds of terrified girls have been coerced into signing these submissions?—I do not believe that I am prohibited from stating that as a fact, after what I have read, especially in those passages that I have referred to, and others that might be referred to.

2489. But when I come to ask you to give me the data upon which that assertion of fact was founded, you can only give me one case?—I can give you no other at this moment than those to which I have made reference.

2490. Then you admit, in fact, that the only actual foundation that you have for that assertion is the case of Caroline Wybrow?—The only fact with which I am acquainted is the case of Caroline Wybrow.

2491. You have been referred by the right honourable gentleman, the Member for Halifax, to page three of Paper No. 6, where you will see Miss Webb's letter. In that letter Miss Webb, speaking of an interview which she had with Mrs. Wybrow said she (that is to say, Mrs. Wybrow) “agreed with me in hoping this would be a warning to her daughter as to what company she kept in future,

31 March 1882.]

Mr. WHEELER.

future," &c.; and certainly she did not say then she thought the girl had not fallen. Nor do I see how she could, as they live in a common lodging-house with the prostitutes, and she and the girl worked for them, and the girl has been their constant companion. "The mother" (that is Mrs. Wybrow) "I have seen bringing notes for the girls" (that is, of course, the prostitutes) "in the hospital within the last few months." Have you any reason to doubt that statement?—I cannot deny it.

2492. She speaks to another interview with Mrs. Adamson, during which interview the mother said to her daughter (that is, to Caroline Wybrow) words to the following effect: "I have often told you, Carrie, if you will make companions of those girls" (meaning, of course, the prostitutes) "you would get into trouble, as, of course, they would think you one of them." Have you any reason to doubt that statement?—I do not call it in question.

2493. Given the case of a girl associating with prostitutes and living in the same house with them, if that is not a sufficient, I will not say proof, but presumption that such a woman is a prostitute, I would ask what other presumption you would suggest?—I do not think it is, because that association is accounted for in another way. She and her mother lived in the upper part of the house, and since she took those lodgings prostitutes have come to live there. This young woman was happy to earn a few coppers at any time by the most menial occupation, when she might have got shillings or pounds in the place of pence by casting herself on the pavé, but she does not do that.

Mr. JOHN B. KINGSTON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2498. You reside, I believe, at Cork?—Yes.

2499. You are a native of Cork, are you not?—Yes.

2500. Do you practice any profession or business?—No.

2501. You are a man of independent means?—Yes.

2502. Have you been for 30 years past engaged in rescue work?—I have.

2503. You must have commenced that work at a very early age?—Almost as a lad.

2504. Have you been for more than 20 years, and are you still, the honorary secretary of the Cork Midnight Mission and Female Temporary Home?—Yes.

2505. Has your experience in this position afforded you ample opportunities of acquiring knowledge of the conditions of prostitution in Cork, both before and since the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—It has.

2506. We have had the evidence of the Rev. Mr. Reed, who was formerly the Roman Catholic chaplain of the Lock Hospital in Cork, whose experience was practically confined to the period of the Acts; as you have told us, your experience extends over the period before the Acts as well as since?—Yes.

2507. For how many years before the Acts were introduced were you engaged in this work?—About 18 years.

0.75.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

2494. Putting it you, as a reasonable man, the evidence here, so far as it goes, has carried it a good deal beyond that. The mother is stated to have said (and you say that you have no reason to doubt that she did say it), "If you will make companions of those girls" (that is to say, the prostitutes) "you will get into trouble, as of course they would think you one of them." From that statement Mrs. Wybrow evidently thought that there was sufficient evidence upon which her daughter might be fairly accused of being a prostitute?—It is likely to lead in that direction. I want to say one word as to that association.

2495. Assuming that a girl was in the habit of associating with prostitutes, would you not say that that was a ground upon which the metropolitan police might fairly assume that she was a prostitute?—I should say it was not, under the circumstances, which are these, that she was very glad to work in that menial occupation of scrubbing out the room occupied by those prostitutes below; and that would certainly, as a matter of business, bring them into association one with the other.

2496. Excuse me for reminding you that the evidence carries it a great deal further than that, and shows that she was in the habit of associating with and making companions of prostitutes?—I can see how that companionship arises. I have already pointed to that.

2497. Of course, you admit that the actual proof of improper intercourse would be nearly impossible?—It would be difficult.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

2508. And during all this period you have devoted yourself, above all other objects, as I gather, to the work of reclamation and of rescue, by personal intercourse with these women, and by attending midnight meetings, and so on?—Yes.

2509. During that time how many of those poor creatures could you say have been induced by your own personal exertions to give up their immoral habits and enter homes?—Close on 300.

2510. At the time when you first entered upon your work did there exist in Cork a Protestant refuge for fallen women?—There did.

2511. That was besides the Magdalen Asylum, the Roman Catholic Asylum?—Yes.

2512. With reference to that institution, most of the women whom you induced to give up prostitution probably entered that Protestant home?—Most of them, while some were sent to situations direct. I made it a point always to tell them that there were three openings for them in Cork, the workhouse, the Magdalen, and the Refuge.

2513-14. What was your system in this refuge originally; how long did you retain the inmates?—Three years.

2515. Did you maintain that period of three years?—No, I always opposed it.

2516. To what did you reduce it?—To two years, and even less.

2517. During which time, I may assume that you

31 March 1882.]

MR. KINGSTON.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

you trained them for some kind of honest work?—Principally laundry-work and kitchen-work.

2518. You did not find that religious differences interfered injuriously with your charitable endeavours?—No; they saw that I had no object in it but their welfare.

2520. Am I right then in inferring that you feel that nothing but positive knowledge in each case would justify you in asserting the reclamation of a girl who had once fallen into this life?—Nothing but positive knowledge.

2521. It would not suffice to your mind to say, "Well, she has gone away, and we have heard no evil of her"?—Unless I knew of her doing well, I should fear a relapse. If I went on that, I could produce a pile of letters to that effect, but I would not do it: letters from those who were doing well, and had gone back.

2522. You have given us some reason to suppose that you have a special knowledge of and familiarity with the subject; are you at all prepared to admit that the Acts have produced moral improvement in the class of women who are subjected to them?—I cannot see any; I do not know of any.

2523. In the Lock Hospital the women come under the ministrations of the chaplain, do they not?—They do.

2524. You would admit that those ministrations were likely to exercise a good influence as far as they went?—They ought to do so.

2525. I understand that from your general observation you see no signs of moral improvement in Cork on the part of those women as a consequence of the Acts themselves?—Not in the slightest.

2526. Have you seen any reason to believe that since the operation of these Acts, those women, far from having been improved by the moral and religious influences brought to bear upon them in the Lock Hospital, have become more difficult than before to reach by any moral and religious influences?—Before the breaking up of the houses a large class existed there, and they were altogether altered from what they were previously, and became quite careless and more hardened.

2527. What do you mean by the breaking up of the houses?—Houses that were broken up by the action of some of the Roman Catholic clergy.

2528. We have had it in evidence before us that many of those houses were stopped and broken up by the persuasive action of the Roman Catholic clergy; but do you say that the women remained?—No; the women were transferred to the Magdalen Asylum and other places.

2529. The Committee is aware, from the evidence of Mr. Reed, that a great effort was made with marked success by the Roman Catholic clergy in the year 1876; but, putting that aside for a moment, that was the consequence of the efforts of the clergy themselves, and not the consequence of the Acts?—No, it had nothing to do with it.

2530. From your experience, do you find that women who have been subjected to the procedure of the Acts, to the compulsory periodical examination, to passing through the hospital, and so on, are more or less impressionable, morally and religiously, than they were before?—They are much more difficult to reach and much less impressionable now than they were before.

2531. In that respect you confirm the evidence already given to this Committee on the part of several persons practically interested in rescue work?—If I might quote an expression that I got from the lips of a few prostitutes within the past month, one of them said to me that they had a great fight to get her on the table, and now that they had succeeded in that she did not care what end became of her. Another said, not three weeks ago, that she was taken over to the hospital at nine o'clock at night, and made to go over there; and that she had to sign her name, and then, after some days, undergo an examination; and now she said she had just as soon she was dead, because it was the most disgusting thing she ever knew.

Dr Farquharson.

2532. Did she mean going to the hospital?—Attending the hospital and going under examination. Another, whom I knew to be a servant out of place, I picked up in a casual way, and walked a long way with her, and said to her that if she continued she would come under the operation of the Acts now in force in Cork, and that she might find it not to be so agreeable; and I told her then a little of the outline of the operation. "Oh! sir," she said, "if that occurred to me I would drown myself." I said, "that is what is before you, if you persist in your evil ways." I believe I was enabled to send her to a situation a few days afterwards.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2533. You say that, according to your observation, since the Contagious Diseases Acts have been in operation at Cork, these women have become more hardened and less amenable to moral and religious influences?—That is so.

2534. You have been in the habit of advising them for many years; do you find yourself, personally, a marked difference in the way in which they receive your friendly ministrations?—A marked difference; so much as to say, that they were now the Queen's women, and that they did not want me.

2535. Do you mean that those expressions have been frequently used by those women to you?—Word for word.

2536. That they are now the Queen's women?—And that the Queen looks after them.

2537. And that they did not want you?—Precisely.

2538. Did the number of women in your Protestant Home increase or fall off after the inauguration of the Acts in Cork?—They fell off from about 34 down to about six or seven.

2539. I understand you to say that in your experience the influence of the administration of the Acts has been to harden the women and render render them more difficult to reclaim?—Yes, that is so.

2540. Have you also found that the proportion of those who were permanently reclaimed has been seriously diminished since the Acts came into operation?—Yes, that is so.

2541. And you know of no other conditions or causes existing in the city of Cork to account for the reduction of the number of inmates, and the reduction of the proportion of reclamations, than the introduction and working of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I know of no other cause.

2542. I presume that in Cork you have the two classes, the registered class and the clandestine class of prostitutes?—Yes, that is so.

2543. Since the Acts, more especially of late years, has the number of registered prostitutes increased or decreased?—I do not know about that, because it is an official thing.

2544. With regard to clandestine prostitution, occasional prostitution, prostitution of women who are not registered, has that, in your opinion, considerably increased since the application of the Acts?—I am prepared to state that it has increased ten to one.

2545. But as regards the registered women, have you no means of judging whether their number has diminished or not?—The number was diminished in 1876 very considerably by the closing of the houses.

2546. I understood you to attribute that diminution to the action of the Roman Catholic clergy?—Yes.

2547. As a matter of fact, those numbers have diminished; but at the same time you express the opinion now that the number of clandestine or occasional prostitutes has enormously increased in Cork?—I state that.

2548. On what do you base that opinion?—On going out by night and meeting them, and conversing with them.

2549. In fact, you base it upon the experience founded upon the devotion of your life to this subject?—Just so.

2550. And I understand, as a matter of opinion, you attribute the increase of clandestine prostitution since the Acts to the operation of the Acts?—I think that is so.

2551. I want to know from you in what way you think the Contagious Diseases Acts have so largely increased the amount of clandestine prostitution in Cork; first of all, do you think that they have stimulated the demand for prostitution?—That is a part of my statement.

2552. You admit that, whether it has been caused by the Acts or by the benevolent action of the Roman Catholic clergy, there is a reduction in the number of regular prostitutes?—Yes, a large reduction.

2553. And, therefore, I presume you would be disposed to infer, or to accept the suggestion, that the number of clandestine prostitutes had proportionately increased?—Yes, I know that to be the fact.

2554. When you say that you know it, am I right in interpreting you as meaning that that inference has been confirmed by your personal observation?—Yes, and by the report of the local police.

2555. The local police of Cork?—Yes.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

2556. Do you mean reports personally made to yourself?—Yes, to myself.

2557. And you gather from them that, in their experience and opinion, clandestine prostitution has largely increased?—Yes.

2558. I suppose that in the course of time the clandestine prostitutes would learn the best way of evading the Acts; have you found that that has been studied to some effect in Cork?—I have reason to think so. They are engaged during the day in shops and such places, and an idea has got amongst them lately that, if they are not seen in the company of registered women, the police cannot touch them.

2559. They keep away from the society of the registered women?—Yes; and some that are on the streets told me very recently that if they were not found with the other women who were registered, they themselves could not be touched.

2560. Have you ever heard the great increase of clandestine prostitution to which you have referred admitted by any member of the Contagious Diseases Acts police?—It is the common talk of Cork at the present moment.

2561. But I ask you about the Contagious Diseases Acts police?—They admit it.

2562. Has any one member of that force ever made that admission to you?—I asked some of them if they did not know it, and they answered yes.

2563. You have put these questions to members of the Contagious Diseases Acts police force, and they have admitted an increase of clandestine prostitution?—Yes.

2564. Then I understand that on the whole the result of your observation, having dedicated your life to this subject, is that the moral condition of Cork is far worse than it was when you began?—It is infinitely worse.

Chairman.

2565. Did you say that the statement of the Contagious Diseases Acts police was, that there was an increase of clandestine prostitution, or that that increase of clandestine prostitution was due to the Contagious Diseases Acts?—That there was an increase of clandestine prostitution; they admit the fact.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2566. As to the condition of the streets of the city, are there more or less open scenes of indecency and vice now than used to be exhibited there?—In one way there is a great deal more, because they have not so many brothels now, and they take every opportunity of going into the streets and roads outside the city to practice prostitution.

2567. But if you take now the aspect of the city, as it would present itself to the eye of a stranger in the ordinary streets of Cork, is there more or less order and decency than there used to be in your earlier days?—There is more order.

2568. To what do you attribute that improved order in the streets?—To two things, the breaking up of the houses in 1876, and a large increase in the force of police at present in Cork, so that the patrols can, therefore, be more regular.

2569. Then you would say that vice is now pursued more secretly; for instance, the prostitution of clandestine prostitutes must be pursued more secretly?—And so it is.

2570. Taking not the heart of the city, but the outskirts

Mr. KINGSTON.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

outskirts of the city which are not so much under the eye of the police, to a careful observer like yourself is there more or less vice apparent than there used to be?—I have shuddered at seeing the enormous increase of vice.

2571. I understand from you that, if you take the less frequented parts in the outskirts of the city, there is more out-door vice, to put it shortly, evident to a close observer like yourself, than there was in former years?—Very much more.

2572. Are charges of an indecent exposure on the part of either male or female offenders more frequent than they used to be?—They are constant at the police court in Cork.

2573. Have you seen Father Hegarty's testimony, which was adverted to by the Rev. Henry Reed?—I have.

2574. Do you confirm that?—Yes, I have seen the same thing myself.

2575. Father Hegarty is stated, in answer to Question 6367, to have said that for four years they had not witnessed anything like the prostitution that was going on in the city at night, and further evidence of that description. We have heard from time to time of the deterrent effect of the Acts; what, in your opinion, is their deterrent effect?—The women who are under their operation hate them.

2577. But they do not, as I understand, in your opinion, deter them from a life of prostitution?—No, not in the least.

2578. Because you have said already that the total number of prostitutes in Cork has very largely increased?—Yes, I say that.

2579. Taking these clandestine prostitutes of whom you speak, what can you say about their ages; do they consist in any considerable proportion of very young girls?—We get them from 55 down to 11 or 12.

2580. Are you able to say from your own observation whether the number of juvenile clandestine prostitutes, say between 13 and 16 years of age, has increased or diminished?—I have seen them myself as young as 12 or 13, mere children, on the streets, and I have been solicited by them.

2581. During the last 10 years can you express a confident opinion as to whether the number of those very juvenile prostitutes has increased or diminished in Cork?—I can say that they have increased.

2582. All the recognised brothels were closed in 1876, were they not?—They were.

2583. But you are not prepared, are you, quite to admit that there are no brothels in Cork now?—I know four or five of them at present.

2584. Four or five regular brothels?—Yes.

2585. I suppose, besides those regular brothels, there are lodging-houses, are there not, where prostitution is practised?—Lodging-houses are largely used for that purpose.

2586. To refer for a moment to the local police, have they been vigilant or other than vigilant of late years in endeavouring to put a stop to the assembling of prostitutes in public-houses and beer-houses?—They have been rather vigilant.

2587. And with some effect?—With very considerable effect.

2588. They have prosecuted; for what offences?—For allowing women to assemble in houses.

2589. Have they prosecuted the public-house or beer-house keepers for allowing women to assemble for purposes of prostitution?—Yes.

2590. And have some licences been forfeited in consequence?—Several of them have.

2591. Have the Contagious Diseases Acts police had anything to do with those proceedings?—Nothing whatever.

2592. Can you tell us, from your own experience, your opinion of the effect of the existence and operation of the Acts in Cork upon the mind and the manners of the youth of the male sex?—They think that they can practise wickedness now with impunity. I might say that I know, in four cases, of mere young lads who were very steady nice boys some time ago, and now they are under treatment for evil disease.

2593. Do you feel able to say, from your own observation; that the number of very young men giving way to vice has increased, and is increasing in Cork?—Yes; if you put them down under 16 they would be young.

2594. Is it your belief that in former days, before these Acts existed, the fear of the consequences of vice operated beneficially, at any rate to postpone the period of its indulgence on the part of boys?—I have reason to think that.

2595. And you are of opinion, are you not, that even if it be a mere postponement, it is of very great moral and hygienic value?—Certainly.

2596. Can you tell us anything about the abuses in the administration of the Acts?—A case occurred on the South Mall in Cork a few weeks ago. I just came up when it was almost ended. One of the Contagious Diseases Acts police wanted to drag a young woman to the hospital about nine o'clock at night, and I asked one of the local police who was standing near what it was all about, and he told me that one of the men wanted to drag a young woman to the hospital, and he thought she was a proper young woman. She would not go, and he had to relinquish his grasp of her, fearing a row.

2597. At any rate, that was a case in which the woman was not already registered?—No.

2598. That was admitted, was it not?—Yes.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

2599. Did you see this yourself with your own eyes?—I came on the spot just as the scene was about breaking up; it had taken place five or six minutes before, and if I had been there five or six minutes sooner I might have seen the whole thing.

2600. What

31 March 1882.]

Mr. KINGSTON.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2600. What did you see?—I saw the remains of the crowd, and I knew that something had, as we say, been up, and I asked one of the local police who was on patrol there what was the matter, and he told me that one of the hospital police wanted to take a young woman to the hospital, and that she would not go, and he had to relinquish his hold on her. The young woman was pointed out to me.

2601. Did you speak to her?—I tried to get an opportunity, but she turned a street, and I lost sight of her at the moment.

Chairman.

2602. Did you see the man with his grasp on the girl?—No, I did not, because he had relinquished his hold just before I came.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2603. You came up after it was all over, and that is what you heard from one of the local police?—Yes.

2604. You have been in the habit of talking with these women, and endeavouring to reclaim them, and you have familiarised yourself with the circumstances of their life; do you know from the statements that these women themselves have made to you, that many of them have become impressed with the belief, that if required by the police they must go to the hospital, or go to prison in default?—They have told me so repeatedly.

2605. As to the Lock Hospital accommodation in Cork, before the Acts what accommodation was there?—The workhouse and a large ward at the North Infirmary.

2606. Was that specially set apart for venereal patients?—Specially.

2607. Was that ward shut up when the Lock Hospital under the Acts was opened?—It was.

2608. What is that Lock Hospital called in popular phraseology?—The Queen's Hospital. I have got a letter from it, myself, dated the Queen's Hospital.

2609. Are there any published records in Cork of the per-centages of disease amongst the women?—I dare say there might be, but I am not aware of them.

2610. Have you any opportunity of coming to any opinion upon that subject from statements made to you by the women themselves?—Some of them have told me that disease has been largely increased since the Acts were introduced.

2611. Have any of them told you the contrary?—No, not one.

2612. With regard to public opinion in Cork upon the subject, there have been petitions, have there not, presented to Parliament for the repeal of the Acts?—There have.

2613. Is there a local association for the repeal of the Acts in Cork?—There is.

2614. Are there several magistrates on the committee of that association?—There are.

2615. Have there been largely attended meetings held in Cork at which resolutions in favour of repeal have been carried?—Yes.

2616. Have you ever known a meeting in favour of the Acts?—No, never.

0.75.

Dr. Farquharson.

2617. With regard to the woman who stated that there was a great fight to get her on the table, did she imply by that that she was examined forcibly against her will?—Yes, she did. Her words to me were, "They had a great fight to get me on the table, and now that they have succeeded in that, I don't care what end becomes of me."

2618. Did you make any inquiry of the medical men as to the correctness of this allegation?—No, I did not.

2619. So that it is only the unsupported testimony of the woman?—Of the young woman herself.

2620. A woman said to you that it was the most disgusting thing she ever knew going to the hospital; what did she mean by that?—She referred to the examination.

2621. Not to the subsequent treatment in the hospital?—No, but to the examination; and she said it was queer work for any decent man to engage in.

2622. As to the deterrent effect of the Acts, you have, at all events, told us of one case in which you persuaded a young woman to give up her evil courses by telling her what she would have to go through in the way of the examination; at all events, the deterrent effect was produced in one case?—Her reply to me was, that if that occurred to her she would drown herself.

2623. Then you described the operation?—I did not describe it; I went into no particulars, but only generals.

2624. You have not seen the operation performed, I suppose?—I have not seen the operation performed.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

2625. You said that the clandestine prostitutes had increased 10 to 1; that was, I think, your expression?—Yes, I used that expression.

2626. That is a very strong statement, is it not?—Yes, it is.

2627. Might not that be due to a certain extent to the closing of brothels, as well as to the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Possibly it might.

2628. Do you not think, from this conversation that you had with this servant girl, that the Acts must upon her mind at any rate have had a deterrent effect, judging from the answer that she gave you?—I just repeat her answer.

2629. One word about public opinion in the City of Cork; I suppose that in Cork, as in other places, where the Acts are in operation, public opinion is divided upon the subject?—Possibly.

2630. Do you know the Rev. Dr. Webster?—Yes.

2631. Is it not true that he has publicly expressed his opinion strongly in favour of the Acts?—It is possible that he may have done so; but I do not remember it at the moment as a fact. Dr. Webster is the chaplain of the hospital.

2632. There have been petitions presented from Cork in favour of the repeal of the Acts, have there not?—Either two or three.

2633. Can you tell me how many magistrates signed

31 March 1882.]

Mr. KINGSTON.

signed those petitions?—No; I am not in a position to say.

2634. Nor could you tell me how many magistrates there are in Cork, I suppose?—No; I could count up a good many of them.

2635. How many clergymen of all denominations, Protestant, Catholic, and Dissenting, signed those petitions?—Every Protestant dissenting minister in Cork at the time signed it.

2636. How many clergymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church signed it?—I am not sure that many signed it.

2637. Can you give me an idea how many?—I cannot; but the number would be small.

2638. In proportion to the number of clergymen?—I know that every one of the others signed it.

2639. What proportion of the Roman Catholic priests signed it?—Of that I am not aware.

2640. Of course you have a corporation in Cork?—Yes.

2641. Can you tell me what proportion of the town council signed the petitions?—I fancy there were a good many of them, but I am not prepared to state the proportion. I know individual cases.

2642. You have spoken very decidedly upon certain points; do you rest your opinion as to the increase of clandestine prostitution upon what you have heard from others, or upon what you have seen yourself?—Upon both.

2643. With regard to the case of that girl whom, as you were informed by the local police, the Contagious Diseases Acts police were trying to take against her will to a hospital, did you follow up that case at all?—I tried to get hold of her at the time, and I failed.

2644. Did you follow up the case and try to ascertain what had become of her?—No, it ended there.

2645. What you have stated to us is, in fact, all that you can state with regard to that particular case?—Yes.

2646. Is that the only instance that you can point to as involving any abuse, or supposed abuse, of the Acts in Cork?—The men that are carrying them out there have for a long time been acquainted with the city, and they are not liable to fall into mistakes so much as in other places.

2647. Should you say that the administration of the Acts is, on the whole, judicious?—They try to do their best.

2648. And, as a general rule, they avoid making mistakes as far as they can?—I would give them credit for that, only that very frequently (I was going to say nearly every day) they are obliged to bring young women to the police-court who refuse to go to the examination.

2649. The only instance that you can point to of any possible or surmised abuse of the Acts is this case to which you speak?—That is the one that I saw, as far as I did see it, with my own eyes.

Chairman.

2650. Have you seen the petition presented from Cork?—Yes.

2651. Can you say whether there are half-a-dozen Roman Catholic priests' names attached to it?—I cannot say.

Chairman—continued.

2652. Have you any impression as to whether the number of Roman Catholic priests' names attached to it was great or small?—I am not at all aware.

2653. Have you any impression, one way or the other, about it?—No, it never occurred to me.

2654. You spoke of a letter addressed to you from the hospital as from the Queen's Hospital; was that a letter from one of the officials there, or from one of the women there?—From one of the women.

2655. You spoke of there being at present five brothels in Cork; do you know the number of brothels that the priests put down in 1876?—They put them all down.

2656. It was more than five?—It was 40; there were some neighbourhoods that were altogether given up to that kind of work.

2657. Can you point at all to any particular year in which the increase of open air prostitution began in Cork on a large scale?—The regular women, to my knowledge, were like detective policemen, and if they knew of others going in a sly way, they themselves came down heavily on them. I have seen them tear their clothes and tear their bonnets.

2659. And do you consider that this open air prostitution in the suburbs and quiet streets and lanes is one of the great causes of public scandal in Cork now?—It is a public scandal.

2660. Do you think that the growth of clandestine prostitution is at all contemporaneous with the suppression of the brothels?—In a great measure it is.

2661. You spoke of a falling off in the number of inmates in the Protestant Home; when did that occur?—Shortly after the introduction of the Acts.

2662. Do you attribute that to the introduction of the Acts?—I knew of no other cause, and I do not know any other cause.

2663. Was there a contemporaneous increase in the number of inmates at the Roman Catholic Asylum?—After they built their new refuge.

2664. When did they build their new refuge?—About the time of the introduction of the Acts.

2665. It was about the time of the introduction of the Acts that the Roman Catholics built their new refuge?—Yes, as far as I can remember.

2666. And it was about that time that the falling off in the number of inmates of the Protestant refuge commenced?—Very shortly after that. The inmates of the Protestant refuge were quiet and contented while they were in the refuge.

2667. You say that the character of the girls who came to the Protestant refuge was more hardened after the Acts than before?—Much more hardened.

31 March 1882.

The Rev. FLAVEL COOK, D.D., called in; and Examined.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

2668. I BELIEVE you are the Chaplain of the London Lock Hospital?—Yes.

2669. How long have you acted as such?—Since September 1876.

2670. Has your attention been called to the evidence given by the Rev. Mr. Baker before this Committee?—I had a very little time this morning to look over the evidence tendered by Mr. Baker, and I gathered a general impression of the nature of his evidence.

2671. Will you allow me to refer you to what he says. He puts in a draft report, and at Question 2109 he is asked, "From whom did you obtain this draft report?" and he said, "I obtained it from a person whom I presume to have been the secretary. The chaplain, the Rev. Flavel Cook, asked the secretary to supply me with it." I presume that is you?—That is correct.

2672. Then this is put to him: "I observe, on that paper, that besides the printed matter, there are some figures filled up in pen and ink; who filled up those figures? (A.) Those were filled up by the secretary." Perhaps you can hardly speak to that, because he is asked, "In your presence and that of Canon Cook?" to which he replies, "In my presence, but not in Canon Cook's presence." I suppose you were not present when they were filled up?—I may state that it is a mistake to call me Canon Cook; Canon Cook is another person. I had very little time to give to Mr. Baker; I had an engagement, and I took him into the office and asked if a return could be furnished him printed in part and filled up in pen-and-ink. One of the staff, the assistant secretary, said that that return was not yet printed, but he volunteered to make a copy for Mr. Baker's use. I then departed to my engagement, leaving Mr. Baker in the office to receive this promised copy of the official return prepared, but not yet published.

2673. You have seen the return?—I have a facsimile of the paper, which was furnished to Mr. Baker.

2674. Have you got it now before you?—I have.

2675. Have you any observation to make upon it?—I think I can make a point clear which is not clear at it there stands. I have another paper here in substance the same, but more carefully drawn up and annotated, by which I think this correction may be made. You find under the second printed line, "Hospital patients, since admitted, Government, 485." That requires a note of explanation. It is very likely that Mr. Baker, or any other person reading that, would suppose that 485 meant 485 separate persons; but for the actual number of persons, that is to say, individual women, we must read 224, because every patient admitted again and again in the course of a year becomes a separate case.

2676. So that, in fact, the statement or surmise of Mr. Baker to the contrary of what you now state is incorrect?—It is a natural error.

2677. At Question 2168 I asked Mr. Baker this: "I gather that these numbers are not the 0.75.

number of individual women, but the number of cases that came to the hospital; that is to say, that out of these 485 cases, the same women may have come three or four times; that is so, is it not?" to which he replied, "No, I should not say so?"—He had not sufficient information, I presume.

2678. You disagree with Mr. Baker, and correct his statement in that respect?—I correct or rather complete the statement with which Mr. Baker was furnished.

2679. Then those 485 cases only represent 224 women?—Yes, that is so.

2680. If that was Mr. Baker's opinion it was a mistake, was it not?—Yes.

2681. As a matter of fact, I understand you now to say that, instead of there being 485 (if you like to call them so) "Government" women admitted in the course of the year, there were only 224?—That is so for that year. Then there is another annotation with regard to the 224; of this number for that year 121 only were admitted for the first time, and those only can be fairly compared with the voluntary patients who, by the rules of the hospital, are only received once; we do not knowingly receive a voluntary patient a second time, but we are bound by our agreement with the Government to receive patients as often as the Government send them to us.

2682. I will put to you the same question which I put to Mr. Baker; does it strike you that it is a fair thing to make a comparison in regard to their chances of reclamation between the women who go voluntarily to the hospital and women who are compelled to go?—There is a manifest difference. I should explain that in using the phrase "Government patients" it is merely for convenience; it carries no construction whatever; it is simply that on my official chaplains' books we have printed on the outside of the one "ordinary patients" and on the other we have printed "Government patients."

2683. I suppose that they are paid for by the Government?—That is so, and to call them Government patients saves a long statement, such as, "Patients admitted under the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts." Of course we must have some shorter mode of designating them than that, but we impute nothing whatever.

2684. What distinction is there between the two classes?—The distinction is this, and I think it is obvious to almost any one at first sight, that the Government patients are horribly alike at one dull, dead level; the ordinary patients are very mixed, some of more and some of less education, some of more and some of less refinement of appearance, but the Government patients are brutalised beyond description in appearance and in manner. As I speak to them it is painful.

2685. They are all professional prostitutes, in fact?—I take it that they can only be mildly designated in that way. They are wilful and persistent transgressors.

2686. With regard to the voluntary patients, they are people of all classes, are they not?—Within certain limits they are of all classes. I presume that they have all very little money, or they would not have come there; but we find occasionally some who have had a very fair education.
O 2 presume

2687. But are there not some married women who have been diseased by their husbands?—Yes, a considerable number. Out of 502 voluntary patients in that year we had 24 married women living with their husbands.

2688. And they, of course, had contracted disease in an innocent way?—Yes.

2689. And I suppose there are other girls who may have fallen who have been, comparatively speaking, at any rate, respectable?—Yes; they shade off from persistent prostitutes to those who have, at all events, if I may credit their statement, sinned only once.

2690. May I put it that these voluntary patients would present a far more promising field for the efforts of the chaplain than women who have practised prostitution professionally?—They do.

2691. And, therefore, you would naturally expect that the ratio of reclaimed women in that class should be much greater than it would be amongst the "Government" women?—I should.

2692. As a matter of fact, your efforts amongst the "Government" women seem to have been somewhat successful; you have reclaimed, I think, 24 out of 121; is not that so?—One must use the word "reclaimed," I think, in a rather large sense. There were sent to service two, restored to friends four, sent to other homes 14, and sent to unions three.

2693. That would come to pretty nearly what I said; so that, as a matter of fact, you find that those 24 must be set off, not against the 537 women, whom I supposed, till I was corrected, had been admitted to the hospital, but against the much smaller number which you have just stated?—I think that the number should be reduced first by the correction that I gave in the first instance, reducing cases to patients. The patients should, I think, in strict parity of reasoning, be reduced to those who have been admitted for the first time, because they correspond with ordinary patients who are only admitted once.

2694. Do you agree with Mr. Baker as to the extreme difficulty of reclaiming women who have been admitted under the Contagious Diseases Acts into your hospital?—They are as a class much harder to deal with, and much less open to any remonstrance, or entreaty, or persuasion, or to any spiritual or moral agency that I have ever been able to bring to bear upon them; but if I may put it in my own way, I should say, I think, that supposing that these Contagious Diseases Acts were abolished to-morrow, they would be just the same.

2695. Then, you do not attribute this hardened condition to the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts or to the examinations which are authorised by them?—I have no facts or impressions to warrant me in saying so; but, in fairness to them and to myself, I may say that, as my official position does not require me to have an opinion upon this matter, I have never instituted any inquiries of the inmates as to their experience or as to their opinions of the Acts.

2696. But, coming to a matter which of course must be within your own personal knowledge, you know, at any rate, of some, I hope I may say of many, women who have been admitted under the Contagious Diseases Acts who, thanks to your ministrations, and to the influences brought to bear upon them in the hospital, have turned out well?—I have hope of them, that is all I can say; I have, for instance, in my little private memoranda, some small account of the 14 who were sent to the asylum. My assistant takes chiefly the medical side; I take chiefly the reformatory side, and I am careful to see every woman who comes into the asylum as soon as possible after her admission, and, as near as may be, to the time of her departure to service, or wherever it may be, and I gather from them occasional encouragement. I have one case for instance, the only one, I think, which is very marked as a hopeful case; she expressed herself as having received great good.

2697. Then, as a matter of fact, you do know that some, at any rate, of these women have been reclaimed, or at any rate you have hopes that they are reclaimed?—I hope so, but in many cases I gather so little from them.

2698. Do you follow their careers after they have left you?—It will take me a sentence or two to explain that. We have, in connection with our general work, what is called a servant's home, which has its own matron, and it is the duty of that matron to keep every woman in sight as well as she can after she has passed out of the asylum and gone into service. If a woman is within visiting distance the matron visits her, and if she is beyond that she writes to her, so that they gradually recede from our observation and shade away from us; but we have good accounts from some and disappointments as to others.

2699. Do you not, in your reports or in the records which are kept at the asylum, distinguish between those who are acknowledged prostitutes and those who are not?—Every woman coming in Government or ordinary, has the offer of a home with us. When they come into that home they are all merged in one body.

2700. It appears from that report that the total number of voluntary patients admitted last year was 502?—Five hundred and fourteen was the gross, and 502 was the net, if I may so speak, because there were a few cases which came back a second time; for instance, if the disease broke out again upon them, they would come back. One came back in one way and another in another. They were still attached to us in a measure; they had gone into an affiliated home, perhaps, but 502 is the net figure.

2701. Is it not the fact that out of those only 270 acknowledged themselves to be prostitutes?—Two hundred and seventy acknowledged that they were prostitutes.

2702. The other 232, whether they were women who had contracted disease through vicious courses or not, at any rate did not admit that they were living a life of prostitution; is that so?—Just so. I can give a little analysis of them; for instance, 16 of them were living with men (that is hardly distinguishable, of course, from prostitution), and there were 10 as to whom it was not ascertained.

2703. Have you a return showing the number of patients admitted into the Lock Hospital during

Rev. F. COOK, D.D.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

during the last six years, as compared with the number admitted into the asylum during the same period from the voluntary wards?—I can go back to 1876.

2704. Can you hand that return in?—Yes. (The same was delivered in.) 2705. Your hospital is of course supported to a great extent by voluntary contributions, with the exception of the payments which you get from the Government for the admission of women sent there under the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Yes.

2706. I am afraid you find that the subscriptions to your hospital suffer rather from the opposition felt by some of the subscribers to the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I have no knowledge; it is only a matter of opinion whether that is so or not.

2707. It is probable that that is so, is it not?—It is probable. My own private opinion is that it is so, but I could not prove it.

2708. Have you formed any opinion as to the operation, beneficial or otherwise, of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I would say that my position is one of reserve and observation. I have heard very strong opinions, as we all have, expressed pro and con, but I have not gathered during my term of office as chaplain anything to decide my opinion strongly one way or the other, except that I personally and privately, as I suppose we all do, dislike the idea.

2709. I am not speaking now of the class of women who come in voluntarily, who are, of course, a better class of women; but should you say that if these Acts were repealed, and the worst class of prostitutes were not compelled, when diseased, to go into hospital, they would voluntarily do so?—I do not think they would.

2710. Of course there you speak from your own very valuable experience?—Yes; but it is only an opinion.

2711. But it is an opinion founded upon experience?—Yes.

2712. Should you say that, if once they had come in, they would be apt to leave and return to their former courses before they were cured?—They show a desire to get away as soon as they can before they have received their medical discharge.

2713. Arguing from that fact, should you say, that if they could not be compulsorily detained in hospital while diseased, they would be likely to leave before the disease was cured?—I think that that is almost, if not quite, a certainty.

2714. Of course, I am now speaking not of your voluntary patients who show their willingness to be cured by coming in voluntarily, but of the very different class of women with whom you have to deal under the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Quite so.

2715. The corollary of that would be, that there are a large number of prostitutes who, by means of these Acts, are brought into the Lock Hospitals, and subjected to the excellent moral and religious influences which are brought to bear upon them there, who but for the Acts would never have had the benefit of those influences?—That is a fair inference.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

2717. Have you read the opinion of the committee of Convocation on this subject?—No, I cannot say that I have; I have had communications from Convocation asking for opinions, or information, or suggestions, but I have avoided giving any strong opinions.

Dr. Cameron.

2718. When you were talking of the reclamations, you gave an analysis of them, and you mentioned 14 out of 24 at having gone somewhere; where did you say they went?—To the asylum; that is to say, what they call the home, in other words, the reformatory part of our institution.

2719. Do you consider these as permanent reclamations?—I could not say that; I could only, at the best, say that we hope as regards some of them.

2720. You spoke of three as having gone to other houses, I think; I suppose they may be regarded as reclaimed?—We do not know; we have no knowledge of them after that.

2721. But, as I gather from you, there is only that one case that you refer to as being a very hopeful case of reclamation; am I right?—One, I said, was a marked case. The note that I have regarding that case is, "Saw her again on February 3rd, 1882. Speaks of herself as having 'found peace' here, and as especially helped and 'touched by my lessons.'" I put it down when I have their own words.

2722. Did you ever follow up that woman, and find out what became of her afterwards?—No; in the ordinary course of things, a woman goes to service, and then the matron of the Servants' Home has to look after her as well as she can.

2723. And that, you say, was the most hopeful case?—I think so. If the Committee wish it, I can read such little notes as I have regarding all these 14 cases.

2724. It is perhaps hardly necessary to go through them; but what I wished was, to gather your own opinion about the hopefulness of the work?—There is a measure of hope for every one who comes into the asylum, for their coming there is of itself a profession of desire to amend. Here is another instance: "Saw her again on December 2nd, 1881; still reserved, says she has prayed, and is sorry." Beyond those few words, or such words as those in numberless cases, I have nothing to go upon.

2725. Do you ever contract such an interest in a case as to induce you to inquire as to what becomes of the woman?—So soon as they go out to service, they are followed by the matron of the Servants' Home; my visits there may sometimes post me up as regards a case.

2726. Have you never contracted such an interest in a case which appeared to have benefited by your ministrations as to induce you to make special inquiries about it?—From time to time I have asked about this one or that one, and sometimes the news has been good, and sometimes it has been a disappointment.

O 3

2728. What

31 March 1882.]

Rev. E. COOK, D.D.

Dr. Cameron—continued.

2726. What is your experience as regards the voluntary patients as contrasted with the others?—The difference is not so much in nature as in quality, I think; we have a larger number of them. At the end of the report you will see this: "Government patients now remaining in the Asylum 9, ordinary patients in the Asylum 74." That is an unusually large disproportion.

2729. You mentioned, I think, that they are not such hardened cases?—As a class they are not.

2730. Therefore, I presume that the results which you would obtain through your ministrations to them would be better and more hopeful?—Yes, making due allowances. When they come into the asylum I no longer think of them as being from this ward or from that; they are all treated alike.

2731. It must be a matter of very considerable delicacy for the matron to keep up her inquiries after they have left?—It is difficult.

2732. Do their employers know the class from which they come?—They always know.

2733. After the first placement of them?—That I cannot say; but when they are first placed out by us, the family or lady receiving the inmate is made aware, and cannot, in fact, well be ignorant of it.

2734. Does that act as a great barrier in the way of their getting employment?—No; it is rather remarkable that we have no difficulty in getting them out. We try to get them the safest places we can in quiet families, and we have no difficulty in getting places for them.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2735. Did I correctly understand you to say that, on the voluntary side, for non-Government women, the ordinary patients, you never admit a woman more than once?—Not knowingly, except under such circumstances, as I thought I made clear, where the patient may have gone to another home connected with the main institution. She there may break down again in health and be sent back again to us for a time, or she may have gone out in some other way not to such an affiliated home, and may have a recurrence of her disease, and so come back to us. But the cases are few, represented by about 12 or 14, I think, the difference between 502 and 514. There were 12 re-admissions, but only under special circumstances.

2736. May I ask you whether it is within your power to inform the Committee of the ground upon which this rule is laid down of not admitting a woman for the second time on the voluntary side?—It is an old rule, and my impression (but it is only an impression) is, that it was thought a Christian duty to give every woman the offer once. If she come back again, unless the medical evidence be to the effect that it is simply an inevitable recurrence of the disease for which she was first admitted, if she give us reason to think that she has returned to her evil ways, we do not then receive her. We think it is a duty to give them an opportunity once, but we are not obliged to do more.

2737. It is no part of the view of your governing body that it would be wrong to offer such medical care and treatment, not to mention your own ministrations, to a woman who had continued her career?—I should be afraid to speak for the governing body; I might say for them what they might not say for themselves. I do not know, but my impression is that they think it a duty to give the woman one opportunity, the offer of a home, and if they return to their evil ways, or if they have gone through an asylum and come back to the medical side again, they do not receive them.

2738. But I take it that, so far as your own personal opinion is concerned, you would entertain no objection to any hospital provision for the treatment of disease, although it be the consequence of vice?—Yes; speaking in general terms, we are bound to alleviate human misery wherever we find it, even though that misery be self-induced.

2739. And to take advantage of the opportunity to endeavour to reclaim?—Certainly, that is our grand object.

2740. As a matter of fact, here you draw a broad line of distinction between the Government patients and the voluntary patients; you admit the Government patient as often as she has occasion to recur to your assistance?—We must do so by the terms of our agreement with the Government.

2741. Does not another reason for this selection of patients on the voluntary side consist in the fact that the applications are far more numerous than can be complied with?—We never reject a woman; we receive all who come.

2742. I may tell you that we have had evidence given here by Mr. Lane, the surgeon, and, if my memory serves me rightly, his evidence was to this effect, that at the Lock Hospital they take the worst cases which present themselves on the voluntary side, because they have not room for all?—What Mr. Lane's experience may have been in that matter I do not know. He was a surgeon of high position, whose services were much valued there. I can only say that I have not known it to be so; I have always been under the impression that no woman was rejected who applied for admission.

2742*. Can you speak, as a matter of fact, of that being the practice now, or is it only your impression?—It is my impression, and I have never heard anything to remove the impression which I gathered when I first came to the institution.

2743. I have here the evidence of last year, and I will read to you some questions that I put to Mr. Lane. At Question 2560 I asked him this: "You have said that the diseases amongst the voluntary women are more serious than those on the other side?—A. I say so. Q. Is the voluntary side full?—Yes. Q. Have more women applied than you could admit?—A. Generally speaking, more apply than can be admitted; or rather, I should say, that there are more than can be supported by the funds of the hospital. The hospital has plenty of room in it now, but it cannot afford to keep more than a certain number of women. Q. Are there more applications than admissions?—A. Yes. Q. That being the case, how is the selection made amongst those who apply?—A. The most severe cases usually are admitted." Do you confirm that, or do you disagree

Rev. F. COOK, D.D.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

agree with it?—It appears to me, that that is altogether a matter for the medical staff; and it is new to me.

2744. You are not prepared to make any statement upon the subject?—No.

2744*. Is the voluntary side always full?—I should say not. Occasionally I hear the remark, "We are very full at present."

2745. Are the two sides kept perfectly distinct?—Yes.

2746. They are in distinct wards?—Yes.

2747. So that if there were a vacancy in the Government ward, it would not be appropriate to the necessities of voluntary patients?—No.

2748. To come to this return which you have given to us to-day, in which there are some further explanations of the return given by Mr. Baker, the number of voluntary patients is 502, and out of those I understand that there are only 24 cases of married women living with their husbands?—Yes.

2749. I understand that there are, out of the 502, 270 persistent prostitutes?—Yes; we regard them as such, we enter them as such.

2750. They are ordinary London prostitutes, I suppose?—Yes.

2751. Of those there are 270, and, amongst all the rest, some 232. There are only 24 married women living with their husbands?—So far as we know.

2752. So far as you know, therefore, the rest are cases of what we have been calling, in the course of this investigation, occasional, and more or less clandestine prostitution?—Yes.

2753. To come to the Government prostitutes; the number of cases is 485, there being only 224 women. I find, from the manuscript return which you have handed in, that of those 224 women 121 were in for the first time, 42 for the second time, 27 for the third time, 9 for the fourth time, 7 for the fifth time, 6 for the sixth time, 6 for the seventh time, 4 for the eighth time, and 2 for the ninth time; and I understand from you that the fact, as to that class of women, is that they go out and come back over and over again in the proportions that those figures show?—Certainly.

2754. If I have followed your expressions correctly, you expressed the opinion, with regard to these Government patients, that they were horribly alike?—Yes.

2755. Dull, dead, and brutalised beyond description or conception?—Yes.

2756. I need hardly put the question to you whether, with such characteristics, you have been able to entertain much practical hope of their reclamation?—It is a matter of Christian duty to hope even in the worst case; but the impression is very depressing, and it is very oppressing to be with them. Still God, we trust, works in the hearts of some of them, as my little statements here from my private books authorise me to say. I never admit the word "impossible" with regard to any one.

2757. "Impossible" is a word which it would not befit you, with your mission and your faith, to admit?—No, certainly not.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

would not be fair to expect the same proportion of reclamation in the one case as in the other. Of course it would not be fair; you agree with that at once?—Yes.

2759. Whatever the cause may be of the brutalised and hopeless condition of these Government women, there is no doubt of the fact, and taking them as they are you could not expect the same per-centage of reclamation that you could amongst the patients on the voluntary side?—No.

2760. But could you make any comparison between the 270 whom you recognise as prostitutes on the voluntary side and the 224 Government patients, all of whom are registered prostitutes on the Government side?—It would be very difficult. One would require, I think, actual separation of them in the ward; one would have to classify the component parts of the ordinary ward.

2761. Is it or is not your opinion, founded upon your observation, that you would have a better prospect of reclamation amongst those 270 voluntary patients than amongst the 224 Government women?—I should say yes; the hope would be greater and the probability would be greater.

2762. You would expect to find a greater chance of reclamation amongst them; and, so far as I can judge, from the figures with which we have been favoured, you find that a great chance?—Taking 100 for 100, or 20 for 20, of Government undoubted prostitutes, and ordinary avowed prostitutes (for we have only their own word to take), I should say that the probability and hopes of reclamation would be greater in the ordinary than in the case of the Government women.

2763. One reason would be, would it not, that the Government prostitute is, as you have said, more confirmed; she is older in the practice of her trade?—Generally.

2764. She comes back, as you have shown us, over and over again?—Yes.

2765. Are you aware of the Government statistics upon the subject, showing the gradual increase in the age of registered prostitutes under the Contagious Diseases Acts?—No.

2766. In Captain Harris's return for 1880 you will find the number of prostitutes, in what are called the protected districts, of the age of 31 and over; if you will run your eye down that column you will see a constant increase in the number of the women of 30 years of age and upwards?—I do.

2767. If it be the case that the age of those women is greater than the age of the women on the voluntary side, would not those facts be sufficient, in your mind, or at any rate would they not largely assist one in understanding the irreclaimability of those women, remaining, as they do, for a greater number of years, and to a more advanced age, in the practice of that lamentable profession?—Taken in connection with an opinion, which I think prevails in our institution, that the older women are harder and give us less reason to hope than the young women, I think it would bear that construction.

2768. You said, I think, in answer to the Judge Advocate General, that, supposing that the Acts were abolished to-morrow, the difficulty of

Rev. F. COOK, D.D.

of reclaiming these women would remain just the same?—My impression is that the Government women would be just the same, Act or no Act.

2769. Would you tell me who would be the women to whom you refer, if the Acts were abolished?—The Government women.

2770. But there would be no Government women then?—The same individuals who are the component parts of the Government ward at this time, we will say.

2771. What you mean, I take it, is women who have been leading the same kind of life for the same period of time?—If the present tenants of the Government ward were released at once from the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts, my impression about them is that they would be just the same.

2772. But these women, as you have already stated, are almost irreclaimable, and those individual women would remain the same?—There would still be some saved from the wreck. But there is one portion of Holy Scripture that always comes into my mind about them, "Who being past feeling, have given themselves over." That is the horrible impression that one has about them.

2773. That is the condition you think of women who have led this life of registered prostitution for such a lengthened period of time?—So long and so persistently, though some of them are quite young.

2774. Would your remark apply equally to the young amongst them?—I am taking them all as a class; but in every case a deduction must be made, I think, in favour of the young. We have a long supported opinion that the younger women are more hopeful than the old.

Chairman.

2775. In your last answer; when you say, taking them all as a class, do you mean all prostitutes?—No; all those that are under the Acts. But I think in an earlier answer I said that I had no reason to say that the Acts had made them so. I do not know; they may, or they may not; I cannot tell.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2776. I did not quite gather the effect of your evidence as to the necessity of coercion from a hygienic and curative point of view; can you tell us how far your voluntary patients have been willing to remain till they are cured?—I think I am right in saying that the medical staff find the voluntary patients (it may be through their own ignorance) often desirous of departing before the medical opinion would authorise their departure. They are sometimes ignorant of their own state. All of them, Government or ordinary, are as a class wilful and hard to restrain by any agencies; they all want to go off to their liberty, as they call it.

2777. That is naturally so, but can you at all enlighten us upon this question, how far the persuasion and advice of their medical attendants to them to remain until a real cure is effected has been found to avail?—I am only giving it second hand, because this is the medical officers' department. I think that as we have no control over them other than that of persuasion in the ordinary ward, many cases have discharged themselves, as we say, taken their own departure, when the medical officer, if he could have prevailed upon them, would have persuaded them to stay longer.

2778. You cannot give us any figures or proportions?—No; I have not any figures.

2779. I should be disposed to ask you what your own personal opinion is upon these Acts from a moral point of view; but if you prefer not to give any opinion, pray say so?—I think I cannot do better than say what I said before in answer to some question. My position has been, and still is, one of observation and reserve, by "reserve" meaning suspense of judgment. I fear the tendency of the Acts; I acknowledge that; that is a private opinion.

2780. Your private opinion is, morally speaking, to fear the tendency of the Acts, but you do not wish to express a conclusive opinion?—No; but I fear the tendency is to take advantage of such good results as are claimed for the Acts, whether altogether correctly or not, to move the Legislature to extend the action of such laws to the whole area of society.

Chairman.

2781. That is what you fear?—That is what I fear.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2782. Why would you object to that?—Because I fear (it is only my private opinion) that there are many who desire to have vice recognised, registered, regulated, and treated as one of the necessities of social life, to be brought under Government order.

2783. And to that, as a moralist and Christian, you would have the greatest possible objection?—I should have the greatest possible objection to that; but that is simply an expression of private opinion.

2784. If you fear that that might be the moral result in other parts of England of the extension of the Acts to those other parts, I presume you also fear that that may be the effect of the Acts where they are in operation now?—It would be difficult to answer that in a sentence; I should be obliged to express these private opinions, perhaps, at greater length than would be quite admissible now. I have had for many years an impression that people support these Acts from very different motives. I am safe in saying that the governors of our institution simply take the facts as they find them, and try to make the best use they can of them, and we try to reclaim so much human material as is put into our hands. But there are others who, not being influenced by the same feelings, simply wish, I fear, to have vice made safe. I think that good and bad arguments are very much mixed together, and it requires a very careful discrimination.

Dr. Farquharson.

2785. I think I understood you to say that you believe the rescue work to be more difficult on what we may call the Government than on the voluntary side, because the women are on the Government side older, and have been engaged for a longer time in prostitution?—I think, as to their being older, there is not very much to be said.

2786. They

Rev. F. COOK, D.D.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

2786. They have been longer in prostitution?—Yes, and they have become hardened by continually coming to our institution, and being sent away, and coming back again and again. They seem to be persistent and hardened offenders.

2787. You think that the hardening process is essentially connected with the profession of prostitution?—I must suppose so. To look at them, if I may simply go by their looks, one would say, as a matter of ordinary judgment, that they appear to have sprung from a lower stratum altogether; they appear to be inferior to the others in ability and education, and in all natural respects too.

2788. Would you consider that the actual physical operation of the fortnightly examination plays any essential part in the hardening process?—I have never known anything to make me say so. I have never asked them questions about it.

2789. And they have never voluntarily given expression to any opinion upon that point?—No.

2790. I suppose that another difficulty in reclaiming the prostitutes who have grown old in their trade would be the fact that these women become very repulsive in appearance and manner?—Yes.

2791. That would add, of course, to the difficulty of obtaining for them any desirable situations in life?—I may say that they are not disfigured by disease so much as an experienced person would expect to find them; but their manner altogether is so very degraded.

2792. Of course the women who seek admission voluntarily into the Lock Hospital have already voluntarily taken the first step towards reclamation?—Not necessarily at all. They simply come there, putting it in the simplest way, to get cured. Every woman so coming to get cured is seen and reasoned with, and persuaded to accept the advantage of our home if she have none of her own. It would be said to her, for instance, "Have you friends; what do you hope or propose to do when you leave this place?" If she say, "I am going back to my family," we cannot say anything; but if she says, "I have no family and have no home;" or if, for other reasons, it appears to be a good offer to make to her, we offer her a home. Numbers of them reject the idea of a home as if it were a worthless or absurd offer.

2793. We are told that there is a much larger number of prostitutes who have been in prostitution for a considerable period than there used to be. I suppose one reason of that is that the prostitutes are now under better hygienic conditions, and that they live longer than they used?—It may be so; I have no knowledge.

2794. Therefore, that would be an argument in favour of the hygienic side of the Acts?—The paper that was shown me just now was new to me.

2795. With regard to these statistics of the Lock Hospital which were given to us by Mr. Baker, we are told that out of the original number given us of 537 on the voluntary side, 474 were discharged cured to former stations, and that that practically means that they were sent back to lead their bad life again; is it a 0.75.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

necessary assumption that because they are discharged they go back to their bad lives?—It is not a necessary assumption if a woman, for instance, come to us from Woolwich, the medical officer gives her discharge, and as a matter of usage a little sum of money is given her to take her back to the place whence she came, which, if I may use two adverbs to distinguish what I mean, amounts to this, that she is necessarily sent back locally, but she is by no means therefore sent back morally, to the place whence she came. When she is discharged from us she is a free woman, the world is before her, there is no obligation whatever on her to go back to her evil practices. We simply send her back locally to the place from which she hailed; and if she said she came from Birmingham, we should have sent her back to Birmingham.

2796. Then you hold that this practical assumption is hardly warranted by the facts?—We of course often, when they say, for instance, that they are going back to Woolwich, know by their own distinct shameless avowals that they are going back morally to the place whence they came; but we are not obliged to know that. We give them a little sum of money to take them wherever they wish to go.

2797. On the voluntary side we find 107 restored to friends; may not some portion of those 107 never have left their friends but have come straight from home?—We can only put down what we get from the women themselves, and unfortunately we have reason to fear that we are often told what is not correct. If they say that they are going back to their friends, we sometimes know that they are, because their friends have communicated with them; but they have often told me that they are going home or to an aunt's, or here or there, and I have had my own doubts about it.

2798. Some of those young girls who while they are living at home contracted disease, may simply go back home again and resume their old occupations; therefore we cannot say that those 107 will necessarily go back to vice?—No; we can hope, but we have no knowledge.

2799. As regards the 17 sent to unions, is it not probable that those 17 were originally sent from unions to which they returned?—Yes; we receive some from unions by arrangement, as we can give them better treatment than the unions can, and they go back in some cases to the unions.

2800. Have you any experience as to the evidence given us by Mr. Lane, that the voluntary cases are much worse than those on the Government side, that they do not come in till they are very far advanced in disease?—I have been told things that make me believe that that does still, as it did in Mr. Lane's time, represent the facts. Many innocent women, for instance, keep their disease to themselves as long as they possibly can, and others again like to stay outside as long as they can; but the Government women are laid hold of by a strong hand and sent to the hospital as soon as they are found to be diseased.

2801. Then it may be, in some of those cases of the voluntary women who do not go back to prostitution, that their health has been so broken down by disease that they are unable to do so?—

P

Yes;

Rev. F. COOK, D.D.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

Yes. I well remember the case of a woman who was apparently dying, and to my astonishment I heard she had recovered sufficiently to leave; and we heard soon after that she had returned to her evil ways, and then we heard that she was dead.

2802. I think you acknowledge the great danger to society of letting women leave the hospital imperfectly cured?—Yes.

2803. In your experience does that frequently happen?—My experience is only second hand; it is what I gather from those who have more medical and personal knowledge as to the time of their departure, and the state of their health when they do depart, than I have.

Colonel Tottenham.

2804. Is it not the case that if you had further funds you would be able to keep a larger number of beds going in the Lock Hospital?—I am not able to say that we have more applicants than we can receive for lack of funds, my impression being that we receive all who come.

2805. What is the total number of beds at present occupied?—I am not able to say, but there is a gentleman in the room who can tell you that. We have a great deal of space which we could utilise.

2806. If you had funds?—If we had funds and applications; if applications were made and there were funds to meet the call, we have a very large amount of space still unused.

2807. Do I rightly understand you to say that you are never obliged to turn away an applicant?—I am not able to say that it is not so, but I have never known it to be so, and I have always been under the impression that no case was rejected; but the admissions depend upon the medical officer.

2808. What is the proportion between the Government patients and the voluntary patients?—They fluctuate considerably. When people have asked me this question, I have said something of this sort, there are probably at this time from 30 to 40 in the Government ward, and perhaps as many, or there may be more or less on the ordinary side, and on the asylum or reformatory side we have as many as on the Government and ordinary side put together, and very probably more, for we can take as many as 100 in the asylum. We have lately enlarged our accommodation to take 100. At the present time I think we have over 80 there.

2809. In any case, between the voluntary side and the asylum, there would probably be three or four times as many as the Government patients?—Yes, but sometimes the numbers rise rapidly with a number of admissions, and then they fall rapidly again with a number of discharges.

2810. Is it not the case that the payments for the patients by the War Office and by the parishes form a very large proportion of the total receipts?—Yes, they form a large proportion.

2811. Are you conversant with the accounts?—It is not my business to be conversant with them. I, from time to time, at the quarterly meetings hear the statement read. I am a governor, but I never enter on the secular business.

2812. I presume that you read the reports?—

Colonel Tottenham—continued.

I confine myself very much to my own work, and I have never taken very much notice of what the statistics are, except in very general terms.

2813. But you understand generally that a large proportion of the annual receipts are received from the War Office and the parishes?—I know it is a large sum of money altogether. The parishes have not been in the habit of giving us much. From one union, I think, I heard lately that there was an increase of the amount that they were to pay for each patient, and not a small lump sum to cover as many as they might send; but our object has been to work in a reformatory sense of the word upon them all; and the actual profit derived from the Government I take to be comparatively a small matter.

2814. I find in the report for 1880 that the amount paid by the parishes and by the War Office amounted together to two-fifths of the whole income for the year?—No doubt that is correct.

2815. And for that two-fifths they apparently contribute towards the maintenance, on an average of about 30 patients, as against 130 in the asylum and in the voluntary wards?—I am open to correction. There may be 30 or 40 at one particular time, and the next week there may be 50.

2816. But would 30 to 40 be a fair average?—It is my own guess.

2817. At all events, the contributions from the Government source alone, which this year amounted to 1,566*l.*, would represent a far larger number of patients than the actual number that are supported on the Government side in proportion to the whole?—I have never occupied myself with those questions.

Chairman.

2818. I think you said that 224 separate individual women on the Government side passed through your hospital during the last year?—Yes.

2819. And out of those, I think, it is stated in the report that there were 24 reclamations?—The analysis of the 24 would be as follows: two sent to service, four to friends, 14 to the asylum, and three to other homes or unions.

2820. And that would point, using the word "reclamation" as covering all these processes, to something like a reclamation of 11 per cent.?—Of course it is a charitable assumption or hope.

2821. But that is the sense in which the word "reclamation" has been used?—Yes.

2822. The number of Government patients being 224, 121 were in for the first time, 42 for the second, 27 for the third, nine for the fourth, seven for the fifth, six for the sixth, six for the seventh, four for the eighth, and two for the ninth; would it not appear from that that the number of those women who return very frequently, so far as this year goes, is small?—I could not add to the information; that information has been carefully extracted. I have sometimes occupied myself by glancing over my book and tracing a woman, and I have traced some 17 times.

2823. But that would be over a good many years?—Yes.

2824. But the number of Government women who

who come in very frequently may be fairly inferred from these returns to be small?—Yes.

2825. Take the cases of the women who belong to the ordinary wards; you only admit them once, except under the special circumstances that you have referred to?—Yes.

2826. And you have no opportunity given you, so far as cases return to your hospital, of seeing whether those women return frequently to vice?—No; we from time to time have reason to think or know that women whom we have received as ordinary patients once come back again; and it

2827. But except in cases of that kind, where you make the discovery, and also in cases where women, being reclaimed from the ordinary side, may happen to be followed out by you and discovered to have returned, you have no opportunity, from your figures, of comparing the proportion of returns to evil courses between the women who belong to the Government side and those who belong to the ordinary side?—No.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, IN THE CHAIR.

ALEXANDER PATTERSON, M.D., called in, and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2828. You are Doctor of Medicine of the University of Glasgow, and a Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh, are you not?—Yes.

2829. You are a physician and surgeon practising in Glasgow?—Yes.

2830. Are you not surgeon to the Lock Hospital in Glasgow?—Yes, I have been so for 11 years.

2831. Do you also hold the appointment of surgeon to the Western Infirmary in Glasgow?—I do.

2832. Were you formerly surgeon to the Royal Infirmary?—Yes.

2833. Are you examiner in clinical surgery to the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons at Glasgow?—I am.

2834. For how many years does your professional acquaintance with Glasgow as a medical practitioner date back?—For 27 years.

2835. In the course of your practice have you from time to time had special opportunities of making yourself acquainted with the state of prostitution in the city of Glasgow?—Very considerable opportunities.

2836. What was the condition of Glasgow before the year 1870, with respect to the number and character of brothels, and the number of prostitutes and their behaviour?—I cannot personally pretend to give the exact number of either brothels or prostitutes in Glasgow previous to 1870; but there were, to my own knowledge, a large number of brothels in the centre of the city, and those brothels were inhabited by large numbers of prostitutes. The streets were thronged with them both day and night, and they were constantly in the habit of molesting the passengers in the streets by solicitation. During all hours of the day, and chiefly in the afternoon and during the night, they sat at the windows of those brothels, with their persons partially exposed, and making signs to the passers-by, so that they might attract them.

2837. Then I understand your evidence to be, from your own observation, that, comparing the period before 1870 with the period since 1870, in the former period there were more brothels and more prostitutes, and prostitution was carried on in a more open and offensive way?—Most distinctly so.

2838. Since 1870 you say that that condition of things has been very largely changed for the better?—It has.

2839. That is to say, if I understand you aright, the number of brothels and the number of known prostitutes have been largely reduced; and you do not now see those scenes of open indecency to which you referred as having been visible before the year 1870?—That is so.

2840. To what influences do you attribute this great change for the better?—So far as known to me, the Glasgow Police Act, which was put into force in 1870, has led to the change, chiefly, at all events.

2841. Have you read the evidence which Captain McCall gave before this Committee last year?—I have.

2842. May I ask you whether, so far as your own knowledge will carry you, you confirm that evidence?—Most distinctly.

2843. When was Captain McCall appointed?—In 1870, I think, he was appointed as chief constable of Glasgow.

2844. I understand that you attribute the decrease in the number of brothels and prostitutes, and the improvement in their public conduct in the streets of Glasgow, to the action of Captain McCall under the Police Acts which govern the city?—I think the change was too sudden and too marked to admit of any other explanation.

2845. Have not most, or might we not say all, of the larger brothels been absolutely put out of existence?—I think there are none of the larger brothels existing such as there were before 1870.

2846. Then you would find the women in smaller numbers, would you, in lodgings, or, at any rate, in small brothels?—If they exist as prostitutes they must exist in a manner which spreads them over a much wider area; they are not concentrated.

2847. They

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

2847. They live in private houses, I suppose?—They must necessarily do so.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2848. And so far as Glasgow is concerned are you prepared to say that that change has not been accompanied by an increase of prostitution, but the reverse?—The reverse.

2849. With reference then to the question of the moral influence of the extinction of the larger brothels and the spreading of the prostitutes in lodgings or small brothels, your observation leads you think that the result is morally beneficial, rather than otherwise?—I should think it follows of necessity.

2850. At any rate, you have found it so at Glasgow?—Yes.

2851. Speaking of the condition of the streets, do you find passengers more free from solicitation or molestation than they were in former years?—Distinctly so.

2852. I understand distinctly that you do not meet with these indecent exhibitions by prostitutes of their persons at the windows of their houses, to which you referred?—There is nothing of the kind now.

2853. What do you say about the dress of these women?—You cannot tell them now from other females that pass along the streets, so far as their dress goes. Formerly they used to dress in a manner conspicuous for the purpose, I suppose, of attracting customers; and it was a common thing on the summer afternoons to see the mistress of the house with a troop of four or five females marching in Indian file along the streets in their gaudiest array. That is never seen now.

2854. Do your remarks apply to the suburbs as well as to the city itself?—Yes, so far as I know, and so far as my own observation extends.

2855. And you are distinctly of opinion that these improvements in public order and decency, and this reduction in the number of brothels and of known common prostitutes, have been followed, directly and indirectly, by good moral results?—I think necessarily so, from whatever cause it may have arisen.

2856. I think we have statistical results upon these matters laid before us by Captain McCall; have you seen those tables, which are in the Appendix No. 21 to our evidence of 1881, at pages 490-492?—I have.

2857. You would refer to those tables, would you not, as confirmatory of your own evidence?—Certainly.

2858. Is it your opinion that those measures which have been productive, as you tell us, of good moral effects, have also had a very beneficial effect upon the amount of venereal disease in Glasgow?—Necessarily so; if you lessen the number of prostitutes, you lessen the amount of disease.

2859. Would you not put it in this way: that if you lessen the amount of commerce with prostitutes, you lessen the amount of disease?—Yes, you lessen disease also.

2860. And your evidence is that there has been such a lessening in the amount of sexual vice?—Yes; that is my opinion certainly.

2861. You have no doubt whatever, have you, 0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

of the fact of the decrease of the amount of venereal disease in Glasgow of late years?—I think I can have no doubt of it. The Lock Hospital tables show it.

2862. You have given us what you think is the cause (of the fact there is no doubt); and you would give us as evidence of the fact, would you not, the statistics of the Lock Hospital to which you have been surgeon for 11 years?—Yes.

2863. Do you produce a table giving statistics of the Glasgow Lock Hospital from the date of its foundation in 1805 to the end of the year 1881?—Yes. (The same was delivered in.) 2864. Will you explain this table to the Committee in your own way?—I got from the books of the Lock Hospital at Glasgow statistics made up for every year, from the date of its opening on the 7th August 1805 to the 31st December 1881.

2865. The Paper which you have handed in is an abstract of that, is it not?—Exactly so. In this abstract I have placed the decennial population periods from 1801, when the first numbering of the people took place, and I have contrasted the number of admissions yearly to the Lock Hospital with the amount of the population. I do not know that I need read the whole; but in 1801 the population of Glasgow was 77,385. The Lock Hospital was not then opened. In 1821 the population was 147,043; in that year there were 364 admissions to the Lock Hospital, being at the rate of one in 404. In 1881 the admissions to the lock hospital were 349, whereas the population of Glasgow and its suburbs, the urban and suburban population, amounted to 704,436, being at the rate of one in 2,018, 60 years after the first proportion. If the number of admissions, in proportion to the population, had been the same in 1881 as it was in 1821, there would have been 1,744 patients admitted for that year, whereas there were only 349; and there were five times as many people in the city.

Colonel Tottenham.

2866. Are there any other hospitals in Glasgow at which this disease is treated?—Not for females. In the Royal Infirmary there is a male Lock Ward which I myself had charge of for a number of years. It takes in about 125 to 150 male patients in a year.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

2867. As I understand, there is no other hospital in Glasgow which treats venereal disease in women except yours?—No. You will see that in the year 1869 we had the highest number of admissions, when there would be 550,000 people in and around Glasgow. When the Police Act came into force in 1870, the number at once began to fall, until last year it was 349.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2868. Then 1870 is your dividing line. You then had Captain McCall as chief of the police administering the Police Acts of Glasgow in the way in which they have since been managed; and then you point out that, with a population increasing from 550,000 up to 700,000, the number of admissions to your hospital has p 3 decreased

A. PATTERSON, M.D.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

decreased from 598 in the year 1869 to 349 in the year 1881?—That is so.

2869. Do you ever refuse a case?—Never.

2870. Is the area within which you take the cases limited?—It is unlimited.

2871. Of course practically the immense majority come from Glasgow and the suburbs; but you have others from other parts of Scotland, and even from greater distances?—Yes, we get some from Edinburgh.

2872. The next column purports to show the number of patients dismissed irregularly; do I interpret that aright as meaning patients dismissed for misconduct?—Yes.

2873. I find that these numbers were not inconsiderable down to the year 1870?—Yes.

2874. Then there were no such dismissals until the year 1881, and then I find three?—Yes, that is so.

2875. Is there anything special to say about those three?—No, except that they got a fight up in the house one day, and they were put out.

2876. Going to the next column, I find that the number of deaths has diminished very much since 1870; that is so, is it not?—That is so.

2877. I presume that those deaths do not necessarily mean deaths from any venereal disease?—No, not necessarily; but I should think from the large number of deaths in the years before 1870 that many of them were syphilitic, because you are not likely to have from such a limited number of patients suffering from, or admitted only for, syphilitic disease, so many deaths from other causes than from the disease for which those patients were specially admitted.

2878. Since the year 1870, I see that there was one death in 1872, one in 1873, one in 1874, and three in 1881; can you tell us anything about those cases?—I do not think there was a single one attributable to syphilis. The three of last year I remember distinctly. One died from abscess in the brain, another from double pneumonia, and the third died after giving birth to stillborn twins at the eighth month. Of course that death may be attributed in a secondary manner to syphilis, because the death of the embryo was due to the syphilitic state of the mother.

2879. I presume that these figures may be taken as confirming what I believe is your own view and experience, viz., that the virulence, as well as the amount and number of cases of venereal disease, has very much declined of late years?—Certainly.

2880. Would you undertake to say that that is a matter of general medical experience and knowledge?—I think so.

2881. One column is headed "average sojourn of days;" the number of days appears to have diminished compared with a very early period, but not as compared with the period immediately preceding 1870; have you anything special to say upon those figures?—I do not know; unless the number of deaths that took place would interfere with the average stay of the patients. I cannot explain it in any other way, because the disease is undoubtedly much milder. It is so everywhere.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

2882. It is possible that you are more successful in persuading the inmates to remain until a perfect cure is effected than you were before the year 1870?—As a rule, we can get them to remain as long as we please.

2883. Then I think you also propose to put in a Return, do you not, giving the number and the occupation in life, as given by themselves, of all the patients admitted during the 10 years from January 1870 to January 1880?—I do. (The same was delivered in.) 2884. During those 10 years was the number of admissions 4,147?—Yes.

2885. Am I right in assuming that in the vast majority of those cases the patients were prostitutes of one kind or another, that is to say, that they were women consorting with more than one man?—I think so.

2886. Have you, from time to time, cases of women upon whose character there can be no such reflection; that is to say, married women who have contracted disease from their husbands?—I have.

2887. But that would be a very small proportion, would it not?—Very small indeed.

2888. I see here that out of this total number of 4,147 you have "housewives, 79;" I suppose that is the number of women who stated on entering that they were married?—Yes, as nearly as we can make out. We cannot take the statement of their being married from themselves as true, unless they produce their marriage lines.

2889. In all those 79 cases would they have produced their marriage lines?—I am not sure even as to that, but the majority would. We insist upon that if it can be done.

2890. In those cases they would represent themselves, I suppose, as women who had been infected with disease by their husbands?—Yes, that is so.

2891. Then, with those exceptions, would you say that almost all the rest were cases either of regular avowed prostitutes, or of young women who had more or less given away to immoral practices?—Of the whole number there were only 496 who avowed themselves prostitutes, but still, although they gave various other occupations (and the occupations are extremely curious of some of them), we can only take it that the occupation given was that at which the girl last wrought. Probably she had not been working for years, but still that was her occupation or the occupation to which she had been bred. Then, again, probably a certain number of them, mill-workers and others, were working at their daily occupation, and in the evenings they took to the streets for the purpose of supplementing their very small pay, and they then contracted disease; and possibly on being cured they would have returned to their employment.

2893. When they carry on some industry out of

4 April 1882.]

A. PATTERSON, M.D.

of which they partly support themselves, or when they have formerly carried on such an industry, unless they are very hardened prostitutes, they prefer to give that as their occupation?—Always.

2894. And from your experience I presume you would have a greater hope of reclaiming those who were unwilling to call themselves prostitutes than of the 496 who gave themselves that name?—Distinctly so. I think the fact that they avoid giving themselves the name shows that they are ashamed of the calling.

2895. To come to your own hospital, I suppose you have not always had the same number of beds. Up to the year 1869 how many beds had you?—Thirty-five.

2896. In that year, the year before the commencement of Captain McCall's administration of the police, were you put under great pressure to accommodate the patients who applied for relief?—Yes; there were too few beds for the number of applicants for admission.

2897. Did you at one time treat many more patients than that number of beds would accommodate?—Yes, there were 56 or 57 at one time in the house.

2898. In consequence of this state of things, did you provide increased accommodation in the year 1870?—The directors did so.

2899. To what number did they increase the beds?—To 60.

2900. Since then have all the beds ever been occupied?—Never, the number at once fell. We could, in fact, have done from 1870 with the beds that we had before.

2901. I think I understood you to say that you never refuse a case?—Never, certainly.

2902. And that in your opinion it is essential to the hygienic success of such an institution as this that there should be an ample supply of beds, and that every case should, as a matter of course, be immediately admitted?—Yes.

2903. But the numbers of such applicants, you say, decreased immediately; in 1869, with a population of about 570,000, there were 624 lock patients, were there not?—Yes, there were 598 admitted, and the additional number was made up from those remaining at the beginning of the year.

2904. And in 1881, with a population of upwards of 700,000, the number of lock patients was reduced to 349, plus those who remained at the end of the previous year, making a total of 373?—Quite so.

2905. Has your lock hospital always been, in your time, under the same conditions and regulations as regards the admittance of patients?—So far as freedom of admission is concerned, it has been; sometimes, where the patients were able to pay, there was a fee of a guinea taken where they gave it voluntarily; but if they did not pay they were not refused admission. I may state that in the year 1870 there were between 25 and 30 admitted who so paid the guinea, and last year there were only eight.

2906. But, at any rate, from the year 1870 no case has ever been refused?—Certainly not.

2907. Have you the power to detain patients until they are cured?—No.

2908. But you have told us that you have 0.75—7.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

very little difficulty in persuading the women to stay until their cure is really effected?—Very little now.

2909. How many cases in a year do you think you have of women who refuse to stay until they are cured?—I could not give you the numbers exactly, but there are very few. When I went first on duty there, there were a number who came and interfered with me during the visit hour, the time I take to examine the patients. I told the superintendent, who was a very shrewd man, that we could not put up with that sort of thing; he said that it had always been so. I took the opportunity of going up to the wards, and I told the girls, in as kindly a manner as I could speak to them, that it was no pleasure to me to come there to attend them, and that they must see that none of their number were allowed to disturb the business as it was being carried on, because, if so, I should at once resign my appointment. I said that it lay with themselves; if a girl came down and asked for their dismissal, or interfered in any way during the currency of the examinations, I would at once stop work for that day, and those who remained must do without further care until my return at the following visit. That stopped it at once, and we had little trouble with them afterwards. When a girl wanted to leave and go away for any cause, she waited until all the examinations were over, and then I had an opportunity of speaking with her; with the exception of cases which occur in any hospital, where perhaps the girl told us that her father or mother was ill, or something of that kind, which might or might not be true, but still I could not keep the girl in a case of that kind, nor could I in any hospital do so.

2910. Taking the case of the 496 avowed prostitutes, what proportion of those women, being under no compulsion to remain, go out before they are cured?—The avowed prostitutes stay as long as you like. Some of the older prostitutes would stay all their days with us.

2911. In fact, you have rather to send them away?—Yes; we have no trouble in inducing them to remain.

2912. Then I understand that, practically speaking, your evidence and experience amount to this, that you get on perfectly well without any power to detain the women in hospital against their will?—That is my experience.

2913. And that, although occasionally a woman insists upon going out prematurely, those cases are rare?—Yes.

2914. Did the managers ever think for a time that it might be advisable to assume a power to detain the patients?—They did.

2915. Did they make the attempt?—They did.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

2916. When was this?—About 1871.

Mr. Stansfeld.

2917. Will you tell us what happened?—We found that the patients refused to come in.

P 4

A. PATTERSON, M.D.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

2919. The proposal of the managers, as I understand, was that a woman on coming in should sign an undertaking to remain until cured? Exactly so; but we soon found that it prevented their coming in, and that some who were in refused to sign, and some who signed broke it; and it was given up.

2920. And in fact the thing frightened them?—It frightened them. It was not carried out for 12 months.

2921. Was that scheme abandoned?—It was.

2922. Have they ever seen reason to regret the abandonment of that scheme?—Certainly not.

2923. Is religious instruction provided for the inmates of your hospital?—I understand that to a certain extent it is; but with that I have nothing to do personally.

2924. But you are able to say that it is provided?—Yes, it is.

2925. I presume that in providing this religious ministration, it is addressed, as far as possible, to the saving and reclamation, particularly of the younger of the women who are there as patients?—I should expect to all.

2926. Is it within your knowledge that many of them are reclaimed in consequence of the influences brought to bear upon them in the hospital itself?—I cannot give an opinion as to that; that is not a part of my duty?

2927. Can you give any opinion as to the comparative reclaimability of the youthful and of the elderly prostitutes?—That is almost a superfluous question. In my opinion the younger the girl, the more easily she is reclaimed as a prostitute.

2928. Are these patients placed indiscriminately, or are they classified?—They are classified as far as possible.

2929. You keep the old and hardened ones as far as possible from the younger ones?—Yes, in separate wards.

2930. With regard to the reclamations at the hospital, I think Captain McCall put in some reports, did he not?—He did.

2931. What have you observed in the course of your hospital practice with reference to the sense of shame in women who have to submit to examination; do you find it easily or early in their career entirely obliterated?—Very seldom.

2932. Do you mean very seldom even in a lengthened career, or very seldom early in their careers?—It is very seldom entirely obliterated in any of them.

2933. Take the case of the avowed prostitutes, of whom there are 496 out of your 4,147, very seldom even in the case of that class of women, do you find the sense of shame entirely obliterated?—There is always some sense of shame left under certain circumstances, I think.

2934. And with regard to the younger women I presume it is particularly evident?—Yes. I may state with regard to that, that a few years ago a number of students applied to my colleague, Dr. Dunlop and myself to have a class formed for their instruction; and the directors, as I think, very properly refused the permission. We find that on the examination days on which the surgeons are there, if there should be a stranger, although a medical man, present, some of the girls almost refuse to come into the room; whereas they know me or my colleague, and the clerk who is there, and they come in without any trouble; but there is always an amount of hesitation when they see a stranger in the room.

2935. In your opinion, as a medical man familiar with this subject, would not the periodical examination of women for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are or are not diseased tend to destroy this last remnant of modesty to which you have referred?—That is so, in my opinion.

2936. Do you feel able to say from your experience, that with the disappearance of that last remnant of modesty would go also the last remnant of hope of their reclamation?—I think so.

2937. You have no hesitation, therefore, I presume, in expressing the opinion that a voluntary system of care and cure has this distinct moral superiority over a compulsory system such as that provided by the Contagious Diseases Acts, that it renders reclamation more possible? That is my opinion.

2938. As to the hygienic success of the voluntary system, you would point, would you not, to the statistics which you have given us?—Yes.

2939. And your evidence amounts to this, that the number of cases has constantly reduced itself with an increasing population?—Yes, in a very marked manner.

2940. And judging, as a medical man, you are prepared to say that the character of venereal disease in Glasgow, and I think you said, according to the general opinion of your profession elsewhere also, has become considerably milder of late years?—Yes.

2941. There is also a provision for the treatment of male venereal patients in Glasgow, I think you said?—Yes.

2942. In the Royal Infirmary, in fact, there is a male lock ward, is there not?—There is.

2943. Would your remark as to the diminution in the severity of venereal disease of late years apply to those male patients?—Certainly, to both sexes.

2944. You could say from your own knowledge that venereal disease had become milder in Glasgow in the case of the men as well as in the case of the women?—Yes, it applies to both sexes.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

2945. Is there any large military establishment in Glasgow; do you know how many soldiers are quartered there?—I do not know how many soldiers there are there; I think the number varies; there is a part of a regiment of horse and a part of a regiment of foot, and there are a few sappers and miners; but the numbers I cannot give.

2946. I suppose that in proportion to the population, which we know is very large, the number of soldiers quartered in Glasgow is very small, is it not?—I think that the number of soldiers in Glasgow is entirely out of proportion to the population, as compared with many other places; if you take some of the towns in Ireland, for instance, the number is quite different.

2947. As compared with places like Aldershot and

4 April 1882.]

A. PATTERSON, M.D.

and Portsmouth, it is infinitesimally small, is it not?—Yes; but it was also found that with regiments going from Aldershot to Glasgow, there was less venereal disease with the same number of men in 12 months in Glasgow.

2948. Therefore, of course that is one element in your calculations which, in comparing places like Glasgow and Portsmouth, ought to be taken into consideration for the purposes of our inquiry, viz., that in the one place the proportion of soldiers to civilians is very much larger than in the other?—That does not bear on the point of the actual decrease of venereal disease.

2949. But there is this element to be taken into consideration in comparing, we will say, Glasgow and Aldershot for the purposes of this inquiry; that at Aldershot the proportion of soldiers to civilians is very much greater than it is at Glasgow?—So far as that remark applies, of course; but it does not tell far.

2950. Have you had any experience, medical or otherwise, of the places in which the Contagious Diseases Acts are in force?—None.

2951. You said that all comers were admitted to your hospital; I suppose no letters of recommendation are necessary?—None.

2952. To go back to a question that I put to you before; I suppose you will admit that no such special sources of temptation as would occur, we will say at Portsmouth, when a vessel comes into Spithead full of sailors and marines, could occur in Glasgow?—We have the Channel Fleet coming into Greenock occasionally.

2953. That is some way off, is it not?—It is 21 miles; but we would get the result of it.

2954. As a matter of fact, do not a great many of these prostitutes come in from places in the neighbourhood of Glasgow?—That is quite so; they have always done so.

2955. From surrounding places, I suppose?—They come from Edinburgh, they come from Greenock, and they come from all the shipping towns.

2956. Do you think that all those who are diseased come from those places to your hospital?—I cannot say that they all come to our hospital or to any hospital; but I know that as many in proportion come now as would come in former years; there is no reason why they should not.

2957. I observe that in your report you speak of the subscriptions being insufficient; it is rather singular that in so wealthy a place as Glasgow, an institution of this kind should not be liberally supported, is it not?—It might be thought so; but the moral feeling against such an institution, or any recognition of it, is very strong.

2958. There is in Glasgow a strong feeling against the recognition of vice, even in the form of a hospital establishment; is that so?—That is quite so; I may state that we take in the parochial or poor patients; when they go into the poor-house hospital they are sent to us; and for them from the City parish poor-house we get 48 l. a year, and from the Barony parish we get 24 l., and from the Govan parish we get 12 l.

2959. Except as to these contributions, which you can hardly call voluntary, your hospital is supported entirely by voluntary contributions?—Those are voluntary also.

2960. All the other subscriptions are those of private individuals?—Entirely so.

2961. You get no subsidy from the town?—None whatever.

2962. Can you tell me what your average subscriptions in the course of the year are?—I cannot, but the annual report will give it.

2963. You said, did you not, that you found no difficulty in detaining the patients for a sufficiently long time?—I think I did not say that; I think I said that I found very little difficulty.

2964. Do you find, on the other hand, that they come in soon enough?—They do with us, so far as Glasgow is concerned.

2965. You find that it is not a stumbling block, so to speak, in your way, that the women do not come in sufficiently early to be easily cured?—With some individual cases it is. For instance, the worst cases we get are those from the rural districts, and those remain out, I suppose, as long as they can keep their feet to earn their bread; but those that are in the town the moment they know that they are affected with disease, I believe come to us.

2966. You would divide them into two classes; you say that those in the town come in at once, but that those in the rural districts do not come in as long as they are able to work?—I say that the worst cases that we get in the hospital (they are not many) come from the rural districts, and that those patients keep on their feet apparently, in many cases, as long as they are able to work.

2967. That would, of course, account for the disease being in their case more aggravated?—Distinctly.

2968. You, as a doctor, would agree with me, I presume, that the sooner you can catch the patient, if I may use such an expression, the better, with a view to her speedy cure?—Quite so.

2969. Every day or every week might aggravate the disease?—Yes; it is like a fire, the sooner you put it out the better, to keep it from spreading.

2970. A good many of these 349 women, I observe, have been admitted more than once?—Yes.

2971. It is correct, I think, to say that out of the 349 women only 209 were treated for the first time; was not that so?—Yes, that is correct.

2972. Then 86 were admitted for a second time, and 32 for a third time, and so on; so that, of course, in a good many cases considerably more than half the women came in again and again; is not that so?—A good many come in when they contract the disease again. The same woman may be in half-a-dozen times in the course of seven years.

2973. Therefore, in that respect, as regards the fact of the re-admissions, your Lock Hospital does not differ from the Government certified Lock Hospitals, where one of the causes of complaint is that the patients come in again and again?—You could not keep them out; we do not keep them out.

Q

2974. When

A. PATTERSON, M.D.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

2974. When a woman comes in, I suppose you at once examine her in the same way in which she would be examined if she was examined compulsorily; do you know anything about the examination under the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Yes, a little. We should examine her to find out what was the matter with her.

2975. There is only one way of examining those women I suppose, and they are subjected to that examination?—Quite so.

2976. And that is, in fact, the condition upon which they are submitted to treatment?—Distinctly. We would send them away if they did not submit.

2977. Do you find that they make any difficulty about being examined?—Of course, with the younger ones, it is a painful process.

2978. It is physically painful?—It is physically painful, and sometimes I give them chloroform to avoid the pain.

2979. Is that often done?—Not often; but I do it rather than give them pain.

2980. Of course you have a large private practice; I suppose the whole examination is very much the same as that to which ladies, or non-hospital patients, would be subjected?—Yes, much the same. Of course, in the case of protected districts, you examine them whether they will or not.

2981. I did not mean to question you as to the difference in moral effect between the compulsory and voluntary examinations, but merely as to the nature of the examination itself?—Physically the examinations are of necessity the same; the parts are the same.

2982. You were speaking about the striking diminution which had taken place in the number of women admitted to your hospital before and after the Police Acts of 1870 in Glasgow came into operation; what is the area over which the jurisdiction of the Glasgow Police Acts extends; does it extend over all those 700,000 people who are included in the census?—Not completely; there are a number of outlying suburbs independent of the jurisdiction of the city police, which come under the control of the county police.

2983. With regard to these outlying suburbs or districts, they, you say, do not come under the operation of the City Police Acts?—Not altogether, as far as I know; I think not; but Captain McCall, I think, gave full information as to that.

2984. Do not many of these women who come to the hospital reside in those districts?—We class them all under the definition of Glasgow women; we do not take the street or the district.

2985. You could not say whether they belong to that part of Glasgow over which the City Police Acts extend?—I could not, because they come from all quarters.

2986. I suppose your experience would go to show, would it not, that the worst cases are the new comers, the first cases; or would you say that the worst cases were those that came from outside the city?—I thought I had already said that the worst cases are those from the rural districts. Those who have been repeatedly in the hospital are not by any means the worst cases.

2987. You say that the worst cases are those from the rural districts, and I understand you to say that the reason why those are the worst cases is that they do not come in until the disease has taken hold of them?—Exactly so; it is the first time they have caught the disease, and they are reticent, and do not apply for advice until they are very bad.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

2988. Is it your opinion that there is, comparatively speaking, a very small amount of venereal disease in Glasgow now?—I think that there is less than there was ten years ago; but I do not see how I can possibly answer that question; it is a question of degree.

2989. Did you consider that amongst the 700,000 people, who, I understand constitute the population of Glasgow, there is less venereal disease than there is in any other similar area?—I could not pretend to say.

2990. But if the number of females that have venereal disease is represented by the 349 admitted to the hospital, is not that a strong reason to believe that the venereal disease amongst the female population of Glasgow is very small?—It is less than it was.

2991. If out of a population of 700,000 people you have only 349 admitted into the hospital during the year, is not that a good ground for supposing that the amount of venereal disease in Glasgow is very small?—The number in 1869 was 598, and you may take it proportionately.

2992. I do not want it proportionately, but I want to take the year 1881. If the number of female patients admitted in the course of the year 1881 to the Lock hospital is only 349, is not that good ground for supposing that in the year 1881 the amount of venereal disease in Glasgow was very small?—I do not see, with all respect, how that admits of a definite answer from me, though I should be very willing to give it if I could; I can only compare it with other years by saying that it is much less than it was 10 or 15 years ago in proportion to the population.

2993. I want to know what the amount of venereal disease is in proportion to the population?—It was one in 2,018 in 1881.

2994. You have 700,000 people in Glasgow, have you not?—Yes.

2995. Is it your opinion that this population of Glasgow is under any peculiar immunity from venereal disease as compared with any other similar population in Great Britain or elsewhere; do you consider that the amount of venereal disease now in Glasgow is small?—It is small in proportion; that is all I can say.

2996. In proportion to other places?—In proportion to the number of people.

2997. Is it small in proportion to other places?—That depends altogether upon the state of the population in other places. If you take the rural districts for instance, you will find whole rural districts, or you would have found them years ago, where such a thing was totally unknown; and

4 April 1882.]

A. PATTERSON, M.D.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

and that is the case in many places to this day unless it is imported.

2998. Your opinion, as I take it, is that the number of the female population suffering from venereal disease in Glasgow now in proportion to the general population is small?—I think so.

2999. On the 31st December 1881, you had only 23 female patients in the hospital, had you not?—That is correct.

3000. Did you not think that those 23 patients were a very small proportion of the female population of Glasgow to be suffering from venereal disease?—It is not possible to answer that. I can only answer it comparatively, comparing it with previous years when the numbers were greater.

3001. I do not want to go into comparisons at all?—It is a very small number in proportion to the number of people in the city.

3002. In proportion to the number who were suffering from venereal disease?—I cannot tell you.

3003. Do you not think that there were a great many other women in Glasgow suffering from venereal disease?—Very probably there were.

3004. Have you any data other than the Lock hospital reports, to which you have referred, to show the decrease of venereal disease amongst the lower classes of the population of Glasgow?—I cannot see how such data could be obtained.

3005. But you have no such data?—I should be very glad to produce them if I could obtain them.

Chairman.

3006. You have not got them?—No, I have not got them. I have my own personal observation, if that is worth anything.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

3007. But it is merely an opinion?—It is.

3008. Have you any experience amongst the lower class of the population of Glasgow, such as seafaring people and factory operatives, who are suffering from this disease?—I have, and I have had for a long time.

3009. Quite recently?—Yes.

3010. Do you find that venereal disease is very prevalent amongst them?—It is prevalent to a considerable extent; but I think it is less now than it was in former years.

3011. But still it is prevalent?—That is also hard to define.

3012. Is it less in point of numbers, in point of quantity, or in point of virulence?—In all three ways.

3013. You say that you have had considerable experience amongst this lower class of the population, and that in your opinion venereal disease is less in quantity amongst them than it was?—Yes.

3014. Do you believe that any considerable proportion of the female population that belong to this particular class who are suffering from this disease, come to the Lock hospital?—Yes; it is from that class that they come to the Lock hospital.

3015. Those would not be prostitutes; I mean women other than prostitutes?—They do come.

0.75.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

3016. What proportion of the 349 that came into the hospital last year were prostitutes?—It is not very easy to answer that off-hand. Only a very few of them avowed themselves to be prostitutes. I have put in a table which shows the occupation of the patients admitted to the lock hospital during 10 years, and of the total number of 4,177, I think only 496 admitted that they were prostitutes.

3017. But surely the managers of your hospital, being persons of experience, can always ascertain pretty nearly whether a woman is a prostitute or not?—I have said that those were the numbers who avowed themselves prostitutes. We know that many others are so, but they do not admit it.

3018. Out of the 349, what number do you suppose were prostitutes?—I can hardly tell. According to this return, a little over one-tenth of the 349 would be avowed prostitutes.

3019. That would be about 35?—Yes.

3020. How many of the others do you suppose were really prostitutes?—It is impossible to tell you.

3021. What you state in your report is, that on the night of the 31st of December you had 23 in the hospital; you do not know how many of those 23 were prostitutes?—I do not know.

3022. With regard to these women who belong to the lower class of the population to whom I have just referred, are there not many suffering from disease who do not come to the hospital?—I believe there are.

3023. Do you think it is a larger or a smaller proportion?—I should think that the larger proportion of them find their way to the hospital.

3024. Then, do you think that really amongst such a low class of the population there are only some 250 women who suffer from venereal disease in the course of the year?—I said there were 349 admitted in the year 1881.

3025. But you have already told me that 50 of those were recognised and admitted prostitutes?—Yes.

3026. Allowing 50 more for those who were also prostitutes, but who did not admit themselves to be so, that would leave about 250; do you mean to say that you think there are only 250 women affected with venereal disease amongst the lower class, the seafaring and operative class in Glasgow, in the course of the year?—I do not say so.

3027. You think that there were more?—I think so.

3028. A great many more?—You may put it so, but I cannot say how many.

3029. You think there were a considerable number who never came to the hospital at all, but who were suffering from the disease?—That is possible; but I cannot say.

3030. Have you ever made inquiries amongst the other medical practitioners in Glasgow concerning the extent and prevalence of venereal disease?—I think that those connected with the Lock hospital have the best opportunities for knowing about that.

the

A. PATTERSON, M.D.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

the population of Glasgow?—No, I have not, and I think that those connected with the Lock hospital have fully as good means as any other people in the town have of knowing it.

3032. But when you say that the Lock hospital had only 23 patients out of a large population on the night of the 31st December, I should have thought it possible that you might have made inquiries of other medical men having more experience of this disease?—No, from the very fact of our being connected with the Lock hospital, many of the patients suffering from that disease, both gentlemen and others, come to us as private patients.

3033. With regard to the virulence of the disease, we have had evidence from Mr. Macnamara, whose name you no doubt know. At Question 6440, he was asked this by the Right Honourable Gentleman, the Judge Advocate General. "You have great experience of venereal disease in Dublin; can you give me any idea as to its character at present, whether the syphilis was of a severe type?" and his answer was, "We have a most extraordinary outbreak at the present time of gonorrhoea; I never saw gonorrhoea so virulent as it is in the female patients at the present time in the Lock hospital. We only admit women to the Lock hospital; but amongst the private male patients who do me the honour of consulting me, I never saw anything so severe as the character of the gonorrhoea at the present moment prevalent in Dublin." Then the next question addressed to the witness is this: "Is the syphilis also virulent?" and he says, "The syphilis that has been going on lately is of a very severe character." Have you ever known of late years a similar outbreak at Glasgow?—No.

3034. But I suppose it is possible that such an outbreak might occur?—It is possible at any time; but it has not occurred. Venereal disease has been getting gradually less virulent within the last 20 years; that is my experience.

3035. I suppose the same causes which have made it assume a more mitigated form in Glasgow might have had the same effect in Dublin?—I cannot speak as to Dublin.

3036. To what then do you attribute the mitigation?—There may be other causes at work than merely the Police Acts.

3037. There may be an incidence of disease much more severe at one time than another?—There may be, and if we adhere to our sanitary regulations we shall probably lose the risk of incidence at all as a rule.

3038. But do you not suppose that the sanitary regulations of Dublin are quite as good as they are anywhere else?—Not for one moment; in Glasgow the sanitary arrangements are very good, in Dublin they are very bad.

3039. Do you not suppose that the same care is taken of the patients in the Lock Hospital in Dublin as in Glasgow?—I suspect that the dwellings are not so good before they go into the Lock Hospital in Dublin.

3040. Do you think that if a man goes into a bad dwelling he would catch syphilis?—It depends upon whom he cohabits with when he is inside; but the female who lives in an ill-ventilated dwelling, or who is in a worse sanitary condition, will have probably a worse attack, or will be in a worse state than one who lives in a clean well-ventilated house.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

3041. But it would not make a man catch it?—No, by no means; and I did not say so; it requires contact for that.

3042. Is it not possible that there might be a more severe incidence or outbreak of these diseases at Glasgow than there has been hitherto?—I cannot think so for a moment.

3043. You say that is impossible?—I think so.

3044. And therefore, in your opinion, this disease must always assume the mitigated form which it presents at present?—I think it is likely to do so at Glasgow, so long as the present sanitary regulations are adhered to in the city and surroundings. The buildings are very much better; and altogether the sanitary regulations are much better than they were 20 years ago.

3045. If you look at Mr. Macnamara's evidence, you will see that this outbreak not only affected people who lived in these very insanitary places, but also his private patients?—So I see.

3046. Do you think that sanitary arrangements have anything to do with that?—If a man contracts a virulent form of the disease from the female, hers will also very likely be so.

3047. But you do not think that the private patients who do Mr. Macnamara the honour of consulting him are likely to contract disease in that way?—I cannot answer that question.

3048. I take it to be your opinion, therefore, that these outbreaks of the severer forms of disease are not likely to occur in Glasgow?—That is my opinion, and I found it upon this, that many years ago we had outbreaks of typhus fever, and fevers of that description, and they are very much less now than they were 20 or 30 years ago, because the overcrowding has been put a stop to; and it tells upon syphilis as well as upon other diseases.

3049. You have told us, I think, that very few women have been discharged uncured from your hospital?—The word "cured" is used in the report, and I supposed that it is used in other hospital reports as well, in the ordinary acceptance of the term "cured." We send them away with no visible marks of venereal disease about them; but I, myself, do not consider that that is curing a patient.

3050. They would not be suffering from a disease that would be contagious?—No, not at the moment that we send them away, so far as we can observe.

3051. I suppose you send them away cured in the same sense in which the word would be used in any other Lock hospital?—I think so; but I do not myself consider that they are cured.

3052. I think I understood you to say that very few women discharge themselves?—Very few with us now.

3053. Can you tell me how many women discharged themselves in a year?—There would not be one a month now. We get most of them to remain, by talking with them. Sometimes, if they tell us that a relative is very ill, or that a father is dying, or something of that sort, we may not have the means of verifying the statement made to us, yet still, if they persist, we let them go.

3054. Let me call your attention to the words that were used by the last witness that was examined, the Rev. Dr. Cook, the chaplain of the London Lock Hospital. At Question 2776 the Right honourable Gentleman, the Member for Halifax, asked him this: "Can you tell us how far your voluntary patients have been willing to remain till they are cured?" and the answer that Dr. Cook made was, "I think I am right in saying that the medical staff find the voluntary patients (it may be through their own ignorance) often desirous of departing before the medical opinion would authorise their departure. They are sometimes ignorant of their own state. All of them, Government or ordinary, are, as a class, wilful and hard to restrain by any agencies; they all want to go off to their liberty, as they call it." That is not your experience?—It is not.

3055. Would you think it undesirable, if a woman wished to leave before she was cured, to detain her?—I would think it desirable that she should remain; but I would not think it desirable to restrain her.

3056. I mean detaining her by force against her will?—I would not so detain her.

3057. You would rather that she went out and communicated the disease?—I think that in the long run it will succeed better without force.

3058. But you are aware that that is not the experience of the Lock Hospital authorities in London?—I am not aware what their experience is.

3059. Have you not read Mr. Lane's evidence?—I am not sure that I have read all the evidence given.

Mr. Burt.

3060. I understand your evidence to be very decided as to the great improvement that has taken place in Glasgow since the year 1870; that there are fewer prostitutes, and that they are much better conducted than they were in 1870?—That is so.

3061. And I think you also said that the disease that exists is much less in quantity, and is also of a milder type?—That is so.

3062. The Contagious Diseases Acts have never been applied to Glasgow, have they?—Never.

3063. So that any improvement that may have taken place is not due to their operation?—Of course not.

Mr. Hopwood.

3064. It was put to you just now by the Right honourable Gentleman that the experience of the authorities of the London Lock Hospital was in conflict with your idea as to women being easily retained by persuasion until they were perfectly cured; are you aware that the Lock Hospital in London is subsidised, and is a Government hospital?—I understand that they take in Government patients.

3065. And they have a Government ward, and that a very large proportion of their patients are sent there by the Government authorities?—I understand that to be so.

3066. Then it is quite possible that that hospital being to that extent a Government institution, its authorities may have a predilection for the Government system which you do not favour?—It is quite possible.

3067. With regard to these examinations; you were asked whether they were of the kind usual in surgical examinations; do you use the speculum in all cases?—Yes.

3068. In fact, I suppose that it is not possible to make a scientific examination properly, and with any certainty, without using the speculum?—No.

3069. And, as I understand you, the use of that instrument gives a good deal of pain in the cases of younger women who are new to the operation?—Certainly, and in some cases you cannot use it. Take, for instance, the case of a virgin (although it is not often that we meet one, but we do occasionally), in such a case you cannot possibly use the speculum.

3070. Although they are prostitutes you meet with cases in which the hymen has not been perforated?—I do not say that they are avowed prostitutes; they are only very young girls who have not long been leading that sort of life; but you cannot examine such cases with a speculum; it would be cruelty to do so.

3071. As I understand, your hospital is open to cases of venereal disease generally, and is not confined to cases of syphilis?—It is open to venereal disease generally.

3072. A question was put to you as to whether there was in Glasgow impatience felt against any recognition of sexual vice by even the existence of a hospital to cure the disease consequent upon it; and I understood you to say that there was some such impatience?—I think so, and I deduce that from the fact that there is some considerable difficulty in getting subscriptions. There are many people who subscribe largely to other institutions who do not subscribe to the Lock Hospital.

3073. If that feeling exists, would it be, in your judgment, intensified as against a Government hospital, State-paid for the purpose?—Most distinctly; they would not have it in Glasgow.

3074. As regards the support of the hospital, do you find a good many benevolent people who are in favour of maintaining it for the wise purpose for which it has been instituted?—Yes, for certain diseases, the same as in the case of other diseases.

3075. In that sense does the hospital meet with any opposition at all from anybody?—None.

3076. You have made these unfortunate diseases a study for the 11 years for which you have been in the responsible position which you now occupy as medical adviser to the Lock Hospital; had you any acquaintance with the subject previously?—Yes.

3077. And in Glasgow?—Yes.

3078. To what number of years may your practice and knowledge in Glasgow with regard to these maladies extend?—Twenty-seven years; but I may state that so far as general practice is concerned,

4 April 1882.]

A. PATTERSON, M.D.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

cerned, I see a good deal of it. I was for six years in connection with the Royal Infirmary, and there I had charge of the Lock ward for males.

3079. Was that prior to the 27 years?—No, it was part of that time; and it was partly contemporary with my attendance at the Lock Hospital.

3080. And there are at the Royal Infirmary from 120 to 150 male patients per annum?—There are; there are 15 beds.

3081. Besides that, you have had considerable private practice?—Yes.

3082. Amongst all classes?—Yes.

3083. Is it the general result of your observation and knowledge, derived from those several sources, that the disease has decreased in Glasgow?—It is impossible for me or any one to give a statistical opinion; but so far as you take the number of cases and the virulence of the disease, they have decreased in proportion to the number of people.

3084. You derive that opinion from the opportunities afforded to you not only by your experience as surgeon to the Lock Hospital, but also from your connection with the male ward at the infirmary, and also from your own private practice?—Yes; generally. Taking all my means of observation together, that is the result.

3085. I think you also said that that was your observation as a student of contemporary medicine everywhere?—Yes.

3086. Your belief is that the disease is diminished both in number of cases and in severity of type?—I cannot speak as to the number of cases in other places; but as to the severity of type undoubtedly there has been a diminution everywhere, I think.

3087. Is that the general experience of medical men?—I think so.

3088. Then in your judgment there is no such prevalence of disease amongst the civil population as to warrant the institution of any such system as this of the Contagious Diseases Act?—I do not believe it does any good, and I do not know why you should institute such a system. It has not lessened syphilis.

3089. At all events, there is no such increase and no such ground for alarm by its ravages as to justify an experiment of the kind?—Most distinctly not. We have done without it so far very well.

3090. Do you treat out-patients of any sort at the Lock Hospital?—Very few. Sometimes a woman may bring in a child with hereditary syphilis and it is treated.

3091. You were asked whether there would not be others in Glasgow suffering from the disease who did not come to the hospital; I suppose that all those who could get private treatment would not be likely, as a rule, to come to the hospital?—I should think not.

3093. Your attention was directed to the evidence given by Mr. Macnamara from Dublin; I think you were first asked questions about the disease existing more or less amongst the lower classes; and I understand you to say that there was not a severe type or a general prevalence of the disease amongst them. Then you were asked whether there might not be amongst the higher class; is there any evidence of that?—I referred to the bad sanitary condition of Dublin as being the probable cause of an outbreak of disease of a virulent type; and then I was afterwards referred to Mr. Macnamara's evidence with regard to the type being virulent amongst the higher classes, and I answered that if the type of disease were bad at the time, and the parties contracted it from a case that was bad, they would themselves have a bad type.

3094. If you found it bad amongst the higher class, would you assume that they must have got it from a lower class?—Not necessarily. It is likely to assume in them the same type that is going about at the period.

3095. It might be aggravated by bad sanitary conditions?—It might be.

Mr. William Fowler.

3096. I only wish to bring out, if possible, more clearly your view, which I understood you to state; that you are quite satisfied with the machinery now existing for the purpose of dealing with this disease in your city, and that you do not look for or desire any fresh legislative action to give you more power of detaining people, or of otherwise interfering with any one's liberty, in order to reduce this disease?—Certainly not. You will not reduce disease by it, in my opinion.

3097. Do you consider that the giving proper hospital accommodation is the best machinery for grappling with the disease?—Yes; and treating the patients with every consideration.

3098. Treating the people with kindness and consideration instead of using duress?—Quite so; that is my opinion.

3099. And I understood you to say that those patients were quite satisfied, when they were so treated, to remain, speaking generally, as long as you thought it best for them to remain?—Yes, that is so.

3100. And that without any special distinction of one class of women from another, but generally?—Yes; the confirmed prostitutes are perhaps more willing than the others to stay.

3101. Do you suppose that that is from a sense of their need, or from their general poverty?—I cannot tell you; but some of them would stay very willingly if we would keep them altogether.

3102. You make them so comfortable, I suppose, when they are there?—Better than they are at home.

3103. Then the machinery of the ordinary police and ordinary medical appliances, coupled with kindness, does all that you want to do?—Yes.

3104. The police securing order, and you affording all possible medical assistance to those who are diseased?—Quite so.

3105. And in that way you think that you produce the greatest practicable diminution of the disease?—I think that practically Glasgow has shown that.

3106. You think that the diminution of the disease

A. PATTERSON, M.D.

disease is so manifest that it makes it clear that your place is a good one?—I think so.

3107. And that you state as a professional man?—Certainly.

Mr. Stansfeld.

3108. You are, of course, familiar with the annual reports of the Lock Hospital?—Generally so.

3109. I have here the report for 1881, in which I find this passage: "The work done is not merely confined to the cure of the physical disease, but has been regularly the means, through the affectionate sympathy and gentle instruction of Mr. Michael Rowan and Mrs. Condra, of restoring many of the patients to their relatives." That statement you are, no doubt, able to confirm?—I believe that is true.

3110. You were asked whether it was a fair thing to compare the amount of vice or disease in a town like Glasgow, where there is a very small military contingent, with, for instance, a place like Portsmouth, where there is a large military and naval population; and you were invited to say that that was not a fair comparison; you are aware, are you not, that in the Government statistics on the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts the Government have been in the habit from year to year of comparing certain selected districts, fourteen of which they call protected and fourteen unprotected?—So I understand.

3111. If you will look amongst the unprotected stations you find, do you not, that by far the highest figures of admissions for primary sores amongst the military in those stations are in the largest towns, such as London, Manchester, and Dublin?—Yes.

3112. Therefore, am I not right in saying that if it is assumed to be natural that there should be less vice and less disease in a large city like Glasgow, than in a smaller place with a number of soldiers and sailors frequenting it, at any rate there is no such reason why there should be very much less vice and disease in Glasgow than, for instance, in Manchester?—No.

3113. And that the difference in such cases as that must be sought for and accounted for by ascertaining the methods by which vice and disease are combated in those places?—Yes.

3114. I understand your evidence, therefore, to have meant this: you say that before the year 1870 there was much vice and much disease in Glasgow, but that in the year 1870 a system of police administration was adopted which tended rapidly and persistently to the reduction of brothels and of prostitutes, and that about the same time your Lock Hospital extended its accommodation, so that never after the year 1870 did it refuse a single case?—No.

3115. And your argument, I understand, to be this: that there is no better means of diminishing either sexual vice or the diseases which are its consequence, than by such a police administration as you have in Glasgow, and by a Lock Hospital with abundance of accommodation, with kind treatment, and with no compulsion?—That is so, so far as is known to me at present.

3116. You were asked some questions upon the evidence of Mr. Macnamara, of Dublin. Let me refer you to the answer that he gave to me (No. 6597); and then I will ask you to read it and to state how far you agree with it?—He is asked, "You would prefer to such legislation as the Contagious Diseases Act, a sufficiency of well-appointed Lock hospitals, capable of classifying the patients; the trap, as you have said, well-baited with every comfort and necessary appliance, and by kindness of treatment, and the sole power you would ask for would be to retain them till cured;" and the answer is, "I would be perfectly satisfied with that." So should I.

3117. The only difference, as I understand, between your view and Mr. Macnamara's is this: that your special experience in the Lock Hospital of Glasgow induces you to believe that you could do better without the power to detain patients compulsorily, than with it?—Distinctly. We tried that and failed.

Chairman.

3118. You have spoken to a general diminution in Glasgow, during the last 10 or 12 years, of venereal disease; does that diminution extend to gonorrhœa?—To all venereal diseases.

3119. Do you think that gonorrhœa has diminished as much in intensity and in the number of cases, during the period, as syphilis?—I cannot give you the statistical numbers; but I think it has.

3120. Can you at all say whether many of the cases of girls and women which come into your hospital, are cases of first attack?—Yes, they are.

3121. Is the number of such cases large?—Yes; but I cannot pretend to give you the number; I have no statistics with me.

3122. Do you think that one-half of the cases are cases of a first attack?—I will not pretend to give you the number; but many of them are.

3123. Do you take patients in if they fall into disease a second, third, or fourth time?—Yes.

3124. Do you find many patients coming back to you with disease?—A good many.

3125. And coming back even as often as four times?—Yes; half a dozen times.

3126. Do you think there are many girls and women, who are carrying on clandestine, as opposed to public, prostitution, come voluntarily into your hospital, being induced to do so by its benefits?—They will come when they are diseased.

3127. Even the clandestine prostitutes?—Yes, I believe that even the clandestine prostitutes come.

3128. As I understand, so far as you are able to draw an inference, you attribute the virulence of the disease in Dublin to the dirty habits of the women and to the bad sanitary condition in which the women live?—Yes, to that and all the surroundings; to overcrowding and everything else that goes with it.

3129. You spoke awhile ago of occasionally coming across cases of girls where the hymen was imperforate, virgines intacte; are those girls prostitutes?—I cannot say that they are; at any rate, they have not been long so. It is probably their first fall, and they have contracted disease immediately.

3130. They must indeed be mere novices as prostitutes when they are in that condition?—I think so.

Q 4

3131. Do

4 April 1882.]

A. PATTERSON, M.D.

Chairman—continued.

3131. Do women as a rule come in at an early stage of disease, or do they wait until their symptoms are more developed?—The majority of them now come in whenever they are aware that they are diseased.

3132. Do they come in at an earlier stage in the course of the disease than they came in at in former years?—I think they do.

3133. Have you yourself noticed a tendency to come in at an earlier stage?—Yes.

3134. Have you received any assistance from the local police, or from the advice given by the magistrates in inducing women to come into your hospital; I do not mean by compulsion?—None whatever; we have no connection with the police.

3135. Then how have the benefits of the hospital been brought under the notice of these women, and how have they been induced to come in?—They know that they get in without any trouble, and one tells the other. I should think that everybody in Glasgow knows of the existence of the Lock Hospital; it has been there for 75 years.

3136. It is not advertised, or anything of that sort?—No.

3137. Will you take it upon yourself to say that as a rule the prostitutes of Glasgow, when diseased, go there?—They have nowhere else to go; and if they were badly diseased the whole of them would come. Some of them who are able to pay, I believe, can get attendance at home, and do so.

3138. But you are aware that there is a very large number of prostitutes in Glasgow?—Yes, probably.

Chairman—continued.

3139. From your medical experience, and your knowledge of the district combined, what proportion of the women of the town and of the clandestine prostitutes of Glasgow likely to be diseased in the year do you think that number of 350 represents?—I cannot tell. No amount of experience would enable me to answer that question.

3140. You do not think that it represents all the women carrying on prostitution who would get diseased in the year?—Certainly not; but I hope you will not omit to look at the amount of the decline in the number of the patients coming into the hospital. That is the practical point, the very marked declinature which took place when the Police Act came into force.

3141. Do you think that so many of those 350 as are of the prostitute, whether public or clandestine, class, represent a large proportion of the number of prostitutes of one kind or another that become diseased in the course of a year?—I think they represent proportionately as large a number as the 598 that came in the year 1869; I cannot put it in other way.

3142. Do the 349 that you spoke of represent different individuals, or may the number represent 349 cases in which one individual comes in twice or oftener?—There are a few that have been twice or three times; I do not know how many. They have been in the hospital before, perhaps three times; but that is not in the course of a year.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

3143. The report states it correctly, does it not?—Yes.

Mr. Hanbury-Tracy.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, IN THE CHAIR.

MR. STEPHEN FRANCIS RIMBAULT, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

3144. WHERE do you reside?—At Maidstone.

3145. What is your occupation there?—I am engaged as an Evangelist or town missionary.

3146. For how many years have you been so engaged in Maidstone?—Twenty-eight years.

3147. The whole of that time in Maidstone, and in that capacity?—Yes.

3148. Does your sphere of action include a part of the town or the whole of the town?—The whole of the town.

3149. Then I need hardly ask you whether in the course of those 28 years you have or have not become intimately acquainted with the whole of the town?—I have an intimate acquaintance especially with the poorer classes; but I am acquainted, more or less, with the population generally.

3150. The whole, practically speaking, of your life has been devoted to this work?—I had had eight years' previous experience as a City missionary, so that I may say that my life has been pretty well devoted to the work.

3151. Your eight years' experience as a City missionary was where?—In London.

3152. With regard to the number of prostitutes in Maidstone, comparing the present time with the period previous to the Contagious Diseases Acts, what is your experience?—I believe there is much less avowed or openly declared prostitution than there was previously to the Act being put into operation there.

3153. To what various causes would you attribute that diminution in avowed and open prostitution?—To some small extent to the operation of the Act, but more largely to the various agencies which have been called into existence since the operation of the Act.

3154. The number of such women in a given population would naturally, I presume, vary somewhat with the number of soldiers established there?—Certainly.

3155. What are the figures with regard to the soldiers quartered at Maidstone?—At the present time, I think, there is about one-fourth of what we have had in the dépôt in past years. From inquiries I made in the barracks, I gathered that there were from about 120 to 130 soldiers, and I understand that we have had four times that number.

3156. When you say you have had four times that number, do I understand you to mean that the number of soldiers quartered in Maidstone was larger before the Acts than since?—Yes.

3157. Therefore, as far as their presence is concerned, their diminution in number might account for a certain diminution in the number of avowed prostitutes?—I attribute it to some extent to that fact.

3158. Will you refer to a Paper which has been handed in to this Committee by Mr. Ralph Thompson; it is Appendix No. 4 of the Evidence of 1879, page 160, where you will find it stated that in 1866 the number of non-commissioned officers and men of the regular army serving in Maidstone was 410?—It was.

3159. Will you read the figures year by year to the latest year, 1878?—In 1867 the number was 497.

3160. What was the number in 1868?—Four hundred and twenty-six.

3161. And in 1869?—Four hundred and seventy-two.

3162. What was the number in 1870?—Two hundred and fifty-six.

3163. And in 1871?—Three hundred and forty-eight.

3164. And in 1872?—Three hundred and sixty-seven.

3165. What was the number in 1873?—Three hundred and twenty-one; in 1874 there were 197; in 1875 there were 141; in 1876 there were 124, and in 1877 there were 139.

3166. What was the number in 1878?—One hundred and forty-two.

3167. You attribute, I think, a certain proportion of the reduction to the efforts of benevolent persons in reclaiming fallen women; have those efforts been energetically carried on?—They have been very energetically carried on; there has been very special attention given to the subject.

3168. You are speaking of Maidstone specially, are you not?—I am speaking of Maidstone.

R

3169. Since

18 April 1882.]

Mr. S. F. RIMBAULT.

[Continued.]

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

3169. Since when have those agencies come more especially into operation?—Since the commencement of the institution of the Act.

3170. Does that especial energy in prosecuting the work of reclamation date from the institution of the Act?—Not quite, it is somewhat more recent; I will mention, if you please, the various agencies.

3171. But I am not quite sure what is in your mind; do I understand you as meaning that those reclamation agencies were carried on with increased vigour in Maidstone, in consequence of the enactment of the statutes?—I think not; I do not think that would have much to do with it, if at all.

3172. Did those agencies exist before the Acts were passed?—I think not.

3173. As a matter of fact, these reclamation agencies have started of late years?—They have.

3174. And they have worked with great vigour?—They have worked with very great vigour, and have been attended with remarkable success.

3175. You were about to name certain institutions which have worked in that spirit and manner: will you now proceed to do so?—I would mention first the Deaconess' Home, and the establishment of temporary homes for girls.

3176. Is that called the Deaconess' Institution?—The Deaconess' Home.

3177. It is not the same as the Deaconess' Institution, is it?—I believe it is, but I am not prepared to say. Their work is not exclusively in relation to prostitutes, but they give themselves very largely to the effort to reclaim fallen girls, and have been very successful; that is only one agency. I could mention others, if desired.

3178. Will you kindly do so?—We have a very earnest evangelist who has been successful in that direction; a medical doctor who is also an earnest Christian, and is doing medical work; he has been successful in reclaiming some.

3179. Who is he?—Dr. Smyth.

3180. Are there any other institutions besides the Deaconess' Home?—We have a home for shop girls, and girls out of situation, which must have some influence.

3181. It has some influence probably in preventing them from falling into evil ways?—Yes.

3182. But not in reclaiming them from evil ways into which they have fallen?—No; that is a separate thing.

3183. I think I understood you to say that to some small extent the Acts themselves had operated to reduce the number of avowed prostitutes in Maidstone; how do you think the Acts have operated in that direction?—They may have had some deterring influence upon young girls; I do not know that they have, but I believe that they would have. I do know of young girls who have had a great dread of being put upon the Register, and to avoid registration have left the town; but they are living the same life elsewhere, or in the vicinity of Maidstone, coming occasionally to the town.

3184. To a certain extent, you think the Acts have had a deterrent effect?—Undoubtedly.

3185. Which would operate, would it not, in two ways; it would either drive a number of such girls out of the district, or into clandestine prostitution?—Quite so.

3186. I understand you to say that you know of cases in your experience where such girls have avoided the operation of the Acts, by taking themselves away from the place?—I do.

3187. Not merely generally, but you actually know special cases?—I know of special cases, and I could particularise them, if needful.

3188. Do you mean going away and continuing the same life elsewhere?—I believe that is so.

3189. At any rate, leaving the town; and not, as far as any evidence which has come before yourself, having left it in consequence of the application of reclamation agencies?—Yes, that is so.

3190. Now, with reference to the number of registered prostitutes in Maidstone; though the number of avowed prostitutes has diminished, are you prepared to accept the figure of Captain Harris's returns?—Not by any means.

3191. Will you take that Report in your hands, which is the Report for 1880, presented to Parliament in 1881; what does that Report state the number of registered prostitutes in Maidstone for that year to be: you will find it at column 16: "Total number of known common women on the 31st of December of each year." Upon the 31st of December 1880, do you find that the number was 21?—Yes, 21.

3192. What do you find in the previous year?—Thirteen.

3193. And in the year before that?—Sixteen.

3194. Do you believe in the accuracy of those numbers?—I do not.

3196. Then the course of your ministrations leads you to address yourself to those women, amongst others, of the poor and neglected?—I make no difference; in my ordinary work I visit generally from house to house, and I do not pass by the houses in which those poor girls live.

3197. And out of the list of those whom you have thus visited last year, I understand you have extracted the names and addresses of 64 whom you undertake to say are leading a life of prostitution?—To the best of my belief; that includes both the registered girls and the unregistered.

Colonel Digby.

3198. That was the number for last year?—I could scarcely say that exactly; it is the record I keep that I have selected from.

3199. But

18 April 1882.]

Mr. S. F. RIMBAULT.

[Continued.]

Mr. Stansfeld.

3199. But those figures would be deceiving if they were the result of a long series of visits during a course of years?—It is not so; it is the result of visitation in the last two or three years; I have crossed out those who died.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

3200. Do you mean to say that there are now 64 persons to your belief carrying on the profession of prostitution?—I believe so, and many more; I have not gone out of my way to find cases.

3201. I only wanted to know if you were speaking of the actual state of things existing at the present moment?—That is all I can say.

Mr. Stansfeld.

3202. What I understand you to say is this: that in your opinion at the present moment, and at any time during the last few years, there have not been less at any rate than 64 women practising prostitution, instead of the number given in Captain Harris's return?—Quite so.

3203. Now, if we compare these numbers, your number is more than three times the largest number in recent years in Captain Harris's return?—It is.

3204. If we take the year 1869, where Captain Harris returns only 13 prostitutes, you would show a much larger proportion than that?—Yes.

3205. Have you ever in public at Maidstone stated this belief of yours, that Captain Harris's return is quite unreliable in regard to the number?—I did so at a meeting a few years back; I made the statement at that time that I believed there were three times as many as were set down in the return.

3206. Was that the year 1876 when you made that statement?—It was in the year 1876, I think.

3207. Was your statement questioned in any way?—It was called in question.

3208. By whom?—The Acts' policeman accompanied by his superior (I do not know the gentleman's name) from Chatham.

3209. What did they do?—The police officer called upon me, and asked me if that was a correct report of what I said, and I said, Not exactly. I certainly believed I had said I could show as many as three times that number, but I should not be surprised if I had heard that there had been ten times that number.

3210. And the return to which you referred was the figure for the year 1876, was it not?—I think it was.

3211. Therefore your statement at that public meeting would have been, I suppose, in the following year, 1877?—I think it would.

3212. However, you were called upon by a member of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police force, and you adhered to your statement?—I adhered to my statement.

3213. What followed?—There was a remark made sarcastically that surely you must have other means of obtaining information than we have, evidently implying that there was a doubt about it.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

3214. That they did not acquiesce in your view?—That is so.

3215. Now, coming down a little to particulars, so as to test the value of your view; do you know individually, and could you if it were necessary, name cases of women who are not registered, and who are practising, and who are well known as common prostitutes?—Certainly.

3216. You have in your hand a list of women whom you believe to be practising prostitution?—I have.

3217. But you could, as I understand, give the Committee, if we desired to have that information, the names and addresses of a number of women who are publicly and generally known as practising prostitution, and who yet are not registered?—I could.

3218. Could you say how you know they are not registered?—By conversation with the Acts policeman; I have asked the question why such and such characters were not upon the books.

3219. Could you give the Committee any information upon that subject; could you refer us to any cases in which you have asked the question, and been informed why the women to whom you referred were not placed upon the register?—I can refer to three girls whom I have known for the last 15 years; there is a family of girls, six or seven in all, three of whom have been generally well known to be prostitutes; every third person in the town would know that they were prostitutes; but they dress quietly, they go regularly to church, and they are generally found in religious meetings of all kinds; they conduct themselves demurely and quietly, and they do no work; but it is well known that they are what I say; their character is simply notorious throughout the town.

3220. I omitted to ask you this: have you not had a petition presented from Maidstone impugning the accuracy of Captain Harris's return?—I have.

3221. Was that in the year 1879?—Yes, in the year 1879.

3222. Was that petition signed by ministers of religion and other persons?—Yes, by ministers of religion, and persons having a general knowledge of the town, and of that class of character; I have a copy of it here (producing the same).

3223. Probably you signed that petition yourself?—I signed that petition myself.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

3224. To whom was that petition addressed?—To the House of Commons.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

3225. Have you that petition with you?—I have. (The same was handed in.)

Mr. Stansfeld.

3226. Now, in the case of these particular three girls to whom you referred, you raised the question, as I understand, to the Contagious Diseases Acts' police, why they were not upon the register?—I asked the question why it was that girls in that station aspiring to gentility were not upon the books, whilst the common ones were registered;

Mr. S. F. RIMBAULT.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

registered; and he answered that it would be difficult to get a case against them, they were so respectable; I asked, is it not notorious that these girls have been frequently in the officer's quarters in the barracks.

3227. But did you understand, by "getting a case against them," producing evidence which would be admissible in a court of law of the fact of prostitution?—It would be simply impossible, I suppose, to obtain such evidence as that. I do not know what he meant.

3228. Are you sufficiently familiar with the way in which the registration is managed to be able to answer the question I now put to you; if not, decline to answer it. Are you, or not, aware, as a matter of fact, that almost all the women whose names are put upon the register are placed there without such evidence?—I am quite aware of that. I am quite aware of what power the officer possesses in order to bring those girls under his jurisdiction: and I said to him, "Surely you are not obliged to prove that these girls are prostitutes when they are so notorious; you have simply to summon them before the magistrates, and the girls must show themselves not to be prostitutes; it does not devolve upon you to prove it." He denies that fact, and has denied it repeatedly; that is as far as I can understand the Act.

3229. Do you know of other cases of girls carrying on sly prostitution?—I do.

3230. Amongst those cases is there not a class of women who profess to cohabit only with one man, thereby escaping the registration, and yet are common to many?—I have known instances of women cohabiting with men; sometimes they marry, but more generally they simply cohabit, hoping by that means to avoid registration.

3231. You will find, in Captain Harris's return, the number of women who are supposed to have entered into the profession as being married, namely, seven; now, do all those women who marry leave the profession of prostitution?—Certainly not.

3232. That is within your knowledge?—It is within my knowledge that girls have married soldiers, or married common men, who do not leave the profession.

3233. At any rate I presume you would mean this, that you have known cases of women who are practising prostitution who have married soldiers or other persons, and continued the practice?—They continued the practice. I do not say that they have in all cases avoided registration; that I am not aware of, because I do not know all the girls who are on the register.

3234. Does the list which you have in your hand of 64 persons who are practising prostitution contain the names of any married women?—It does.

3235. Of how many?—Of 17, I think they are marked off; there is a separate list of married women.

3236. Would those be cases of women first of all quitting a life of prostitution and then marrying?—No, I am not including that class at all. These are small tradesmen's wives, I think, and artisans' wives who, with the knowledge of their husbands in many instances, and in other instances without the knowledge of their husbands, practise prostitution for the sake of obtaining dress. I have confidence that this list might be very largely extended indeed, but I have put down only those cases that I could substantiate, I think, in evidence.

3237. Is there less open solicitation in Maidstone than there was before the Act was put into operation?—There is less, certainly.

3238. To what do you attribute that fact?—The regular prostitutes are not so much seen in the streets; we do not see them about so much, except about the public-houses where they resort.

3239. The registered girls are fewer in number?—The registered girls are decidedly fewer in number, and they do not perambulate the streets as they used to do.

3240. Do they congregate in particular public-houses?—They congregate in particular public-houses.

3241. And the clandestine prostitutes who, according to your evidence are in the great majority, would naturally conduct their business with considerably more circumspection as far as outward notice is concerned?—They would naturally.

3242. To avoid coming under the Act?—Yes, to avoid coming under the Act.

3243. Will you give the Committee your opinion and experience upon this question, viz., the effect of the administration of the Acts on juvenile depravity in Maidstone?—I think it has had a very small effect, if any; I believe there is no town in the kingdom where there is more juvenile depravity and precocity in vice.

3244. Do you think it has stimulated and increased juvenile depravity?—I do not say that, but I do not think that it has prevented it.

3245. With regard to clandestine prostitution, if I understand you correctly, you gave some figures which were not, you thought, exhaustive, of the amount of clandestine prostitution; but did you not express the opinion that clandestine prostitution has been increasing in Maidstone of late years?—I believe it has.

3246. You have had, I am afraid, in the course of your experience to witness, and have had evidence before you of considerable juvenile depravity?—I have.

3247. Have you or not noticed that more of late years than before?—I certainly have.

3248. But you are not prepared to say that the amount has really increased?—It is quite my belief that juvenile depravity has increased of late years; it has come under my notice more possibly, but that is my general impression from my own experience, and from conversation with the clergy and others of the town.

3249. Have you observed indecent conduct in language on the part of young girls and boys?—I have; it is fearfully prevalent.

3250. And a kind of novel precocity in juvenile depravity?—A wonderful amount; an incredible amount of precocity in vice; I attribute it to many causes which I can specify.

3251. Will you briefly state to what causes you attribute that mainly?—There are a great variety of corrupting influences; I have a night school for boys; they are biggish lads generally, about 17 or 18 years of age, most of them, but some

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

some younger; I have overheard them conversing, and have found out from those boys that there were certain women who, for the sake of their pence, would expose themselves to those lads; and there is a man living in the town who will exhibit a peepshow of pictures and indecent photographs to boys for their pence, and sometimes I have known him to exhibit a naked girl.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

3252. Do you mean to exhibit a photograph of a naked girl?—No, the girl herself; the man has had three or four of those girls, the girl being simply made an exhibition of to the boys for their pence.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

3253. But surely that could be put down by the police, could it not?—The man has only just returned to the town, but I mean to take precautions to put down the exhibition; the boys of a respectable tradesman were inveigled into the house recently, but the father foolishly made a noise and raised the neighbourhood, instead of having the man quietly proceeded against and convicted.

Mr. Stansfeld.

3254. I understand that your impression is that juvenile depravity in Maidstone and its vicinity is on the increase; I wish to know if you can express any opinion founded upon your observation and experience upon this question, how far the operation of the Acts may have had an influence in that direction?—I hardly know how it can have had any influence, but I simply mention the fact; I do not know that the Act has any effect either way; I do not think it has had any effect in preventing it, at all events.

3255. Now what have you to tell the Committee about the number of brothels in Maidstone?—I do not know of many brothels. I hardly know what may be designated a brothel; there are many houses where two or three girls live together; I do not know whether you call that a brothel. Those houses where five or six used to live together, have been broken up and the girls dispersed, and they are now living separately, or two together in lodgings.

3256. Taking Captain Harris's Report, and referring to the year 1879, do you find according to that report, that there was one public-house and one beerhouse in Maidstone, where prostitution was carried on?—Yes.

3257. Does that fact accord with your own knowledge?—By no means.

3258. What should you say of the year 1879?—I know of eight houses, two public-houses, and four beershops where there could be little or no question about the character of those houses.

3259. That makes six, but you said you knew of eight?—Yes, altogether.

3260. In the year 1879, according to Captain Harris's figures, there was only one public-house and one beerhouse in Maidstone where prostitution was carried on; I understand you do not agree with that either?—I do not; at that time there were two houses I put down; of one of them the landlord has been fined 10*l.*, and ever since I have known it it has been a notorious house; it is a house abutting upon business premises, and I have gone into the business premises, and from them I could see; and the people occupying them told me they had frequently seen men and women go in and pull the blind down and turn the key in the door; that was a matter of frequent occurrence.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

3261. That accounts for one of the two?—That house has lost its license, but previously to that time it was a notorious house.

3262. Now with reference to the beerhouses, do you know of more than one in the year 1879?—Yes, I knew of four at that time.

3263. Therefore, you knew two public-houses and four beerhouses, making six?—Yes.

3264. And not eight?—I have put down the names of the public-houses and beerhouses that I have suspected at the present time, but I hardly know about that time in particular.

3265. I will deal first with the year 1879, and then I will bring you to the present time. In the year 1879 Captain Harris gives one public-house and one beerhouse in Maidstone; I understand you to say that in the year 1879 you knew more of such houses which were conducted for the purpose of prostitution?—Yes.

3266. You have told the Committee now of six, two public-houses and four beerhouses; are you speaking of your observation of those houses in the year 1879?—Yes.

3267. Now we will come to the present time, and see how you distinguish that from the past; at the present time what is Captain Harris's return?—Only one public-house, and no beer-shop.

3268. That is for the year 1880?—Yes.

3269. But what have you to say as to the year 1880?—I knew of four public-houses at that time which I believed, upon sufficient evidence to satisfy me, to be used for the purpose of prostitution. I have taken very great pains, not only from inquiry, but from absolute watching of the house night after night, Saturday night especially and market nights, Thursday nights to verify my opinion, and I have seen sufficient to justify me in it; I have overheard men and women haggling about the price, and then one has gone in and the other has followed, showing distinctly the character of the house.

3270. Then with regard to beerhouses?—I know three at the present time.

3271. But we are speaking of the year 1880?—In the year 1880 I knew of three beershops, of which I had not the smallest doubt about their character.

3272. And how many public-houses?—Five public-houses.

3273. In Captain Harris's return the number of private brothels is also stated; does the number of private brothels stated by him represent the number of private houses in which prostitution is carried on?—Of course it depends upon what is understood by a "brothel;" the girls are living generally now separately, perhaps one or two together; I only know of really one brothel in Maidstone.

3274. Will you refer to Captain Harris's figures on page 23 of his return, column 12, headed

Mr. S. F. RIMBAULT.

headed "Private houses in which women resided and practised prostitution." Now there is no question there as to the name "brothel;" what are the numbers given by Captain Harris from the year 1876 to 1880; in 1876 Captain Harris gives the number as four?—Four.

3275. What is the number in 1877?—Six; in 1878 there were six, the next year five, and in 1880 the number was seven.

3276. Do you think those figures are a correct representation of the number of houses in which women reside and carry on prostitution?—Certainly not.

3277. You think the number is considerably more?—Certainly.

3278. From what source of information do you say that, from your own observation?—From my own observation.

3279. You have, in the course of giving your evidence, referred to a list of your own; I presume that that list would be quite inconsistent with the figure which Captain Harris has given in his report?—It would be.

3280. Do you credit the figures of juvenile prostitution which Captain Harris has given in his return?—I do not; I deny them altogether.

3281. Will you take these figures for a series of years; at page 18, according to this return, there was not, in 1880, a single prostitute under 18 years of age?—That is so.

3282. Do you believe that?—I do not.

3283. According to this return, since the year 1870 there never was a prostitute in Maidstone, if all the prostitutes were registered under the age of 16; do you believe that?—I do not.

3284. And only one under the age of 17; do you believe that?—I do not.

3285. Now, you have referred to the Deaconess' Institution, which rescues and reclaims fallen women and girls; can you give the Committee any information as to the ages of girls who are rescued by that institution?—I can only mention the number of cases; but I have a letter from the Lady Principal of the Deaconess' Home, in which she states that several cases under 16 have come within her knowledge.

3286. What is the date of that letter?—It is quite recent (the letter was handed to the honourable Member).

3287. Was this letter in answer to the inquiry you made of her?—Yes; I made the inquiry, and she sent that letter in answer, a fortnight ago.

3288. In that letter, does the Lady Principal state that, to her knowledge, there have been in Maidstone several cases of girls under 16 who have been on the streets there, and have been rescued by the Deaconess' Home?—She does; I have another letter also, if I may refer to it, from Dr. Smyth, the medical Evangelist to whom I have referred, and he also states the fact that two girls practising prostitution under the age of 17 have come under his knowledge.

3289. Did he send you that letter which you have in your hand with the view to its production before this Committee?—He sent me this letter yesterday, with the view to its being used.

3290. Will you read that letter?—"Maidstone, 17th April 1882.—I have been engaged in Evangelistic work in this town for about seven years, and have some experience of the moral condition of the community, and desire to say that the statement, that there are no young women under 17 leading the lives of prostitutes in Maidstone, is utterly untrue. Two such have come under my notice lately, who attend my meetings and professed reformation of life."

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

3291. Can you tell the Committee, of your own personal and individual knowledge, of cases of girls under the age of 16 who are leading a life of sin?—In this list which I have here I have marked the cases under that age, and given the names and some particulars in reference to them.

3292. That is to say, girls under the age of 16 and 17?—Yes, when pursuing a life of sin; I have nine cases of girls whom I have known to be living lives of prostitution under the age of 17; there are one or two of them at the present time more advanced in life, but they have been upon the streets, to my knowledge, for some time.

3293. You say that in that list you have nine cases of girls under 17 practising prostitution; I presume you mean nine cases of women or girls practising prostitution within the last two or three years, and who commenced before the age of 16 or 17?—Not exactly; most of them are at the present time under 17 years of age, but there is one of them, for instance, who is 22 years of age now, but she has been upon the town to my knowledge for eight years, and she is a registered girl. There is one of only 13 years of age that I found in a brothel.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

3294. Is she only 13 at the present time?—She is only 13 at the present time.

Mr. Stansfeld.

3295. In what year was this poor child of 13 practising prostitution?—At the present time.

3296. Do you mean to say she is only 13 now?—So I am informed.

3297. How long has she been practising prostitution?—A few months; she was living away from home, and the ladies in the Deaconess' Home have taken a wonderful interest in the girl, and have tried to reclaim her, but there is no doubt about the fact.

3298. Does not she look more than her age?—No, she does not look more than her age; she is a mere child to look at.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

3299. That girl would not be included in the return of 1880?—No, of course not.

Mr. Stansfeld.

3300. Have any efforts been made to reclaim her?—There have been; she has now returned to her home, but it is a very wretched home, so it is not saying much, but still she has returned home after living in a very questionable house.

3301. You do not give this as a case which ought to have been upon the register of 1880, because it could not have occurred till 1881?—
No,

18 April 1882.]

Mr. S. F. RIMBAULT.

[Continued.]

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

No, certainly not; I merely mention this as one of the nine cases I have marked off here.

3302. As an instance of precocious depravity?—Exactly.

3303. Now with respect to the rescue and reclamation of women, would you refer to Captain Harris's Report, page 4, column 13, "The number of prostitutes returned to friends;" do those numbers to your mind truly represent the number of women who have given up prostitution; are all the women who are recorded as returned to friends, after passing through the Lock Hospital, necessarily reclaimed?—Not by any means.

3304. That would very much depend, would it not, upon the character of their friends?—Very much indeed; I believe it is in many cases, because those poor girls have had such wretched homes and parents that they have turned out upon the streets; and therefore going back to those wretched homes may be only a renewing of the old course of life.

3305. Therefore what you would say is that a girl going back to her home and friends is not at all conclusive evidence that she has left the practice of prostitution?—Not at all.

3306. She may not have returned to the brothel from which she came, but she may have continued the vicious practice elsewhere?—That I have known in many instances.

3307. Often, I presume, to escape and evade registration?—That is the purpose of it.

3308. You have known cases of that kind?—I have known such cases.

3309. Then some again have married, but you tell us from your own knowledge that some of these women have continued the practice of prostitution after marriage?—That is so.

3310. Can you tell us, since May 1880, how many prostitutes have been rescued in Maidstone by means of the Deaconess' Institution and sent to other permanent homes or situations?—Thirty-nine.

3311. Has that been done with or without aid from the Contagious Diseases Acts police?—There are three cases included in which the Contagious Diseases Acts policeman was concerned in introducing the girls to the lady.

3312. That is three cases out of the thirty-nine?—Yes.

3313. Have the voluntary efforts of yourself and others in Maidstone to reclaim women been attended with much success?—With great success of late years.

3314. Of late years those exertions have been redoubled, have they not?—They have. Previously to the Act we had no Home, and there was no means of getting girls into a different way of life. If a girl was disposed to forsake her evil ways it was attended with the expense and inconvenience of bringing her to London; but now we have ladies locally established who give themselves specially to this work, and it is attended with the best results.

3315. How long has this Deaconess' Home been established?—These ladies have been resident in the town six or seven years, but they have only had a Home for two or three years.

3316. The figures you give us of prostitutes rescued begin from 1880, therefore may I take it 0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

that the ladies commenced in 1880?—No, they commenced some two or three years before that, but they greatly extended their operations about that time.

3317. Upon what class of women would you expect reclamatory efforts to have the best effect, upon the registered or upon the unregistered?—I consider the registered girls are very hopeless, and that any attempts to reclaim them would be very hopeless.

3318. Have you observed a distinct difference between the two classes?—A very distinct difference.

3319. The registered women are older, are they not?—They are older.

3320. They seem to be more bound to their profession?—They seemed at first to object to the working of the Acts, but now they seem to have become reconciled to it, and to have become hardened to it.

3321. Now, have you ever applied to the Contagious Diseases Acts police to help you in the work of reclamation?—I have.

3322. And with what result?—I have generally received a refusal; I believe the man that we have is a very careful man and a very efficient officer, and does his best in the very disagreeable work he has to do; and we understand each other perfectly well; but when I have asked him for co-operation, as for example, when I have had a midnight meeting of the girls and have asked him to give me a list because he might know some that I did not know, he has declined to do so, acting under instructions from his superior. I believe personally he would have done so, but he was acting under instructions, and in all cases where I have asked him for co-operation he has declined to give it.

3323. Not feeling himself at liberty to do so?—He has said that he was not at liberty to do so.

3324. As a matter of fact, have you received assistance from the Contagious Diseases Acts policemen in your work?—As a matter of fact I have.

3325. To any great extent?—Not to any great extent.

3326. In the three cases you have referred to which went to the Deaconess' Institution, the Contagious Diseases Acts police did give some assistance?—They did.

3327. Did you have such assistance given to you?—No; I conceive that the officers might render me important help, but I have had no help at all; that which I have referred to has been a matter simply between the ladies and this man.

3328. With regard to the effect of the Acts upon the morality of the men and the practices and habits of the young men, have you any evidence to give the Committee?—Yes, I have.

3329. Do you consider that the supposed safeguard from physical evil offered by the Acts has had a demoralising influence. I remember that soon after the institution of the Acts we had a public meeting, and I am quite sure that those young men who attended were demoralised by the information they received at the time. From conversation with them I judged that those young

young men, men of good position, were put in possession of information which they did not before possess, and they were greatly encouraged by it. I was perfectly astonished by the effect of it. I have a letter from a gentleman, an employer of labour, who confirms my impression upon that point.

3330. What is the date of that letter?—I am afraid the writer has omitted to put the date; but, at any rate, it was only received the other day.

3331. That letter confirms your opinion?—This is a letter from an employer of labour, a recent town councillor, confirming my own opinion.

3332. Does he confirm your opinion from his own experience and observation, or does he merely report what people have said to him?—From his own experience and observation of those in his employ, he has found that the operation of the Acts has been most prejudicial to the morals of young men, particularly to apprentices in his employ.

3333. Will you read the letter?—"Mr. Rimbault, Maidstone. Contagious Diseases Acts. Sir,—In answer to your inquiry, I can only say that I was a believer in this Act as a means to prevent immorality in a large degree; but from observation I am thoroughly convinced of its inadequacy to cope with the evil, and I believe that vice is encouraged in a large degree by the Act. I have overheard conversations among my own men, and especially the younger ones, viz., the apprentices, in which they have argued the safety provided by the examinations, and this has resulted in several cases of a most disastrous character in my own shops, and I am convinced, from my observation as house agent and builder, having to visit a great number of houses, that there is an increase of prostitution in this town of a character which cannot be dealt with by these Acts, and I shall by all means in my power agitate for their repeal.—Yours truly, Henry Bridge."

3334. Can you say, speaking of the state of opinion in Maidstone, that that opinion of the demoralising effect of the Acts is largely entertained among the respectable people who reside there?—I do not know that I can say that; I find that there are so few who seem to understand anything at all about it.

3335. You cannot tell the Committee what the general opinion amongst the more respectable classes is?—I cannot; of course I know that there is a very strong feeling amongst the particular circle of my own friends, but I cannot say that it is generally shared.

3336. Do you find that feeling largely existing among the religious bodies of Maidstone?—I find that the religious bodies are generally opposed to the Acts.

3337. And probably upon that ground?—Yes; probably upon that ground.

3338. And with a specific knowledge possibly upon the hygienic question; but judging it from a moral point of view?—Judging it from a moral point of view.

3339. And, with regard to the others, you have spoken of a great number who do not seem to have any opinion at all upon the subject; where you found no opinion, you would infer that there was no knowledge, I suppose?—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

3340. And no opinion followed as a matter of course?—I have been surprised to find that persons who ought to have understood it, clergymen, for example, have confessed to me that the thing was comparatively unknown.

Dr. Farquharson.

3341. You told the Committee that a considerable diminution of open vice had taken place in Maidstone by various agencies called into operation since the Acts have been established?—Yes.

3342. Could you explain why those agencies have acted with so much greater vigour since the Acts have come into operation than had been the case previously?—I cannot. I only know that it is the fact. I do not know whether it may not be perhaps that more attention has been called to that class of unfortunates since the application of the Act.

3343. At all events, it is since the Act has been established that you have observed this great diminution of open vice?—Yes, it is since the Acts have been established; but I do not say "this great diminution," because, although there has been a diminution, yet from what I see in walking through the streets, there is a great amount of depravity and open solicitation. Things are still bad enough, though there has been an improvement.

3344. I thought I gathered from your evidence that the machinery of the Acts had tended to this improvement?—I do not think I said that.

3345. You said the number of troops in Maidstone had largely diminished?—It had largely diminished.

3346. Has the population of Maidstone increased?—Yes, the population of Maidstone has increased.

3347. Do you think that the population of Maidstone have become more immoral than they used to be?—I do not know about that; I do not know that things have materially improved, but I would not say the people have become more immoral.

3348. Then I suppose the increase in the number of prostitutes would be just sufficient to meet the wants of the increased population of the town of Maidstone, that would be sufficient to make up for the smaller number of troops?—I do not quite follow your question.

3349. Assuming that the number of troops has decreased, but that the population has increased, would you consider that the increased amount of prostitution is more than may be accounted for by the increase of the population?—I think the increase of clandestine prostitution is out of proportion to the increase of population.

3350. Do you think the Acts have stimulated vice in Maidstone?—I do not know that they have stimulated vice in Maidstone, but they have certainly occasioned more secret vice.

3351. You do not think it probable that the young men in Maidstone know much about the Acts; I suppose many of them would never have heard about them?—I think they understand them pretty well.

3352. You

18 April 1882.]

Mr. S. F. RIMBAULT.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

3352. You had a meeting, had you not, at which they were discussed; what would you say has been the effect of that meeting?—I found that after that meeting the matter was talked about by young men, and young men of whom I had expected better things, gloried that such an Act had been introduced by the Government.

3353. But the larger number of young men who were not at the public meeting would know nothing about the Acts?—They would not, except by conversation.

3354. They would not have the opportunity of indulging in any reflection about the fancied security which came from the Acts; they would not have their tendencies to vice stimulated by the fancied security of Acts of which they knew nothing; is not that your opinion?—I think they understand the Acts generally.

3355. But I think you said there had been an increase in vice in Maidstone, because the young men fancied that they could indulge in vice in consequence of the Acts with greater security than they could have done before?—I do not know that I said that arose from the Acts.

3356. But even granting, for the sake of argument, that young men go to vice with greater facility on account of the fancied security afforded by the Acts, how does that tally with the great increase of clandestine prostitution; because the young men calculate upon a fancied security, from the fact of the women being examined, the clandestine women, as you know, are not examined; they have no clean bill of health to show?—That is so undoubtedly.

3357. I think you are of opinion that the Acts have had a deterrent effect upon prostitution?—I do not know an instance of it, but I can conceive that it is possible.

3358. Theoretically, is it possible?—Yes, theoretically.

3359. You think it might deter young girls who are just upon the verge of prostitution?—Yes, I know that young girls have a great horror of being put upon the register.

3360. And that would deter young girls just beginning?—Undoubtedly it would.

3361. Those girls who leave the town in order to avoid, as you say, the registration, might probably be supposed to leave the town with the view of giving up the profession of prostitution; is it in accordance with your experience that they do so?—I know two cases of girls who left the town with the view to avoid being put upon the register; but on Saturday week I spent some hours, between 8 and 11 o'clock, in walking the streets to see as much as possible, and I observed one of these girls, who assigned as her reason for leaving the town the fact that the Acts policeman had told her that if she did not mend her manners she would be put upon the register; therefore she left the town forthwith; and her mother said she did not know how or where she was living, or what had become of her. I followed this girl and traced her for two hours, and saw her conduct, and I have no doubt of her being a prostitute. I had known her to be in a brothel previously. I found this girl was living out of the town, but came to and fro, I have no doubt whatever for the practice of her profession.

0.75.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

3362. Have you known cases in which girls have given up public prostitution to go into clandestine prostitution, from the deterrent influence of the Acts?—No, I do not know that, except that those who have married avoided the register in that way, or by cohabiting with men.

3363. But you were asked by Mr. Stansfeld whether girls had gone off the register to clandestine prostitution?—I do not know of such cases.

3364. In fact, it would be very difficult, would it not, for a girl who had been once upon the register, so to conduct herself afterwards as to avoid being put upon the register by the police?—No, I do not think it would be difficult; she might cohabit.

3365. She might cohabit with one man?—Yes; but still from what I have noticed of them, I believe they are still common girls all the same.

3366. But the woman who cohabits with one man would not come upon the register?—No, that is so.

3367. Now with reference to the great discrepancy between the number of prostitutes registered, viz., 21, and those that you have yourself observed and listed, viz., 64; what kind of evidence do you go upon to find out that those girls are practising prostitution?—That is a very wide question, but I have gone individually into the cases, and the facts have come under my knowledge. For instance, a young man in my Bible class was inveigled away by a mill girl; many of those mill girls are clandestine prostitutes; they have very small wages, and they increase their income by a common life.

3368. But generally speaking does your evidence come from the girls themselves?—No, I get it in different ways; for instance, this young man in question used to spend his evenings with the girl remaining with her as late as 11 o'clock at night, and there was a bed in the room; the mother was living there, and the mother discovered them, and he confessed to me that he had had improper connection with the girl.

3369. In almost every case does the evidence come to you as conclusively as that?—In many cases it does.

3370. How do those girls manage to elude the observation of the Contagious Diseases Acts police?—I do not know how they manage it; I have called the attention of the police to girls who are perfectly notorious, but without result.

3371. Their sole reason, as they allege, for not putting the girls under the operation of the Act, is that the evidence is not sufficient?—That is so, but in one case a girl confessed to me her way of life. The girls, in this case, came from a family whose parents were dead; they lived alone, and they received young men into their place, and kept unreasonable hours, until two or three in the morning; in fact the character of the girls was perfectly notorious, yet the policeman said he could not find a case against them.

3372. That shows that, at all events, the police are very desirous to avoid any possibility of mistake?—I do not know about the police generally, but I certainly think that if our policeman errs

S

Mr. S. F. RIMBAULT.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

at all in the discharge of his duty, it is from an excess of caution.

3373. That is a very high testimonial from one in your position?—He is a very decent man, doing his work as well as he can.

3374. Now what kind of girls are those whom you have described as clandestine prostitutes: are they milliners, or what?—Many of them are mill-girls.

3375. And not living altogether by prostitution?—No, not living altogether by prostitution.

3376. Are they living with only one man?—No, most of them are living in a front room, with a bed in it, where they receive gentlemen.

3377. Now with reference to those girls whom you said your policeman would not bring under the operation of the Acts, was there any other evidence against them except their having been seen to go into the barracks?—They are known to all the fast young men, and the fact of their being in the officers' quarters is a matter of notoriety; I have had it confirmed to me by those connected with the barracks, and upon the best evidence. There has been a great deal of scandal about these girls.

3378. Is there a general hospital in Maidstone?—There is.

3379. Do they admit venereal cases there?—I do not know.

3380. You do not know whether any large number of girls apply for treatment there as corroborative evidence of your view upon that point?—I am not aware that they do.

3381. I did not quite gather how you connected the increase of juvenile depravity with the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I do not know that I did so connect it. I only say that I do not know that they have had any effect upon it.

3382. Would not the opportunity of the young to learn vice be diminished by not seeing it before their eyes?—I do not know that it is so much that, but the language of the youth of the town and their conduct is something dreadful.

3383. I think you stated that there was much greater difficulty in reclaiming the registered women than the clandestine?—That is so.

3384. I suppose the reason of that would be that the registered women would have been longer on their profession, and would naturally therefore be more hardened against any reclaiming influences?—That would no doubt be the reason.

3385. You stated that you had not received very much assistance from the efforts of the Contagious Diseases Acts police; but I presume they are under a difficulty about giving up the names; the police could not give up the names of the registered women without special authority?—I suppose not.

3386. And that would interfere with their desire to assist you, would it not?—I stated that if the object of the Acts was benevolent and reclamatory, they might by their communication with those engaged like myself as evangelists in the town, do a vast amount of good by assisting in young girls being reclaimed; but I have had no assistance of that kind.

3387. We have had evidence from yourself that the police do assist, as for example, by calling the attention of the ladies to the conduct of those girls whom you mentioned?—They are taken to the Deaconess' Home.

3388. And also there are a number of ladies connected with the working of Lock hospitals?—That is so.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

3389. I understand from the general tenor of your evidence, that you are of opinion that the Acts have not been carried out with sufficient strictness: would that be so?—I do not know about that; I merely spoke with regard to the man who is charged with that function, saying that he is a very cautious and respectable man of his kind and class.

3390. May I put it in this way, that if he errs at all, it is upon the side of caution?—That is so.

3391. Have you seen the instructions given to the metropolitan police as to interfering with women in the streets?—I do not know that I have.

3392. Are you aware that the metropolitan police who carry out these Contagious Diseases Acts, are instructed not to interfere with any woman unless they have such evidence of her prostitution as would enable them to establish a case against her before a magistrate?—Yes, I am aware of that.

3393. Therefore, of course, before they can interfere with any woman and bring her under the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts, they must reasonably satisfy themselves that they would be able to make out a case against her before a justice of the peace; would that be so?—Yes.

3394. That might account for some of the cases to which you referred not being taken up by the police?—Yes; but some of those cases to which I referred are cases in which there would be no difficulty in establishing the fact.

3395. You think that evidence such as you could command, at any rate, if adduced before a magistrate, would at once induce the magistrate to act against those women under the powers of the Act; would that be so?—Yes.

3396. To that extent you would say the police are slack or remiss in discharging their duties?—I do not object to that.

3397. You used the term clandestine prostitutes; may I ask you to define what you mean by clandestine prostitutes?—I simply mean those who succeed in avoiding the operation of the Act.

3398. That is to say you would apply that term to a woman who, if the Act were properly carried out, would be registered, but who in point of fact is not?—That is so.

3399. You do not apply it to a woman living with one man?—Certainly not.

3400. You would apply it to a woman who goes about soliciting prostitution but is fortunate enough to evade the clutches of the police?—That is so.

3401. Adopting that definition, would it not be impossible for many of those clandestine prostitutes

18 April 1881.]

Mr. S. F. RIMBAULT.

[Continued.]

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

titutes to escape contracting disease?—No, I do not know that.

3402. May I ask you how you account for the fact that those clandestine prostitutes who only differ from the registered prostitutes in the fact that they are not found out by the police, not only escape being found out by the police, but also escape the Lock Hospitals?—They go to private practitioners. There is one man in the town who takes up that particular line, and he told me that there was one of the registered girls who came to him after she had been discharged from the hospital, as although cured she still required medicine.

3403. You say these girls would not go to the Lock Hospitals?—Most of them would not be so poor as to require them.

3404. Then you are of opinion that these women who differ from the registered prostitutes only in the fact that they are not found out, if they contract disease, never go to the workhouse or to Lock Hospitals, but always to private practitioners for medical treatment?—I think so.

3405. Might I ask you upon what your opinion is founded?—From their position; they are not so degraded or so sunk or poor as the registered prostitutes. Most of them are, as I say, mill girls; some pretend to be dressmakers, and so on.

3406. Then those clandestine prostitutes, using your own words, are of a higher class?—They are of a higher class.

3407. And that would of course account for their being to a certain extent more accessible to the good influences which you bring to bear upon them; would not that be so?—Unquestionably.

3408. With regard to the register; that register is not, of course, open to inspection by the public?—Certainly not.

3409. It would be a clear breach of duty on the part of the police if they were to show the register to any outsider, or give any information as to the names and addresses?—I assume it would, but I am not aware of the fact.

3410. You have never seen it?—I have never seen it.

3411. Therefore, when you make this statement as to the 14 women you referred to being on the register, I suppose you took the statement from their own mouths?—They are so well known that there is no doubt about it.

3412. You assume it?—I know it upon that ground.

3413. You would not trust only to the statement of the women themselves; that might very likely be misleading; would a woman be likely to own herself to be on the register?—All these things are so perfectly well known; when they are ill, they send for me to their house; they receive me respectfully, and tell me what is going on.

3414. You admitted, to a certain extent, the deterrent effect of the Acts, did you not?—I do not admit that, because I do not know of any case where the Act has had a deterring influence, but I do not dispute the fact.

3415. Assuming that the Acts have a deterrent influence, should you not think that that deterrent effect would be more visible in the case of younger women who had not committed themselves yet, or were only, so to speak, on the verge of a life of vice?—Possibly.

0.75.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

3416. You spoke of the ages of some of these girls; but is there not a great deal of difficulty in ascertaining the ages of the women. When you say that one or two of these women were under 16 or 17 years of age, may I ask upon what data you proceed?—I know they are young, very young.

3417. But that does not tell you their age; you may know that they are young, but their appearance may in itself be deceptive?—But in many cases I do know their ages from their connections, their relatives, parents, and so forth.

3418. Do you take their ages from their own statement?—No, I take it from their parents and families.

3419. To bring it to a particular case, you stated that there were two girls under 16, whom you knew, as practising prostitution?—I know more than that; I think it probable, from what I know about them, that they are under that age.

3420. But take the individual cases to which you have referred specifically?—I referred to one in particular, a girl who I said was only 13.

3421. How do you know that the girl is only 13?—The Lady Deaconess Principal has more connection with that case than I have, and it is from her that I had it; and it was from the girl's mother that she had it; I can only give it in that way. The vicar of one of our churches is acquainted with the girl, but if it were said that she were a year younger I would not dispute it; at any rate she is very young.

3422. Now, you spoke of girls of 16; how do you know the age of these girls?—I was informed by the sister of one of these women that she was 22 years of age, and had been eight years upon the town; that is how I got that fact.

3423. I was referring more particularly to the cases in the year 1880; I think you stated, in contradiction, no doubt, to Captain Harris's report, that there were, to your knowledge, two girls of the age of 16 who were carrying on prostitution?—I have a memorandum before me of nine who are at the present time under 17 years of age.

3424. But what evidence have you of their being under 17?—From general knowledge and particular information.

3425. Do you speak from the appearance of the girls or from statements which they have made?—No, I speak in no case from statements which they have made, but from my own knowledge of them and from their parents' statements I have arrived at the age. There are some of those cases in which I have known the girls from little children; I have seen them grow up.

3426. But would that enable you to say whether a girl is under 17 or 18 at the present time?—No, not exactly; I could not do it with any precision, certainly.

3427. I am not putting this question to you at all offensively, but could you go into a court of justice and take your oath that such and such a girl was under or over 16?—No, certainly not.

3428. You were speaking about these public meetings

18 April 1882.]

Mr. S. F. RIMEAULT.

meetings that have been held under your auspices to protest against the Acts: I am afraid from what you said that the result of these meetings has rather been to advertise the Acts, has it not?—I am afraid so. Of course it did a certain amount of good, but it did a certain amount of harm at the same time.

3429. I think, as far as I understood you, that the way in which you say the Acts did harm was that they created an impression in the minds of the younger men that they might carry on their vicious practices with impunity, because they thought they would be safe?—Amongst many of them who have been at the meeting it was a matter of conversation for a week or two afterwards; it was the talk of the town. I gathered that the young men felt themselves encouraged, that it was a capital good thing. They argued that it was a necessity. They said, We cannot, most of us, afford to marry, and therefore it is very right that some provision should be made for young men like ourselves who cannot enter into married life.

3430. Do you know that it is generally said by the opponents of the Acts that these Acts do not make vice safe, that they rather have increased than diminished the existence of venereal disease?—I quite believe it.

3431. How do you reconcile that statement with the theory that the Acts have made vice safe, and that young men act upon that theory?—I think they are deceived by it.

3432. The young men attend these meetings, and assume, from what they hear there, that the Acts make vice safe, and that therefore they can sin with impunity; is not that a correct statement of what you have said?—Yes, that is so.

3433. I was under the impression, from the evidence which has been given before this Committee, and I think you rather lean to the opinion, that the view of the opponents of the Acts was that the Acts did not make vice safe?—That is so.

3434. And I suppose, at the meetings you have referred to, that view, like every other view which can be urged against the Acts, has been put forward?—No doubt.

3435. How do you reconcile the view put forward by the opponents of the Acts, that as a matter of fact they do not make vice safe, with the notion which seems to prevail amongst these young men whom you have described, that, provided they get hold of a registered woman, they would be safe from all consequences?—I do not feel called upon to reconcile it; I only observe it.

3436. But at all events we have it that, in the view of the opponents of the Acts, the Acts, so far from diminishing, have increased disease; on the other hand, we have the view that men are tempted, by the prospect of immunity from disease held out by the Acts, to proceed with their vicious courses, and I see a difficulty in reconciling these views?—I do not see that myself.

3437. Then will you kindly say how you reconcile them?—I do not believe they make vice safe, but I can quite believe that young men think so.

3438. In the face of the facts?—The young men do not believe the view put forward in opposition to the Acts, and they deny it.

3439. Do you not think they find out their mistake by bitter experience?—I believe they do, and by very bitter experience. I can state facts from my personal knowledge of a considerable number of young men, and very respectable young men; I hardly know one, amongst several I have in my mind, who has been free from venereal disease. I am sorry to say it, but still it is the fact, and I know it.

3440. That fact, coming from you, is a little inconsistent with the prevalence of the belief which that letter you have read certainly expresses, that in the opinion of the young men of Maidstone the Acts make vice safe?—That is the belief of the young men.

3441. But that belief, with a very little experience, will be dissipated?—That is so.

3442. You spoke of the public opinion in Maidstone upon the subject of these Acts; could you give us any idea at all what the opinion of the magistrates of the borough is?—I do not know that.

3443. Nor of the town council?—Of course I know the opinions of very many of them, but I cannot speak for the public opinion of them.

3444. Do you know what the opinion of the Members for the borough is?—I do not know that.

3445. Have you had any petitions from the borough?—Yes, we have had three or four against the Acts.

3446. You could not, I suppose, give me any idea from the signatures to those petitions as to the persons from whom the opposition to the Acts chiefly proceeds?—I do not know that I could give you any information upon that head.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

3447. Do I understand your view to be, that there are a great many more women practising prostitution in the town of Maidstone than are returned by the police?—Certainly it is.

3448. Will you kindly give me your opinion as to how it is that the police have not been able to discover those persons?—I cannot give it you; I do not know how it is, except that the policeman would not have the opportunities that I have of ascertaining the fact. I do not know how a policeman walking the streets could possibly know what is going on, because he has not the confidence of the people; he is rather shunned and avoided.

3449. But it is the duty of the policeman also to visit the brothels, is it not?—I believe so.

3450. And to take every precaution he can for the purpose of ascertaining who are prostitutes?—Yes.

3451. With regard to these women that you say are prostitutes, and are not registered by the police, where do they exercise their prostitution?—Generally speaking in their own homes; they generally occupy one room, a front room, in which there is a bed.

3452. How do they get their customers there?—Those women go to certain public-houses and places, of which there are several in Maidstone, which are resorted to by characters of that description,

18 April 1882.]

Mr. S. F. RIMBAULT.

[Continued.]

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

description, fast young men and women of that kind.

3453. You say that women go to the public-houses and exercise prostitution?—I do.

3454. Do you mean to tell me that when they go to exercise prostitution at the public-houses, they are not seen by the police?—I do not say that they go there for the purpose of exercising prostitution there, but for the purpose of getting hold of men.

3455. But what is that but exercising prostitution?—Yes, but not for the purpose of practising it in the house.

3456. You say that there are a very large number of women in Maidstone whose practice it is to leave their homes, and to entice or obtain customers, and take them home with them; do you mean to tell me that when a large number of women do that, they are not seen by the police?—They must be seen by the police.

3457. You say there are a large number of women who go out and obtain custom, and are seen by the police; then why do not the police have them registered?—That is a question I have asked the man himself, and he says he cannot get a case; simple suspicion will not do.

3458. I must ask you to answer me this question clearly: if there are a large number of women who are living by prostitution, and go out habitually into the streets, and bring customers home, and those women are not registered by the police, it is a distinct charge, in my opinion, of gross neglect against the police. What I understood you to say was this, that there were a number of women exercising prostitution, and living in private lodgings, and that those women went out into the streets and into the public houses, and there they obtained customers, whom they brought home with them; did you say that?—I did say that.

3459. I want to know how it is that those women have not been registered by the police; you do not appear to know?—I have nothing to do with it.

3460. If these women are in the habit of indulging in these practices, is it not clearly a neglect of duty on the part of the police not to have them registered?—I do not know that I ought to be called upon to answer this question, whether it is a neglect of duty or not; I do not blame the man for it.

3461. But is it not the duty of the police to register every woman who is exercising prostitution?—I know it is.

3462. Therefore, if they are not registered, is it not a clear neglect of duty on the part of the police?—Yes; but I have spoken to him again and again, and asked him why it was that these girls were not upon his books, and he said that he had not a case against them; he knew as well as I did that they were prostitutes, but that he had not sufficient proof of the fact, although he had no doubt of it.

3463. Did you tell him that you knew these women took men home with them?—I have told him more than that; I have told him here is a girl who has confessed to me that she is a prostitute, and yet she is not on the books.

0.75.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

3464. Is the man to whom you gave this information now acting as the inspector under the Contagious Diseases Acts at Maidstone?—He is.

Chairman.

3465. Is his name Wheatley?—It is.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

3466. You had given him this information, and his reply to you was that there was not sufficient evidence to place them on the books?—Yes.

3467. Did you frequently give him information of this sort?—I have on several occasions, and I have had the same reply.

3468. Then, as far as you know, there has been no very stringent application of the Act at Maidstone?—No, there has not.

3469. Did you ever hear any complaints of a woman being improperly charged with prostitution by the police?—Not since the present officer has been in Maidstone, which is now six years, but previously to that I had complaints made to me; I do not believe this man would commit himself.

3470. Did you ever hear any complaint of the molestation of a respectable woman?—I have when the Act was first brought into operation.

3471. How many years have passed since you heard any such complaint?—I have not for the last six or seven years heard any such complaint at all.

3472. Did I understand you to say that prostitution at Maidstone has increased considerably?—I believe clandestine prostitution has increased very much.

3473. And prostitution generally?—Yes.

3474. Has that anything to do with the Acts?—No.

3475. Has it nothing at all to do with the Acts?—I do not think it has.

3476. Then you spoke also of some indecent exhibitions which had taken place; I suppose you would not attribute those indecent exhibitions in any way to the Acts?—No; I merely refer to that to account for the precocity in vice, and the general depravity among the youth of the town.

3477. That is at Maidstone?—Yes; I can speak very strongly indeed upon that head.

3478. Is the Petition dated the 31st July 1879, the only petition which has been presented from Maidstone upon this subject?—No; there have been three or four; I do not know exactly how many.

3479. Is this the latest petition?—No, there has been one at least since then.

3480. And this petition, I observe, is signed by only 24 persons?—Those were persons present at a meeting; it was only persons of weight and position who were acquainted with the town, and spoke upon a certain point, whose signatures were appended.

3481. Do you know what was the last petition?—There was a ladies' petition; a meeting of ladies was held, and the petition was subscribed by several ladies, but I do not know to what extent.

3482. To your knowledge there has been no petition petition presented by any influential residents in the town of late years against the Acts?—I do not know that there has been anything very recent; I think there have been petitions extensively signed by influential persons in the town.

3483. But not of very recent date?—Not of very recent date.

3484. Not since that petition, signed by 24 persons?—Yes, there has been a ladies' petition.

3485. You say that the Act is not now at all repugnant to the class of people to whom it is applied?—Certainly not to the registered girls; they do not object to it, but they did very strongly at first.

3486. Have you any complaints of indecency in the streets where the examination room is situated?—No, I think the examination is conducted very quietly and properly as far as it can be.

3487. You have had no complaints?—No, I have had no complaints; the examination is not conducted in a public neighbourhood, it is right in the midst of where the girls live.

3488. You have not heard any complaints of indecent behaviour amongst the girls in passing backwards any forwards?—Certainly not.

3489. If there had been you would have heard of it?—Perhaps I might.

3490. But, at all events, it is not in a public neighbourhood at all?—It is not in a respectable neighbourhood at all.

3491. But no complaints have been made along the road where the girls would walk?—They would not have far to go, only a few doors.

Mr. Hanbury Tracy.

3492. I think you stated, in answer to the Judge Advocate General, that you inferred there was a good deal of misconception existing as to the security afforded by these Acts; and you stated also that a great number of young men had bitter experience that the passing of the Acts did not altogether prevent the spread of disease; the Judge Advocate General thereupon asked you whether, it being the fact that a certain number of young men obtained this bitter experience, it was not strange that the insecurity of the Act did not become more generally known. What I wish to ask you is this: do you think that those young men who are so caught by the disease are very careful to avoid letting other people know it; or do you think that those around them would have an opportunity of taking warning by their condition, and so letting other people know of the insecurity which existed under the Acts?—Certainly not because the matter would be kept secret.

3493. And you think that those young men would be very careful not to let the fact be known?—Certainly; those that I had in my mind were all most highly respectable gentlemen in their position in life.

Mr. Hopwood.

3494. They would feel it would be a disgrace to them to have it known, and therefore they would keep the fact secret?—That is so.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

3495. Therefore, as my honourable friend has asked you, it is perfectly consistent with the suggestion of the Judge Advocate General?—Certainly.

3496. You were asked whether there was any Petition presented lately, and you referred to the Petition of the 31st July 1879; that Petition is solely directed to one point, and that is to the Government figures as rendered in the Police Return?—Just so.

3497. And upon that point a meeting was called, and a number of gentlemen signed the Petition, attesting their belief that those figures were incorrect?—That was the point.

3498. And amongst those 24 signatures which we hear of there were some of men of the first consideration in the place?—There were assuredly.

3499. I observe the Vicar, the Rev. Thomas Harvey; the Unitarian minister, the Rev. Edward Grant; the Congregational minister, the Baptist minister, and then there is your name as town missionary, and a physician and surgeon, and a number of others of consideration and position?—They were people competent to speak upon the subject.

3500. And credible, on account of the position they fill in society?—Quite so.

3501. You have been asked whether there have been any petitions recently; is it understood that while this Committee is sitting, to a certain extent, petitions are stayed?—I do not know whether it is understood, but having petitioned in former years, we have not thought it necessary to petition again.

3502. This Committee has been sitting about three years; but would you have any difficulty in getting up petitions if you thought it needful?—Not at all; it would involve a great deal of trouble, but I could very easily get plenty of signatures, if needful.

3503. You have no doubt that there is a large body of opinion in the place adverse to the Acts?—Undoubtedly.

3504. You stated that the meetings gave information as to the supposed security which the Acts gave?—I did.

3505. Do you blame the promoters for those meetings?—Certainly not.

3506. Or do you blame those who passed such an Act of Parliament?—I do that; I have felt acutely the difficulty of dealing with the matter.

3507. You know it is generally understood, or supposed, that every man, woman, and child, knows the law?—That is so.

3508. We know it is not so, but still those who passed the law must have acted upon that supposition?—Yes.

3509. It may be one thing to hold out the expectation of safety, and another thing to fulfil it?—Quite so.

3510. Young men might believe they were safe, but you believe that they have found out to their cost, in a good many instances, that they are not safe?—That is so.

3511. As I understand, you believe that clandestine prostitution, if it has not increased, is largely

18 April 1882.]

Mr. S. F. RIMBAULT.

[Continued.]

largely existing in Maidstone?—I believe it has increased.

3512. Then you are supposed to charge the police with neglect of duty, but is it not the fact that these women to avoid the police are more careful in their conduct?—They are more careful certainly than they would otherwise be.

3513. Then, again, it is assumed that these women go into the streets to attract customers; I presume you will agree that there are a hundred ways of attracting customers?—In my walks on Saturday nights, which I have taken for a number of weeks in succession, for that is the evening when shopmen and other young men have money to spend, I have seen many phases of this vice. I recently saw a young man speak to a girl; I was within hearing distance, and I heard that girl try to beguile that young man, and he said, "I cannot to-night, I have not got any money; but I will meet you to-morrow night if you like." The policeman, or the bogey man as they generally call him in the town, is avoided; if they saw him, there would not be any solicitation, but if they do not see him, then there is the temptation to prostitution.

3514. Another effect of the Acts, as I understand, is that the known brothels containing five, six, seven, or eight girls, have been abolished?—Most of them have been; I only know of one or two at the most.

3515. The girls are distributed over the town?—They are, but they live mostly in the same quarter, generally two together or separately.

3516. And then they meet with their customers, wherever it may be, and bring them in on the sly?—They do, into their rooms.

3517. You have been asked about the reclamatory efforts which have been made in Maidstone of late years upon this matter; is it the fact that the passing of these Acts has drawn a great deal of public attention to this social question?—It has drawn a great deal of attention to it.

3518. And the strongest opponents of the Acts are greatly desirous of providing homes and means of reclamation without them?—They are.

3519. With regard to the rules of the police, you were asked whether you were aware that the rules of the police are so and so. Perhaps you are not aware that they are only dated the 2nd of June, 1881, and, therefore, what may have been the previous rules the Judge Advocate has not told you?—No, I confess that I know very little about it.

3520. Now, with regard to the age of these girls, and so on, have you taken all possible pains to ascertain it?—I have taken all possible pains to ascertain it, and, as I say, most of those girls have grown up within my own knowledge; I have seen them grow up, and therefore I can form an approximate idea as to their age.

3521. You can check statements in regard to them?—That is so.

0.75.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

3523. You were speaking about three young women who live in a family, and you were convinced that they lived this sort of life, and you spoke of having some conversation with the policeman upon the subject; did you say that those girls dressed as ladies?—They dressed as ladies, genteelly and quietly, not as fast girls.

3524. That is another mode of carrying on clandestine prostitution, by the modesty of the dress to avoid detection?—It is.

3525. You say that during the last six or seven years that the present inspector has been there, you have not heard any complaint of respectable women being molested?—I have not heard any complaint, and I should not have supposed that there was any ground for it at all.

3526. I suppose from the time when the policeman becomes acquainted with the appearance of all the ladies in the place, there is no danger; he is not likely to accost them?—I do not see how he can become acquainted with the appearance of all the ladies in a town of 30,000 inhabitants.

3527. But at all events he may get a general knowledge?—He may get a general knowledge.

3528. Since the present man has been appointed there have been no complaints, you say, of respectable women being molested; but prior to the appointment of the present policeman were there complaints?—Prior to his appointment there were.

Mr. W. Fowler.

3529. If I understand you rightly, if the police return which you have in your hands were taken up by any one not knowing anything about Maidstone, it would convey an entirely false impression about Maidstone?—I am sure it would, an utterly false impression.

3530. Something was said about the coincidence (which was the expression, I think, used by Dr. Farquharson) of the efforts used to reclaim these people, with the passing of the Acts; I understood you to mean, not that the Acts had caused it, except incidentally by calling attention to the condition of these people, more than it had been called attention to before?—That is so.

3531. It is very natural that the passing of the Acts should have called attention to great evils which otherwise would have been comparatively lost sight of?—No doubt.

3532. So that a person might say that the Acts had produced that incidental benefit which was never intended?—That is so.

3533. Something was said about these women to whom my honourable friend has referred, who dressed so quietly and at the same time were prostitutes; I understood you to say before, that they were well known in the town and were frequently at the officers' quarters?—That is so.

3534. So that their condition was in a certain sense notorious?—It is quite notorious; one person in every three would know about the condition and the particulars of these girls.

s 4

3536. Therefore

18 April 1882.]

Mr. S. F. RIMBAULT.

Mr. W. Fowler—continued.

3536. Therefore you did discuss the matter with him?—I did discuss the matter with him.

3537. Yet he felt that he had no sufficient case?—He thought that he had no sufficient case.

3538. There was a little ambiguity, I think, in another answer which you gave to Dr. Farquharson; he used the expression, I think, "the requirements of the population as regards prostitution;" you did not exactly mean to say that you regarded a certain number of prostitutes as required by the population?—Certainly not.

3539. But the matter was rather left in ambiguity; I want to ask you distinctly whether you hold that any such requirements exist?—Certainly not.

3540. You would regard the theory of a certain number of prostitutes being required for a certain population as monstrous?—Monstrous; I should be very sorry if anything went down which conveyed any such impression.

3541. I think you also expressed the opinion that as far as you could judge, the Acts had stimulated secret vice?—I understand so.

3542. I understand by that that the Acts have tended, as you thought, to make the women more careful and reticent in their conduct, but do you think also that the number of women who are acting clandestinely has increased?—The number has increased no doubt, but we have also a large number of mills in our neighbourhood, and those mill girls are much out in the streets; I have sometimes made myself useful in talking to the mill girls and fast young men, who sometimes conducted themselves very scandalously; they were not perhaps wicked, but they were foolish; and since the passing of the Acts those girls have been obliged to be more careful in their demeanour.

3543. You think that on the whole vice has increased, but is less flagrant in its character?—It is less flagrant, decidedly.

3544. It would not follow from that that the Acts had increased the total of vice, but had rather altered the character of it?—They have altered the character of it distinctly.

3545. Something was said about the effect of the meetings at which you were present; you stated that you felt great difficulty in making any reference in a public assembly to this question, and you stated that you thought some young men had got to know about it, who otherwise would not have known about it?—That was so.

3546. That was an incidental bad effect of having the meeting?—That was so.

3547. Upon that principle we should not discuss anything of this sort at all at a public meeting?—That cannot be; a meeting is a necessity.

3548. It is a public act done in a public assembly, and therefore is supposed to be a matter of public discussion?—That is so.

3549. And if an Act of Parliament is of such a nature that it corrupts the community to have it referred to, does not that rather imply that it is somewhat of a doubtful character in itself?—Unquestionably it does convey that to my mind.

3550. I think you also expressed the opinion that this view of the effect of the Acts and the corrupting influence of that view was general, that is to say, a great number of young men had been affected by that opinion?—I can say that a great many have.

3551. That would not apply only to the young men who were at that meeting?—It becomes a matter of conversation among the young men generally; those who were at the meeting would spread and ventilate the question.

3552. But do you not suppose that the fact of the new policemen coming to the town, and the examination house, and all that machinery, would be known and discussed whether that meeting had been held or not?—It would, undoubtedly.

3553. Where is your examining house; in what part of the town?—It is facing the gaol wall.

3554. Is it in a public road?—Yes, it is in a public road, but it is in a very disreputable quarter.

3555. There is another question which I should like to ask you with regard to the character of these women who have been some time registered; you stated that you thought they became hardened by time and by being so long under this system; but do not you think that the periodical examination has of itself a tendency to harden them?—It has, undoubtedly.

3556. Have you any evidence to give the Committee upon that point?—No, I have no evidence upon that point except that I can see it in those girls, that they become more and more deteriorated.

3557. You know they become more hardened, but you would not be able to say whether the deterioration arose from the examination. You have not conversed with the girls upon that point?—I have not.

3558. Then you stated that you thought the police might do a great deal of good if the object of the Act was benevolence?—Yes.

3559. But I suppose your view is that the object of the Act is not benevolence at all?—That is my view.

3560. But that the object of the Act is to provide improved health to the soldiers and sailors?—That is so.

3561. You said a good deal about the effect upon these young men, and I think the thing is now made pretty clear; but I wish to ask you one more further question upon the point: is it not perfectly consistent for a young man to think that a certain arrangement will be useful and protective, while at the same time, as a matter of fact, it will neither be useful nor protective?—Quite so.

3562. So that he would go on in a fancied security, and not in a real security?—I believe so.

3563. Would not the result be this, that the very thing which was intended to increase the health tended to diminish the health?—I believe so.

3564. Because a young man might be induced, or one might say almost tempted to an indulgence, which otherwise he would have feared, and so be led forward into great degradation, physically as well as morally?—Quite so.

3565. I understood you to say from your own personal

18 April 1882.]

Mr. S. F. RIMBAULT.

Mr. W. Fowler—continued.

personal observation that that was your opinion?—That is my opinion.

3566. The Judge Advocate General seemed to think that that was an inconsistency, because the young men would soon find out that they were mistaken, and would publish it over the world that the fancied security is a delusion?—That is out of the question.

3567. I suppose your young men, like other young men, are not very fond of talking about their complaints?—It would not be very likely.

Chairman.

3568. These young men that you had an opportunity of knowing, who caught the disease, were young men of a respectable class?—They are quite respectable and well-connected young men.

3569. And pretty well known in the town?—Yes.

3570. And they knew the town pretty well?—They did.

3571. And I suppose they associated generally with what one may call the better class of prostitutes?—Yes.

3572. With some of the clandestine prostitutes?—Yes.

3573. You are not able to fix the disease of these young men upon the registered prostitutes? No, I do not think they would have made use of them.

3574. Will you look at this Paper (handing a paper to the Witness), and tell me whether the first name is that of one of the girls with regard to whom you spoke specially to the police?—Yes.

3575. Did the police then tell you that they would watch this girl?—No.

3576. Did they tell you that they had watched her before?—They had watched her; they had been looking after her for some time.

3577. Now look at the three lower names; were those the names also of girls whom you mentioned to the police?—Yes.

3578. And did the police say that they had watched them too, or that they would watch them?—The second name the policeman told me he had watched, but he could not detect anything; he did not know anything about her; he had watched the house and saw nothing, that is all.

3579. Did the police on any occasion decline, or tell you that they would not watch girls whom you pointed out to them?—No.

3580. You found no unwillingness on the part of the police?—No, not at all.

3581. But they expressed to you the great difficulty they felt in bringing those girls within the jurisdiction of the Acts?—They did.

3582. Did they tell you that there were many other women throughout the town with regard to whom they felt the same difficulty?—Something to that effect.

3583. You spoke about married women carrying on a life of prostitution; do you mean by that, married women seeing some one man beside their husband, or really plying the trade for gain?—I do not mean seeing merely one man beside their husband, but really trading with gentlemen.

0.75.

Chairman—continued.

3584. Were those married women generally of a low class?—No, not particularly of a low class.

3585. They were living with their husbands, were they not?—They were living with their husbands.

3586. I think you stated that in some cases these women were carrying on this trade with the connivance of their husbands?—Yes; certainly.

3587. Do not you think it would require very great caution and a very clear case to justify the police in endeavouring to put such women upon the register?—Certainly; I do not see how it is practicable for the police to interfere in such cases at all; I do not see how they can cope with them.

3588. You had some of these conversations with the Contagious Diseases police in Maidstone before the year 1881, as to the number of women who remained off the register?—I had.

3589. Did you understand from them then that they were acting under orders in avoiding taking up girls without certain information?—I do not know that anything was said about orders; I do not remember that.

3590. But they appear to have clearly defined ideas that they should be able to prove certain things before they could proceed?—That is so.

3591. I suppose there was always some clandestine prostitution about Maidstone, even before the passing of these Acts?—Certainly.

3592. When were the mills you speak of established?—I cannot say; but they have been there for many years; I refer to the paper mills.

3593. Before the Acts were passed did you occupy yourself as specifically and as pointedly upon the subject of the reclamation of these fallen girls?—No, I had rather avoided visiting those parts where the girls were, for the simple reason that we had no facilities at that time for their reclamation.

3594. Then, as I understand, it is since the passing of the Acts that your attention has been directed to the amount and the nature and character of the prostitution?—More especially.

3595. Therefore you cannot speak with reference to the clandestine prostitution, and its amount and nature, before the Acts were passed with the same accuracy and certainty that you can now?—I think I can.

3596. But you had not the opportunity of inquiring into it?—We are speaking now of clandestine prostitution, and not with regard to the regular and common women.

3597. Did you go amongst them?—I went amongst them in the natural course of my work.

3598. Did you pay the same attention to the observation of clandestine prostitution before the Acts were passed as you have done since?—Perhaps I did not pay quite so much attention to it; I think I have given more attention to it since.

3599. Therefore you could not speak with quite the same accuracy as to the amount of clandestine prostitution before the Acts as you can since; you had not the same amount of observation to go upon?—Perhaps not quite; but in my regular work I keep a record of the names of parties whom I visit to assist my memory, and I had just the same opportunities before the Act of knowing the facts as I had subsequently.

3600. I will ask you one more question; I should like to know if you think that the whole of the class of prostitutes who go with soldiers, as a rule, get registered, or does that class manage to escape registration in any number?—No, that is the class which is registered.

Mr. Stansfeld.

3601. Then I understand your view to be this, that you do not find fault with the police for not having put upon the register the kind of women to whom you have referred?—Certainly not.

3602. What you would gather is, that they might resist, and the police might be unable to prove a case?—That is so.

3603. With regard to the more regular and poorer kind of prostitutes, they do not afford such resistance?—That is so.

3604. Therefore it would come to what you have said, that by the force of the Acts you get one class of prostitutes upon the register and not another?—That is it.

3605. And however clearly that may be explained, and however easily understood, that is not a carrying out, is it, of the object of the Contagious Diseases Acts, the object of the Contagious Diseases Acts being to place the names of all known common women upon the register, and that, as you know, is the instruction to the police; practically they fail, though you do not find fault with them for failing, but they do fail in their duty?—That is what I wish to convey.

3606. In the course of your experience, have you not in your own mind compared the aspect and manner of the elder and more hardened registered prostitutes with the younger prostitutes and the clandestine prostitutes?—Yes.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

3607. Of which of the two classes should you entertain the greatest hope of reclamation?—I have very little hope of the older ones.

3608. Whether registered or not?—Whether registered or not.

3609. But I think I understood you to express the opinion that the registered women were older?—I think they are.

3610. We have it before us, and probably you are aware that the Returns show a constant tendency to an increase in the age of registered women?—That is so.

3611. Therefore, if the effect of the Acts were confined to increasing the average age, that would deteriorate the quality of the women and the chance of reclamation?—Undoubtedly.

3612. Would your opinion upon the subject of reclamation be that the quasi sanction on the one hand, and the fortnightly examination on the other, would be likely to have a hardening influence upon the women?—I think it would have a very hardening influence upon the women.

3613. The Reverend Flavel Cook, who is chaplain to the Lock Hospital in the Harrow-road, was examined before this Committee, and in answer to the question of the Judge Advocate General, "What distinction is there between the two classes" (that is to say, the registered and non-registered)? he says, "The distinction is this, and I think it is obvious to almost anyone, at first sight, that the Government patients are horribly alike at one dull dead level. The ordinary patients are very mixed, some of more and some of less education, some of more and some of less refinement of appearance, but the Government patients are brutalised beyond description in appearance and in manner;" now does that statement tally with your impression?—It entirely agrees with my own experience.

Mr. O'Shaughnessy.
Mr. Stansfeld.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. DANIEL COOPER, called in ; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

3614. ARE you Secretary to the Society for the Rescue of Women and Children?—I am.

3615. Where is your chief office?—85, Queen-street, Cheapside.

3616. How long have you been secretary to that society?—For nearly 30 years.

3617. Since the formation of the society, I presume?—Yes.

3618. In what year was the society formed?—In 1853.

3619. What is the object of that society?—The rescue of young women and children; that is of fallen and unfallen, their general care, and to ultimately place them out in society, as well as to bring them to a sense of themselves, and to God.

3620. Then what I understand is that you direct your operations with regard to the interest of two classes of young women, first the fallen, and secondly, those whom you think are in danger of falling into vice?—Certainly.

3621. You make such provision I presume without any limit of age with regard to the persons concerned?—It is not quite without limit; we do not think it advisable to take prostitutes of mature age because of their unsusceptibility generally. We make exceptions to that rule, but our general rule is not to receive fallen women above a certain age.

3622. You prefer the young as being more reclaimable?—We do.

3623. But I was thinking of another side of the question; do you make any special provision for very young girls; I mean more special provision than any other rescue society make?—I am not aware of any special provision whatever made by any rescue society either in London or throughout the country for young fallen girls; but we have two homes set apart for those, one for children of under 12 years of age, and another for those from 12 to two or three years older, say from 12 to 16.

3624. Your experience has led you to make that special provision?—Yes, it has.

3625. You did not begin with making it, did you?—We did not; but in the course of our operations we found the extreme difficulty of mixing the very young fallen girls with those of maturer years, so that we made that provision.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

3626. Who is the president of your society?—The Earl of Shaftesbury.

3627. I gather that you divide the objects of your care in the homes in which you place them; you have a certain number of those homes?—Yes, we have 11 homes; 10 of them are situated in the suburbs of London, except the temporary home in the City, and one is the seaside home at Ramsgate.

3628. Besides the temporary home you have 10 homes, in which the inmates are classified in the neighbourhood of London and the Convalescent Home at Ramsgate?—That is included in the 10.

3629. Then you have a voluntary Lock Hospital; where is that?—At Hampstead; that is included in the 10 homes; the hospital is combined with a home; the patients are transferred from the hands of the medical man to the home department when well enough to take their share in the ordinary routine duties of the home.

3630. Is the Lock Hospital attached to a home?—It is; it is in the very same house, indeed.

3631. Are those homes all for fallen women?—No; we have five for the unfallen; but they are about equally divided.

3632. The total number is 11, is it not?—I think we have five houses for the unfallen. Then the Ramsgate Home, the seaside home, is for either class, in the case of those who have been restored to morality.

3633. You find the class of lower domestic servants very liable to go astray, do you not?—Yes; we find that they are a very large percentage of those who have gone astray.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

and supposing that statement to be corroborated by any other evidence.

3635. You do not enter into any inquisitorial investigation with respect to the truth of their statements?—We do not make any medical examination of the girls; we avoid that.

3636. You think it a part of your duty, however, closely to criticise the statements of the women?—Both of the fallen and of the un-fallen; and we endeavour to show them the benefit of telling us the truth upon their first application to us, and we endeavour also to show them that we are their friends, and to get them to tell us the whole truth, however much it may appear at first to make against them.

3637. What do you call the homes for the fallen?—The rescue homes as against the preventive homes.

3638. What is the amount of accommodation in the rescue homes?—We can receive into the rescue homes about 100; an equal number for each.

3639. What is your total of accommodation?—We can accommodate 200.

3640. I presume you do not always have that number?—No, we do not. I am sorry to say we are sometimes deficient in funds (though I have not any complaint to make against the public in that respect), and our reception of inmates is limited accordingly.

3641. Am I right in assuming that if your homes are not full, whenever that happens it is in consequence of insufficient support by the public, and not of the want of applications?—Decidedly so.

3642. How many have you in the homes now?—I think there are about 160 or 170.

3643. Do you receive any aid from Government?—Not any whatever.

3644. There is such a thing as aid given by the Government to rescue societies, is there not?—Yes; I think the sum given by Government is half-a-crown a week.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

3645. To whom is that given?—I think it is given by the Government to societies or institutions receiving women from Lock hospitals; it is not given independently of the Lock hospitals.

Mr. Stansfeld.

3646. I know there is in the Navy Estimates a sum voted for that purpose; are you aware of that?—I did not know it.

3647. Have you ever been asked to take women from the Government lock hospitals?—Repeatedly; but not always directly. We had an application, years ago, from Dr. Barr, but we refused on principle as not approving of the principle of the Acts. On the contrary, we entirely disapprove of the principle of the Acts.

3648. And upon that ground you refused the application?—We refused the application upon that ground.

3649. But does it follow that you have never treated or reclaimed registered women?—I cannot say that. I was about to say that they have been, in some individual instances, smuggled into our homes; that is to say, they have been got into our homes by indirect means without, to our knowledge, the intervention of the officials under the Acts.

3650. By which, I understand you to mean, that benevolent persons in certain subjected districts have introduced those cases of registered women to you without saying they were registered, and thereupon you have taken them in?—Yes, that is correct.

3651. So that you have some experience of registered women?—A very large experience.

3652. Do you employ agents to collect these cases that come before you?—We do not; we have never found it necessary to employ any one to bring those cases to us; they have always been far more numerous than we could receive.

3653. What kind of persons have recommended those cases to you?—The persons who have recommended those cases to us have generally been benevolent persons, missionaries, Scripture readers, and much more largely individuals not holding any official position. At one time the women sent to us were chiefly from chaplains of gaols and clergymen and others holding an official position; private individuals seemed afraid to put their hands to the work, but now the spirit of benevolence, philanthropy, and Christian feeling, I believe, has pervaded the minds of people, so that persons generally holding no official position have been largely occupied in sending the women to us. I find that distinctly to be the case in comparing the reports of a quarter of a century ago with our present reports.

3656. Now, referring to your experience, can you give the Committee any fairly accurate idea of the age at which, to the best of your information and belief, the fallen girls who have come into your institution may be believed to have gone astray?—I have not any information apart from the report. I can just quote from the last report. We, making provision especially for the younger class of fallen women and of girls, have received a very large number of very young girls. Quoting from the last report, I find that 14 fallen girls were received under 15 years of age, and 149 from 15 to 20 years of age; calculating the whole number, 67 were from 20 to 25 years of age, and 24 were above the age of 25.

3657. That is the age at which you receive those cases?—It is.

3658. But my question rather was with regard to the time at which they first went astray?—That I can answer, too.

3659. Judging

21 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

3659. Judging from their own statements mainly, would you be prepared to say that at whatever age your society has received them your experience would show that more than half of them had gone astray under 18 years of age?—Yes, we give yearly tabulated statements; there is one in the report you have of the ages at which these very women to whom I have referred went astray.

3660. And you would still say that more than half go astray under the age of 18 years?—Yes, decidedly.

3661. One of your homes I think you say is for fallen children, if one may use the expression (outraged children I would prefer to call them), up to the age of 12 years?—Yes.

3662. How many have you generally in that home?—We have accommodation for 15 or 16; I think there are 14 now in the home.

3663. What is the total number of females received into your home since your society began its operations?—11,538. If you wish me to divide the fallen from the unfallen, I find that the fallen numbered 8,071 and the unfallen 3,467.

3664. Can you give the Committee a return of the number of women and girls received into your homes, and those applications which were rejected during the whole period of the existence of your society?—Yes, I have a Return here which I can hand in, Return No. 1. (The Return was handed in.) 3665. I observe from that Return that the number of applicants has diminished during the last 20 years?—That is so.

3666. In 1860, what was the number of applicants?—The total number of applicants was 1,487.

3667. And what was the number in this last year, 1881?—Seven hundred and fourteen.

3668. That in fact is about one-half?—Yes.

3669. To what do you attribute that reduction?—I think I may attribute it generally, as far as our observation goes (and the judicial statistics support that observation), to the decrease of prostitution generally.

3670. The figures you gave me were the applications, were they not?—They were the whole applications, including those received.

3671. The number you gave of 1,487 in the year 1860, and 714 in the year 1881, were the number of applications only?—Exactly.

3672. Of course, the number of cases that you could receive would be limited by reference to your accommodation?—Yes.

3673. Has your accommodation been pretty nearly the same for the last two years?—I think it has.

3674. Those applications, do I understand you to say that, taking the total period, 8,071 you classed as fallen, and 3,467 as unfallen; is that so?—It is.

3675. What is the tendency as between those two classes; to an increase of the number of unfallen or of fallen women?—To an increase in the number of unfallen women decidedly.

3676. That is to say, of late years?—Of late years.

3677. And you are inclined to attribute the decrease in the number of applications of women fallen, or in danger of falling, a good deal to the decrease of prostitution itself?—I am; I do not say entirely to the decrease of prostitution; other agencies may have provided for a larger number than we have.

3678. Or the vicious life in either sex may have taken a different form?—It may have.

3679. But, on the whole, I understand this to be your view, that you are disposed to believe that there has been a certain improvement in that respect in society during the last 20 years?—Undoubtedly. I am supported in that view by I think I may say all the agencies of a like character in London; they are impressed by their own observation more I think I may say than by the Government figures, the Judicial Statistics.

3680. Then do I understand you as feeling entitled or able to say that the opinion you have just expressed as to the reduction or diminution of prostitution of late years is shared by those interested in other societies?—It is.

3681. You say it is confirmed by the Judicial Statistics?—It is.

3682. Have you the figures of the Judicial Statistics?—I have extracts from the Blue Books from 1862 to 1870, showing the figures issued by the Home Office.

3683. What was the number of prostitutes and brothels in the year 1862?—In the year 1862 there were 29,956 prostitutes; no record is given of the number of brothels.

3684. That is in the whole of England?—It is.

3685. What was the number in 1863?—In 1863 there were 28,800 prostitutes, and the number of brothels was 7,204.

3686. What was the number in 1864?—In 1864 there were 28,094 prostitutes and 7,092 brothels.

3687. And in 1865?—In 1865 the number of prostitutes was 27,548 and 6,949 brothels.

3688. And in 1866?—In 1866 there were 25,914 prostitutes and 6,811 brothels.

3689. What was the number in 1867?—In 1867 there were 25,619 prostitutes and 6,614 brothels.

3690. And in 1868?—There were 25,627 prostitutes and 6,482 brothels.

3691. What was the number in 1869?—In 1869 the number of prostitutes was not given, but the number of brothels was 6,287.

3692. What was the number in 1870?—In 1870 the number of prostitutes was not given; that information ceased to be given in 1868; the number of brothels was 6,000.

3693. Is that the last return of the number of brothels?—No, I suppose it continues as regards brothels, but I have not carried the investigation further.

3694. Then I understand that the annual Judicial Statistics ceased to give the number of prostitutes after the year 1868?—That is so.

3695. What are the official statistics furnished by the metropolitan police for London?—I have not got them in so much detail, but I have some figures here going back to the year 1841. The number of brothels in London was then 3,325, and of prostitutes 9,419; in 1857 there were 2,825 brothels, and 8,600 prostitutes; in 1868 there

Mr. COOPER.

[Continued.]

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

there were 2,119 brothels, and 6,515 prostitutes.

3696. Where do you get those figures from?—From the Judicial Statistics.

3697. And during those periods there had, of course, been a very large increase in the population of London?—A very large increase.

3698. Did the area remain the same to which those figures applied?—Quite so.

3699. And you are inclined to hope, and I understand to believe, that the very great efforts which have been made during the last 20 years or so by benevolent people to reclaim women, and to check immorality, are entitled to some share in this apparent improvement?—I think the rescue societies, and those co-operating with them, comprehending a very large number of people, are entitled to a very large share, the largest share I may say, of the credit of these results; but I cannot exclude the many other agencies which have been at work, the tendency of which must have been of the same character; I refer to education, the suppression of drunkenness, and other means.

3700. Then I will put it in this way to you: I understand your view to be that the efforts at reclaiming these women who have fallen, and preventing the falling of girls who are in danger, you think has resulted in a diminution of the number of women living the life of prostitutes?—Yes, that is so.

3701. You consider that there is a large class of girls who would be in very great danger but for these efforts?—Yes, and I may say that we find the greatest source of temptation to young girls to be in the large number of fallen women; fallen women are a greater cause of leading others astray than any other cause, in fact than a large number of other causes; when we have made an analysis we have found that to be the result.

3702. The girls have attributed their first fall to the temptations offered by women already fallen?—Not the indirect temptations, but the actual inducements and persuasions, leading them astray.

3703. In what way have the efforts of benevolent persons of late years checked that dangerous tendency?—It is a very large question; it does not consist merely in the efforts which have been made to get them into homes, but in the wide philanthropic spirit which has actuated many persons in sheltering and befriending those poor girls. If a girl has not been long doing wrong we find persons willing sometimes to take into their houses such girls under certain restrictions. I may say that during the last 38 years I have never had, in my house, a girl of wholly good character, and I have never suffered from it except from the loss of some small articles of clothing possibly.

The Committee Room was cleared. On resuming,

3704. You have shown us from the Judicial Statistics that throughout the country, as well in the unsubjected as in the subjected districts, there has been a diminution in the number of prostitutes and brothels within the last 20 years; and you have assigned certain causes which we heard with interest, as suggesting themselves to you from your experience in the matter; but now I will pass from that question of the cause of this decrease to ask you to make a comparison between the subjected and unsubjected districts. Have you found in the subjected districts a diminution of the same character and amount as in the unsubjected districts?—Not in prostitution, as a whole.

3705. You are familiar with Captain Harris's figures, are you not?—I have not seen Captain Harris's figures for some years, but I know that they are in existence.

3706. You know they show a diminution in the number of regular prostitutes at a greater rate than the Judicial Statistics show?—I do.

3707. Do you feel enabled to express a confident opinion as to the progress of the decrease of prostitution in the subjected districts, including not only the registered, but the unregistered prostitutes?—From having had numerous women from the subjected districts, and coming into contact, in the aggregate, with a large number of people living in those districts, I feel able to state, and I do state, my belief that there is no real decrease in the actual number of prostitutes in the subjected districts, in proportion at least to the corresponding decrease in places not subject to the Acts.

3708. There is a larger decrease, that we know; if we compare the registered prostitutes year by year since the passing of the Contagious Diseases Acts with the Judicial Statistics year by year, there is a larger decrease in the number of these registered prostitutes in subjected districts than in the known common women in places not under the Acts?—Yes.

3709. But you say that there is not a larger but a less decrease in the amount of prostitution in the whole?—That is my general opinion.

3710. Now let me take your own society; you have received a number of women and girls, have you not, from the subjected districts?—We have.

3711. Between the year 1853 and 1870, or I will take it from 1870, after the Acts were in full operation to 1881; can you give me those figures?—We have received from the subjected districts from the year 1870 to 1880 inclusive, 921 women and children; of those 685 were of the fallen class and 236 were of the unfallen class; the latter would be subject to some reservation. I have the return here, No. 2, giving the statement; it shows the number received year by year, making a total of 921. (The same was handed in.)

3712. What have you to say about those figures year by year; on the whole do they lead to any conclusion?—They lead to the conclusion that there is a large amount of clandestine prostitution, or, more correctly speaking, of unregistered prostitution.

3713. That there is a large amount of it?—A considerable amount.

3714. Let us try and carry it a little further; have you a return showing a division of the fallen women received from the subjected districts into two classes, registered and unregistered?—I have.

3715. What is that; is that your Return No. 3?

21 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

[Continued.]

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

No. 3?—Yes, return No. 3. (The Return was handed in.) 3716. Will you give the Committee a summary of the figures contained in that return. During the 12 years from 1870 to 1881, inclusive, you received 327 registered women and 358 unregistered, did you not?—Yes, we did.

3717. But they were all fallen women from the subjected districts?—Yes.

3718. There are more unregistered, therefore, during the experience of the last ten years, than of registered prostitutes?—Yes; and the last column of this return shows that of the unregistered women 65 were actually diseased at the time they came to us.

3719. I presume you have classified them as registered and unregistered upon the strength of their own statements?—Not entirely; we have taken their statements, corroborated so far as could be by other evidence, the evidence chiefly of those who had sent them, together with the evidence of the matrons after they had come under our care.

3720. Are you prepared to say that it has been your habit to make a careful inquiry, as far as you have had the means, before you have classified them in those two columns?—Yes, I am prepared to say that.

3721. Are you prepared to show your books, if called upon?—I am.

3722. And you are not only willing but desirous that they should be compared with the police registers of those protected places?—We are quite willing that that should be done.

3724. Therefore, you say that they have either found it practically impossible to carry out the Contagious Diseases Acts, and to insert the names and addresses of all common women upon the register, or that they have purposely excluded half of those women?—Yes; I am strongly inclined to think that since efforts have been made for the repeal of those Acts, there have been means devised for excluding them from the register.

3725. That is an opinion or suspicion; but what I want to ask you is this: if your figures are correct, they point, as far as your experience goes, to an amount of unregistered prostitution rather greater than the amount of registered prostitution in the subjected districts?—Quite so.

3726. I do not say they prove it, but they point to it?—That is so.

3727. And I understand your argument to be this, that they are proof that the registers are not what the Acts intended them to be, complete; that they must be incomplete, either because the police could not complete them, or were not willing to do so?—Quite so.

3728. You are aware, are you not, that the 0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

register is made up to the end of each year?—I am.

3729. And therefore, possibly, there may be women upon the register during the year whose names are, for some reason, removed, upon or before that day in the year when the numbers are taken?—It may be so.

3730. In the first instance, is it within your knowledge that, in the course of a year, very young girls may come under the view of the police; but that they may be removed either by the action of the police, or of benevolent persons, from a life of early vice; and if they are removed before the last day of the year, their names never appear, and they will not add to the number of persons of a given age upon the register of vice in those localities?—I presume that is so.

3731. We have had it in evidence; I might perhaps as well refer you to the evidence of Inspector Anniss at Question 3853. Will you just read the question and answer?—The question was, "Then am I to understand that these figures are the figures simply of those who remain on your books until the end of the year?" and his answer was, "Of everyone who is in the district at a given time, whatever the time might be, if I took the names to-day, whatever the number might be, the return would contain the whole of every age. (Q.) What would be the date of that Return?—(A.) The annual return is at the end of December; 52 weeks."

3732. Will you have the kindness to read the next question and answer?—"And it describes the state of things which exists at that moment of time. (A.) Yes."

3733. Now you said that of the 358 unregistered women, 65 were actually diseased when they applied to be taken into your homes?—Yes.

3734. Did any others of them state that they had been previously diseased?—Yes, I think (I have the number somewhere) that it was 18, but that would be an imperfect return, because we do not question them so closely with regard to that point; but I know that there was a considerable number.

3735. What is the number?—I am not sure, because I have not the return here.

3736. But those figures that you have just given us suggest to your mind, do they not, the especial danger, from a hygienic point of view, of this clandestine prostitution?—Undoubtedly.

3737. Now in that return No. 3, the proportion of registered and unregistered is slightly altered there; the registered are fewer in later years, and the unregistered increase contemporaneously. In 1870 you give the number of registered women as 60, and in 1881 it is reduced to six; will you give the Committee the reason of this exceptional decrease in the number of registered women received into your homes?—We came to the conclusion that the women on the register were so injurious in influence, were such a source of mischief, and were the means of leading others astray by taking them to the subjected districts, that we felt obliged, with very great pain, to exclude applications of that character, and to direct our attention more particularly, and more largely, in favour of receiving those who had not gone wrong.

3738. I presume that your experience led you to

21 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

to prefer to receive those who were not registered?—Quite so.

3739. Not only those who had not gone wrong, but those who were not registered?—Yes; I am glad to be allowed to correct my answer by that addition.

3740. Can you name the time when you came to that determination?—It was a gradual determination; just in proportion as the difficulty came upon us did we form the determination to exclude the registered women. That was in some measure contemporaneously with the Acts; the longer the Acts had been in existence, and the more the women had become familiar with the operation of the Acts, the more hardened and less susceptible of impression they had become, and the more dangerous to the young women already in the homes.

3741. I presume you would attribute that hopeless character and those injurious influences very much to the length of time the women had been practising their profession?—To a large extent, and more especially in the subjected districts.

3742. Now with regard to that question of age, can you give the Committee a return?—I have a return, No. 4, showing the comparative ages of the fallen women, registered and unregistered, comprised in return, No. 3.

3743. From all districts in the aggregate?—That is so (the same was handed in).

3744. Will you summarise the return. I think you have already told us that during that period you have received 327 registered fallen women and 358 unregistered fallen women?—Yes.

3745. Of the 327 registered women, how many were more than 21 years of age when they came to your homes?—The number above the age of 21, of the registered women, was 121, and of the unregistered, 68.

3746. One hundred and twenty-one out of the 327 registered women were above 21 years of age, and 68 out of the 358 unregistered fallen women were also above that age?—That is so.

3747. The numbers under the age of 21 were 206 registered and 290 unregistered?—Yes.

3748. And what you would desire to point out in those figures is, is it not, the greater age of the registered women?—Yes.

3749. And that is shown in this return, No. 4, in the columns taking them year by year?—It is.

3750. Then you have another return, No. 5; what is the object of that return; I think that return simply shows it district by district?—Yes, it shows the districts from which they came.

3751. What districts did they principally come from?—They came principally from Devonport, (inclusive of Plymouth), Woolwich, Colchester (I am giving them in the order of the number as nearly as I can), Canterbury, Southampton, and Portsmouth.

3752. Devonport and Woolwich stand high in the list, do they not?—Devonport stands the highest, and Woolwich the next (the same was handed in).

3753. Now, take Devonport; what is the total number of females there?—One hundred and ninety-five both registered and unregistered.

3754. Of whom how many were under 21 years of age?—One hundred and twenty-four.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

3755. From Devonport you received 195 females fallen, registered and unregistered, of whom 124 were under 21 years of age?—Yes.

3756. That is equal, is it not, to 63 per cent. of the whole?—It is.

3757. Will you compare that with Inspector Anniss's figures; have you his Table, Appendix, 1881, No. 466; will you look at that return and say if it does not give, for the year 1881, the percentage of prostitutes in Devonport under 21 years of age at 15·69?—It does.

3758. Your return is for the whole of those 12 years, is it not?—Yes.

3759. Not for the year 1881, but for the years from 1870 to 1881?—Yes.

3760. And you make the per-centage 63 per cent.?—Yes.

3761. Now will you compare your return with Captain Harris's return, No. 2, as to the Devonport prostitutes, and their ages; does that return show, including the year 1870, only one girl under 16, six girls between the ages of 16 and 17, making altogether seven under 17 years of age?—Yes.

3762. Will you give the Committee your figures of the number of fallen girls under 17 years of age received from Devonport during that period; you have that in your return No. 5; have you not received altogether 29 girls under 17 years of age, between 14 and 17?—Yes.

3763. And of those how many were diseased?—Five were diseased.

3764. Were those five registered or unregistered?—They were unregistered.

3765. And I understand you would argue that this return of yours confutes, if it is to be believed, the police statistics, as far as Devonport is concerned, and supports the evidence of the heads of the local police of Devonport, Plymouth, and Stonehouse?—Yes, as to the existence of registered or clandestine prostitution.

3766. And especially of juvenile prostitution?—And also as to juvenile prostitution it appears to me quite to do so.

3767. When was the greater part of the cases from Plymouth received by you; was it soon after 1870, or in the later years?—Soon after 1870; there have not been so many of late.

3768. What is the reason of that diminution?—The person from whom we received those young people, a Mr. Marshall, who interested himself in their rescue, found his efforts completely frustrated, so he ceased to send women to us.

3769. Without going into the merits of the case as regarded Mr. Marshall's efforts, he found his rescue proceedings made difficult, and in consequence of his discontinuing to send cases to you you no longer received them?—That is so.

3770. I understand you to say, with regard to Mr. Marshall, that he was not your paid agent, in fact he was not your agent?—He was not, but we assisted Mr. Marshall very extensively in the first few years of his being there by paying the expenses of the women to London, costing about 1*l.* a head. We placed every reliance upon him, and never had any reason whatever to repent it.

3771. I understand that he was engaged in this work of rescue, that he sent the women to your home, and that you placed every reliance upon him,

21 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

[Continued.]

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

him, and had never any reason to regret it?—That is so.

3772. You are aware, are you not, that police witnesses were cross-examined before this Committee as to the character of Mr. Marshall as an unfit person?—I cannot remember that I heard that.

3773. I can inform you that, though Mr. Marshall has not been before the Committee, three police witnesses were cross-examined before the Committee as to his character, with the view of showing that he was not a fit person to be trusted with the duty of rescuing those women; I ask you what is your experience?—I only say that we placed every reliance upon him, and had never in all our transactions with him the slightest doubt of his honesty or straightforward and Christian character, and have not to this day any reason to doubt it.

3774. Now, taking Woolwich, will you refer to your return; you have, have you not, the number of 112 fallen females received from Woolwich?—Yes.

3775. How many were under 21 years of age?—I find no fewer than 90.

3776. That is to say, about 80 per cent.?—Yes.

3777. Now, during that period, how many fallen girls under 16 years of age did you receive from Woolwich?—We received 12 under the age of 16; the entire number of fallen women received from Woolwich being 112.

3778. And but 12 girls under the age of 16; now can you refer to Captain Harris's Report, and tell me how many he gives during that period of registered women under the age of 16?—Four.

3779. The number of registered fallen females under 16 years of age in Woolwich, in Captain Harris's Return, is four, and your own society received 12, whether registered or unregistered?—Yes.

3780. I take it that in your opinion those figures are a corroboration of the evidence of Mr. Krause before the commission on the subject of juvenile prostitution?—Yes; the matron of the home who has sent those girls to us, could also, if examined, give corroborative evidence.

3781. Could you take all the subjected stations together in Captain Harris's Return from 1870 to 1880, and tell us how many prostitutes you find registered under 16 years of age; do you find 58?—I find 68 under 16 years of age.

3782. Now does not your return show that you actually received 79 girls under that age from only some of those stations?—It does.

3783. Your return includes the year 1881, does it not?—It does; and there were in the year 1881 two cases, and therefore those must be excluded from the total.

3784. Therefore your number would be 77. You received 77 girls under 16 years of age from those districts in a period during which, according to Captain Harris, only 68 under that age were on the register?—That is so.

3785. Can you give the Committee a return of girls not classified as fallen, but in dangerous and uncertain conditions, received by you from the subjected districts during the same period?—Yes, this is a copy of it. (The same was handed in.)

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

3786. Can you give the Committee a return of the ages of the girls in those years?—Yes, No. 7 is a return of the ages. (The same was handed in.)

3787. You call these unfallen women, because, as you have already explained to us, you classify them according to their own statements and admissions; but out of that total of 234, the vast majority of whom are under 18 years of age, in how many cases do you believe that an immoral life had been already commenced?—We find, in going through our books, taking into consideration the circumstances in which each was placed together with the statements of those who sent them to us, that there were 108 who had commenced an immoral life, who had, if not by their own actual admission, yet as stated by their friends, and by those who sent them to us, fallen from the paths of virtue.

3788. Would they be necessarily prostitutes?—No.

3789. Therefore, it would not be the duty of the police necessarily to place them upon the register?—No, nor did we feel it right to place them in homes for the fallen, inasmuch as their fall was so recent, and if I may so term it, so light in extent in comparison with the others, lest they should be corrupted by those who had gone further than themselves.

3790. The returns you placed before the Committee show a very marked diminution of late years in the number of registered women whom you have received; that is not simply due to the fact that you no longer receive them from Mr. Marshall's agency at Devonport, is it?—It is not.

3791. To what other cause is it due; have you been disinclined to receive that class of case?—Yes; owing to the great difficulty of dealing with the registered women from their influence upon the other inmates of the home, we have found it undesirable to receive them.

3792. Then you have found a distinct difference of character in the registered women, as compared with the unregistered?—We have.

3793. Which you do not attribute to their great age?—No.

3794. You attribute it partly to the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts, do you not?—We do; to the examination, and all the incidents connected with the examination.

3795. You have been applied to sometimes to take those registered girls, have you not; have you ever been applied to from Chatham?—I have. I have a letter from Miss Webb, the matron, the excellent matron I may say, of the Chatham Lock Hospital, of a recent date; two letters, in fact, if I might be permitted to read them.

of which is Mr. Thomas, the largest institution next to our own in London: and it is so with the Homes of Hope: in fact, I think it is generally so: they find these women to be such a source of corruption to the others that they are obliged to choose others in preference to them; and moreover, Miss Stocken, the matron of the home at Plymouth, who received a large number from the hospitals, called upon me the other day, and stated that the hardening effect of the examination was such as to make the work almost hopeless there.

3797. You were going to read to the Committee a letter that you received from the institution at Chatham?—The letter I received from Miss Webb was as follows: "Lock Hospital, Chatham, 22nd February 1882.—Dear Sir,—We often have young girls who wish to go to your six months' homes, but having been informed that you decline taking them from the Government Lock hospitals, I have refrained from applying to them. I have, however, come to the determination of writing to you, plainly asking the question, as I can hardly imagine a charitable society like yours refusing aid to girls who stray in here from all parts of the kingdom, and who wish to be reformed; and I feel nothing but a confirmation of the report that such are refused admission to the Society's Homes from you will convince me."

3798. To that letter, which you have just read to us from Miss Webb, you replied, declining, as I understand, to take Lock Hospital patients, and did you receive a reply from her?—I did.

3799. What was that reply?—The reply was, "Lock Hospital, Chatham, 27th February 1882.—Dear Sir,—Thank you for your letter and book. You do not seem to be aware that we have a small ward quite apart from the rest of the hospital where we place young girls on being brought in for the first time; and it is from that ward that ——— comes, whom Mrs. Lyall (deaconess) will bring to-morrow to one of your homes by your kind permission; I hope she will not disappoint us. I can readily imagine that girls received from the large wards might do mischief, and as you say enter a home with the sole purpose of drawing others away. I have experienced this with regard to our small ward; a woman some years ago (an old offender) came in while I was away, and said she desired to reform, and was placed in the reform ward to my horror on my return. However, I was persuaded to try her as she really seemed in earnest. She drew them all aside from their purpose, and we lost that set altogether. I have been as cautious as possible as to having no old offenders there, and we have eight. * * * I hope to do something, with God's help. Being a number of years on the street, whether under the Contagious Diseases Act or no, fearfully depraves a woman, and we have many who come in here for the first time who have been many years going on in that awful life before coming under the Contagious Diseases Acts. Again thanking you for your courtesy."

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

3801. And you are aware, are you not, that the effect of the Contagious Diseases Acts has been year by year to increase the age of the women employed in that way?—I believe it has.

3802. But now, besides the lengthened practice of a life of prostitution, is it your opinion that a registered woman differs from an ordinary prostitute for other reasons than merely the length of time that she has practised her profession?—It is. I have a very strong conviction, based on personal observation at the examination houses, and from conversation with those women themselves and many others, that the influence of the examination especially, and all that pertains to the examination, the illegal way, I suppose I may say, the wrong way, in which they are brought under the examination, so depraves these women, that in comparison even with others of the same years, they are more depraved, and much less susceptible to good influences. I have a statement in support of this from the secretary of another institution, if I might be permitted to make use of it. A gentleman, who is at the head of the midnight meeting movement, holding midnight meetings in various parts, subjected districts as well as others, sees, with us, the almost insuperable difficulties in the way of the reclamation of women who have been under the influence and operation of these Acts. I should like to be permitted to make use of his words rather than my own. The way in which the statement came into my hands was this. A series of midnight meetings had been held in the Plymouth and Devonport districts, and I wrote to Mr. Marshall to inquire as to the results of those meetings, and Mr. Marshall replied that they were almost without any results in the way of the reformation of these women, and that during the time the women were being spoken to by Christian men and women, many of them tried to turn and twist the word of God into the worst and foulest expressions; it was the most painful scene he had ever witnessed. I received that from Mr. Marshall as the result of my inquiry, and I communicated with the secretary of the midnight meeting with a view to ascertain his opinion with regard to it, and it is to his reply that I should like to be permitted to draw attention.

3803. What is his name?—Mr. Christien.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

3804. What is the date of that letter?—The 3rd June 1876.

Chairman.

3805. That seems a long time ago?—I saw Mr. Christien a few days ago, and after reading this letter of six years ago, I asked him to read his own letter, and he read it, and in the presence of Mr. Lynn he stated to me that he had several weeks ago been in Plymouth, Stonehouse, and Devonport, and that exactly the same state of things existed then as when he visited the district in 1876.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

3806. Did he say that he had had any midnight meetings recently?—Yes, he had; so that it

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

it is upon the ground of his recent experience, as well as the experience he had in 1876, that I ask permission to read his statement, or a portion of it. He says: "Dear Sir,—Your excellent correspondent at Plymouth has given you a truthful account of the midnight meetings lately held there. The women assembled appeared to me to be the fattest, some the best dressed, and nearly all the most Godless, insolent, shameless women I have yet seen. I was not surprised at this; it was just what I expected, because I had been led to certain conclusions by former experience at places where the Contagious Diseases Acts are in force. To me it seems to be the most natural result of the infamous legislation of which these poor creatures are the victims. When I saw the women at Plymouth going up to the fortnightly examination (driven by the police to the medical dépôt), through the most public street of that important town, during the busiest hours of the day (eleven to two), exposed to the gaze of a discerning populace, I could see two processes at work. 1st. The hardening of the women; and, 2nd, elementary lessons in vice for on-lookers. Let me be understood. The police wait at the dépôt to see that the women attend. If they are sluggish in coming they go to their houses after them." That which I have just read he states as his present experience, as well as his experience of 1876; and that I can corroborate from having seen the women myself, may I say, driven up to the examination house, a policeman going before, and a policeman following.

3807. When did you see this?—That was 10 years ago, in 1870. I have not been to these subjected districts with three exceptions since then.

Mr. Stansfeld.

3808. Now, to come to the system of reclamation carried out in your homes, and the amount of its success; have you a return, No. 8, of the number received into your homes, and a record of what became of them?—Yes, I have a return here, showing that we admitted into our homes from the year 1853 inclusive, up to 1881, 11,538 young people, of whom 6,511 were fallen, and 2,571 were unfallen; and, alluding to the previous years, from 1853 to 1861, when we failed to separate the two classes in our books, 2,456 of both classes together.

3809. Will you state to the Committee from that return what became of those girls?—We placed 5,683 of the two classes in situations in domestic service generally; and we restored to their friends after a period of training in the home, 2,033; we placed in other institutions, 538; we placed in the hospitals and unions 772; left of their own accord, for the most part to seek employment, 1,973; dismissed, 326; died, 54; remaining on 31st December 1881, 159.

3811. That is exclusive of the period prior to 0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

1860, between 1861 and 1881; if I understand you rightly, you reclaimed and placed in domestic service 2,883 fallen women?—We did.

3812. The total number of fallen women I make to be 6,511 between the years 1861 and 1881?—That is correct.

3813. Will you hand in a copy of that return No. 8?—I will. (The same was handed in.)

3814. Now, how would you estimate the numbers permanently reclaimed?—We should include the first four sets of figures; that is those placed in situations, those restored to their friends, those placed in other institutions, and those placed in hospitals and homes, after a considerable detention in our homes.

3815. Would you include those placed in other hospitals?—We should. Not saying that the whole of them were absolutely reclaimed, but taking into consideration the number that were dismissed or left, and that after a long period of good teaching, knowing that many of those have been reclaimed after they left our hands, we think we are right in claiming the first four sets of figures which I have enumerated, amongst those that are reclaimed.

3816. Now, I find that out of the 6,511 fallen women received, you have 1,111 restored to friends; some of us are in the habit of doubting whether in the police returns the columns "restored to friends" necessarily means permanent reclamation; what have you to say upon that question as far as your operations in that direction are concerned?—That where it is claimed for them that they have been restored to friends without any detention in the homes under good instruction such as is given there, and for a considerable length of time, there cannot be any reliance placed upon those who have been sent to their friends apart from those considerations.

3817. You would say that there is all the difference in the world between restoring a fallen girl to her friends after an educational period in one of your homes, and sending her to her friends direct from a Lock hospital?—I do distinctly.

3819. With regard to those who are returned to their friends, what have you to say?—We cannot say so much with regard to those who are returned to their friends; we can say no more than this, that having been under our care for a considerable time, under good moral and religious teaching, we have every hope that their return to their friends may be interpreted as meaning their reformation.

3820. Now what would induce you to believe in a girl, if she says, "I am going back to my friends;"

21 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

[Continued.]

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

friends;" would you place her in the list?—We should count her as "leaving of her own accord."

3821. Under what circumstances would you classify a girl as being restored to her friends?—When we had reason to believe that her reformation was comparatively complete; that her relatives were willing to receive her, and that the circumstances surrounding her in her home (very frequently the cause of her first shame) were in every way suitable to her well doing afterwards.

3822. That is what I am desirous of ascertaining; you say that in this classification of yours, you have every reason to believe that those whom you have classified as restored to their friends, are permanently reclaimed; you have taken the pains to sift those cases?—We have.

3823. It would not be enough for a girl to say, "I am going back to my friends," and perhaps go back directly to the brothel from which she came?—No, certainly not; we should never put it in our report that she "was restored to her friends."

3824. Having taken all this care in the construction of this return as to those really reclaimed, what proportion of the total do you sincerely believe you have been successful in reclaiming?—I think we may claim those I have alluded to, which amount in the whole to 76 per cent. But when I say reclaimed, I do not mean that there has been on their part no relapse; we have observed frequent relapses on the part of those girls that we have set down as reclaimed, whether sent to situations or restored to their friends; but I am glad to be able to say that there has been in almost every instance where these young women have been under good training and influence a recovery from that relapse, so that I think we may fairly claim as reformation in round numbers 70 per cent. of those sent to service and restored as I have said.

3825. That per-centage is better even than the figures of Glasgow and Cork, is it not?—It is.

3826. Your own very favourable figures I understand you attribute to your system of classified homes?—That is one means; but we put forth so many influences, and are so, I may say, unfettered by rules, that we attempt and carry out means of saving those girls which an institution with stilted rules could not do.

3827. Your remark would apply above everything else to Government institutions?—It would.

3828. You would say that the institutions managed by Government officials and under Government rules, that elasticity of management, that elastic humanity of management I may say, which you have been able to apply in your own homes, cannot be found?—That is so. Reference has been made to hospitals, but I should include in that description even reformatories and industrial schools.

3829. The Government institution would be the Lock Hospital; your institution would be your Lock Hospital and home; and comparing the one with the other, you would expect to have a decided advantage over the Government institution?—Undoubtedly.

3830. Will you compare the official figures with yours, and tell the Committee whether your figures carry out that view?—I have here a return, No. 9, relating to our Lock Hospital exertions.

3831. This is not a home, this is a Lock Hospital?—This is the Lock Hospital.

3832. When was that established?—It was established in 1876, and I may say that what led to its establishment was very much the complaint in 1871, to the Royal Commission, of the insufficiency of voluntary Lock Hospitals; and secondly, the example of an institution at Bristol; there is a small Lock Hospital there.

3833. Now before you come to explain your Return, No. 9, will you answer me one or two questions upon this point; your Lock Hospital has been in existence since 1876; how many patients have you received during that time?—Two hundred and twenty-eight.

3834. How many left before a complete cure was effected?—Twenty-nine.

3835. That is just under 13 per cent. ?—Yes.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

3836. Your report gives it as 43?—Yes, this return in our annual report for the year is completely incorrect. I wish to explain here that this return was drawn up in my absence 12 months ago through illness from the office; a mistake occurred by bringing forward year by year, as if they were fresh inmates, those who were remaining at the end of the previous year.

Mr. Stansfeld.

3837. For what reasons did the 29 leave?—It was difficult to assign a reason for each one; their own evil disposition; pretending in some instances to go to their friends was one reason.

3838. What I want to ask you is this: am I to understand that, in your judgment, in the whole of these 29 cases they left uncured, without sufficient reason; is that so?—That is so.

3839. Can you tell me what has been the average sojourn of the patients in the hospital?—About 74 days in the hospital, as distinguished from the hospital and the home, and the combined detention there.

3840. Any difficulty as to detention is to be gauged I understand by this proportion of 29 who left sooner than you would have wished them to leave out of a total of 228?—Yes, that is including the 11 remaining; but those who left we should compare with the total of 217 who were disposed of.

3841. Therefore the true comparison is between 29 and 217, which is about 13 per cent. of those who left?—Yes. (The Table was handed in.)

3842. Could you tell the Committee anything about the Bristol figures of those who left; in the first place, what is the Bristol Lock Hospital?—It is a Lock Hospital situated in the old park, Bristol, and is for the voluntary reception, without payment, of any woman venereally diseased, who wishes to be cured of the disease; and I find that of those admitted during the last six years, the

the numbers being 219, 28 left before they were cured.

3843. Your figures are 29 against 217, which is practically identical with theirs?—Yes, the other is about 12 per cent.

3844. What you would put to the Committee is that the experience of these institutions shows that the number of those who leave sooner than they ought to do is about 12 to 13 per cent.?—That is so.

3845. Now, going back to your reclaimed cases, your cases amount to 70 per cent.?—We should include the first three figures, sent to service 88, sent to friends 42, and sent to other institutions, homes, &c., 22; making the total of reclaimed women 152.

3846. This is equal, is it not, to about 70 per cent.?—It is.

3847. What would you say as to those who left when cured?—I think of the 30 per cent. who left, 12 per cent. being uncured, we may assume that a large proportion did not return to an evil course, but were reformed from their evil course of life; and that of those at least 10 or 20 per cent. might be claimed as reformed.

3848. I will not take up the time of the Committee by raising the question of the exact proportion of reclamations in the Government Lock Hospital, but I ask you whether from what you have observed, it can boast of any approximation to the same success?—On the contrary, there is scarcely any comparison between the two sets of figures. I think I have discovered that about 86 per cent. of the registered women from the Government Lock Hospitals are returned as having gone back to an evil course of life.

3849. But without going into that comparison, no such proportion of reclamation from the Government Lock Hospital has ever been shown?—On the contrary, Mr. Stagan in his evidence, if I recollect correctly, stated that only 15 per cent. of reclamations were effected in the Lock Hospital at Chatham under that very good woman, Miss Webb. Only 15 per cent. were reformed, consisting of those who went to homes, I presume; but then there must be after going to the homes a weeding process, which would make that 15 per cent. not more than half, say 7½ per cent. of reformation.

3850. But Captain Harris's return showing the increasing age of the registered prostitutes is conclusive upon that subject, is it not, showing a tendency to keep prostitutes a longer number of years in their career?—Yes.

3851. What is the cost per head of your institution?—The cost is 24*l.* annually per bed, but from this there must be deducted about 12*l.* per bed, or for those occupying a bed, for useful labour.

3852. Do you mean per bed or per patient?—Per patient; not case, but individual person. We reckon that 12*l.* comes back to us in useful labour from those women, so that their actual cost is reduced to about 11*l.* or 12*l.*

3853. Have you any means of telling us in figures the cost to the State on the other hand in the treatment of women in the State Lock Hospitals?—I have only the figures for the 0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

Albert Lock Hospital at Devonport. I have not seen their report for a later date than July 1878, and then the average yearly cost for three years was 45*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.* per bed or patient.

3854. In the case of the Albert Institution, I understand your calculation to be this, is it not, that the charge to the Government per patient is that amount?—Yes.

3855. I understand that you are aware that that hospital is supposed to make a profit out of the cases?—That is so; I am aware of that.

3856. In your hospital you reduce the cost by the employment of your patients in useful labour; is that, in your opinion, in itself a feature of value from a reformatory point of view?—It is of the very greatest importance; what we should do without useful labour in our homes to engage the attention of these women I do not know; when we did not employ it so many years ago we were much less successful than we are at the present time.

3858. How would your system compare with the governmental or other systems of reclamation which now exist?—Our hospital system has this chief characteristic, that the women are admitted voluntarily upon their own application, and are detained according to their own will, and are, therefore, throughout willing subjects, submitting their minds and wills entirely to our control and our teaching; as distinguished from the Government system with which it is compared, where, from what I have heard of the poor girls, and what I have seen in the newspapers, there are frequent rebellions amongst the inmates, and the greatest obstacles on every hand to their reformation.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

3859. From what source do you derive your knowledge of these outbreaks?—As I have just stated, from the girls themselves, and from the reports which I have seen in the newspapers.

3860. Could you then particularise that in any way, so as to give us any data from which we could draw our conclusions?—I could not at the present time; but, I presume, every member of this Committee is aware that there have been such riots.

Mr. Stansfeld.

3861. Perhaps you could refer the Committee to the evidence of the Commission which sat 10 years ago?—Yes, it will be found there.

3862. May I not say that the object of your hospital is to diminish vice?—It is.

3863. Whereas the Government hospital is part of a system, the object of which is something quite different?—Quite so.

3864. In your opinion that different standing has an entirely different effect upon the inmates of the hospitals?—It has.

3865. You have, have you not, carefully watched and studied the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I have.

U 3

3866. Did

21 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

3866. Did you early take an unfavourable view of what you believe to be their moral or rather immoral effect?—I believe that, as secretary of the Rescue Society, I was the first to call public attention to the Contagious Diseases Acts when they were not known. That was owing to a call that I received from Mr. Berkeley Hill, with a view to their extension throughout the civil population.

3867. Did you visit some of the subjected stations?—I visited many of the subjected districts, including Plymouth, Colchester, Southampton, Woolwich, Greenwich, Gravesend, and most of the districts.

3868. And the opinions you have given to the Committee are founded, firstly, upon your general experience in the Rescue Society, and secondly, upon the special visits you paid to the subjected districts?—That is so.

3869. Have you anything to say to the Committee about those visits?—As I have before observed, my watching of the examination houses, and the conduct of the police and the effects upon the women, convinced me that the whole system was so utterly at variance with that which is right and good, and conducive to the best interests of these women, that I at once saw that my course was to do the best I could for the repeal of these Acts, having only the women in view.

3870. Before the Acts and where the Acts are not in operation, does your experience show that the period of time during which a woman practices prostitution is a very limited period, and that most of them emerge from it at an early age?—It is so; my own observation is that the highest average period of a woman's course on the streets leading a bad life is 12 months; facts would justify me in stating that the average period was much less than that, but I should put that quite as a safe period.

3871. What I understood you to say as the result of your experience, which is naturally startling to the Committee, is this, that a very large proportion of the girls who make a false step and fall are rescued where the Acts are not in force at so early a period of their career as to reduce the average prostitute life to 12 months?—Yes.

3872. Under the system of the Acts as we know, and you have told us to-day that you know, that the age of prostitutes is constantly increasing?—It is.

3873. Which means either that they are compelled to remain or that they find it worth their while?—They are established in it. It appears to me that the inducement to remain under the Acts for the sake of getting more money and being better dressed and getting a better status in society (they get more customers because the woman is guaranteed free from disease) is such, in the case of the maturer in years, and more hardened, as to lead them to remain in their course of life, when without these Acts they would, perhaps, have been rescued.

3874. I have asked you to show the Committee the care which you take in classifying women who are returned as reclaimed; you know the columns in Captain Harris's report, do you not, "Returned to Friends," "Married," and so on?—I have read them.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

3875. And have you followed the evidence taken before this Committee sufficiently to know that they do not claim to take the pains to sift those cases in the manner in which you have shown us that you do in this return?—It is impracticable that they should. Not having them under their care so completely as we have, and their will so completely at their disposal, it is impossible that they can elicit the truth from them as we can.

3876. Not having them so long a time?—Yes, nor having them so completely under good influences by their own will.

3877. From the Lock Hospital they go direct to your homes, do they not?—Yes; or some of them are sent direct to situations where we find Christian people willing to receive them.

3878. Now there is the reclaiming and the deterrent influence of the Acts; will you refer to Inspector Anniss's evidence at Question No. 3312. Inspector Anniss there expresses the opinion, does he not, that if the Acts were repealed there would certainly not remain any existing agencies equally effective either for the purpose of deterring or of reclaiming?—He does.

3879. Are you prepared to admit the accuracy of that view?—On the contrary, it appears to me that the Acts provide no means of rescuing women.

3880. What may be said is this, is it not, that all diseased women pass through the hospital, and that there is an opportunity of their reclamation?—That is so.

3881. But that the opportunity of reclamation does not, in your opinion and experience, compare in value with the opportunities which your system of Lock Hospital and home combined afford?—Clearly not, judging from the returns of our Lock Hospital.

3882. Now with regard to the deterrent effect of the Acts, what is your view founded on your experience?—I fail to see anything in the Acts whatever to deter women from an evil life.

3883. The Acts deter a certain number of women, I presume, from prostitution so open as to bring them upon the register?—I do not know that the Acts even go as far as that, because the Acts are constructed to bring every woman under them with a view to simply ascertain whether she be diseased, with a view to her cure and to keeping her free from disease.

3884. From what you have told the Committee of your belief of the number of clandestine prostitutes in the subjected districts, you are not prepared to admit that the Acts deter women from a life of prostitution?—No; the operation of the Acts and the agents who are appointed to carry them out, may, in some measure, in some individual instances, deter women from open vice; but from my experience they do not deter them from prostitution, that is to say, that they practice prostitution where the police appointed by the Acts cannot discover them, and that to an extent which is shown by our returns.

3885. Now, with regard to reclamation, in Captain Harris's return you will find a certain number of columns dealing with the method of disposing of cases in which women were removed from the register; and I find that these columns,

21 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

12 and 13 are "entered homes" and "returned to friends;" now, on the other hand in every year there is a very considerable number of women who are re-registered, having been once removed from the register, does not that show to your mind that a considerable proportion of those who are prima facie supposed to be reclaimed return to their evil life within the very district where they were supposed to have been reclaimed?—Yes; and as to those who were returned to their friends and placed in homes (with the exception of those placed in hospitals), I must say that I can place very little reliance upon the figures; besides which only those placed in homes with a view to their reformation can be considered in my estimation as amongst the really reformed. That being so, the whole credit is due to the institution which receives them, and not to the person who merely takes the initiative of placing them in such homes; and as I show you that we have many more applications than we can receive persons, there is no credit whatever to the police in introducing them to the homes.

3886. Now with regard to the reduction in the number of brothels and prostitutes of which Captain Harris makes so much, you are not prepared to credit the Acts with the diminution in the number of prostitutes and brothels, are you?—Certainly not. I never heard of an instance in which a Contagious Diseases Acts officer had taken the initiative in closing a brothel. It appears to me that the information they have in their hands ought to be sufficient to close every brothel; but that not being the design of the Acts, the design of the Acts being to retain the brothels, it would be subversive of that design that a Contagious Diseases Acts officer should take any steps towards closing them.

3887. You have seen the Contagious Diseases Acts, have you not?—I have.

3888. I believe you know that they contain no power for the closing of brothels?—I do know that.

3889. Are you aware whether those Acts which some believe are moralising in their influence are approved or disapproved of by the old brothel keepers of the subjected districts?—I know them to be thoroughly approved by them.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

3890. Have you ever had a conversation with a brothel keeper on the subject?—I do not at once remember any individual cases, but I must have had from having visited them.

Mr. Stansfeld.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

this question to her, "What do you think about the Contagious Diseases Acts," and asking her if she approved of them, and she gave the most direct approval of them, saying, in answer to a question which I and my friend Mr. Williams put to her, that they were the best things in existence; because if a man accused a woman of giving him disease, she could "cheek" him, to use her own words, and refer him to the Government Inspector. I know that prostitutes generally consider themselves absolved from all the consequences of being diseased, and of imparting disease to the soldiers.

3892. How do you know that?—Because they have told me so constantly.

3893. Have you asked them that question?—Yes, constantly.

Chairman.

3894. How long ago would that have been?—I should think that from the time I gave evidence, in 1871, till the present time I have been constantly in communication with those women.

Mr. Stansfeld.

3895. You cannot help being in communication with those women; you receive them in these homes?—Yes, and only the other day three of them gave me evidence which I shall be glad to lay before this Committee. One of them, a most respectable young woman, stated that she had been made to sign a document called the voluntary submission; that is the general evidence that I receive from these women. The strength of the evidence of those young women consists in their evidence individually, and as a whole, without any collusion between one and the other, and its being perfectly unanimous in hundreds of cases that I have conversed with.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

3896. That they are in favour of the Acts?—Not only that the older ones were in favour of the Acts, but also that they signed the voluntary submission involuntarily, being made to sign it.

Chairman.

3897. When you say that they involuntarily sign the voluntary submission, do you mean by that statement that the police, in violation of the Acts, compelled them to sign the submission, or what did you understand the women to mean?—I understood them to mean that they were threatened that if they did not sign this submission voluntarily they would be brought before a magistrate, and brought under the Acts by a magistrate's order; and as I saw it written up, and as you must know, in the Royal Albert Hospital, they would be threatened if they did not sign with the penal consequences, and as that referred to women who had not been proved to be prostitutes—

3898. When you say "penal consequences," do you mean being brought before a magistrate?—I understand them to mean imprisonment.

3899. Do you mean to say that those women conveyed to you the impression that the police threatened

21 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

threatened them with imprisonment if they did not sign?—I do not go as far as that.

3900. How far do you go?—I go as far as this, that the police threatened them with bringing them before the magistrates if they did not sign. May I make this addition, that the women understand bringing before a magistrate to be, as I gather from them, synonymous with imprisonment.

Dr. Furquharson.

3901. Was that your own impression, or was that the impression conveyed to them by the police?—That is the impression conveyed to me by the women, together with the impression fixed upon my mind by others who sent them to us, who knew the circumstance of the case.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

3902. May I ask if the impression conveyed to you by the women was that if they did not come up for voluntary examination they would be imprisoned?—Yes.

Chairman.

3903. Do you mean to say that those women told you that the police conveyed to them the impression that they would be imprisoned?—The impression that these women have, from my experience, is this, that when they get in the hands of the police, they being in a fearful state of terror, and misunderstanding much of what the police say, feel themselves completely in the power of the police, and that if the police tell them they will have to bring them before the magistrates unless they sign this paper, in their minds it means imprisonment; it means punishment; that is quite the impression I have gathered.

Mr. Stansfeld.

3904. I suppose you could if it were thought necessary, give specific statements made to you by the women?—I could if it were thought necessary.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

3905. You have used the expression "fallen women," very frequently; I presume by "fallen women," you do not necessarily mean professional prostitutes, do you?—I take "fallen women" as a general term to distinguish them from the unfallen; that is, the women who have not gone astray.

3906. You would take a woman who had once gone wrong "a fallen woman," would you not?—Decidedly.

3907. Any woman who had deviated from the path of virtue once is a fallen woman?—Yes.

3908. I need hardly ask whether there is not a wide difference between a "fallen woman" in the sense in which you use the term, and a prostitute?—There is this much difference, inasmuch as a woman may have fallen repeatedly, and not be a professed prostitute. I have known hundreds and thousands of women who have been in the practice for years, but have not been common prostitutes.

3909. You would include those who get a living as well as those who do not get a living by vice; in other words, unprofessional as well as professional prostitutes?—Yes.

3910. You have put in a good many returns; will you inform me by whom those returns have been compiled?—All the foundation of the returns was prepared by myself; I have had to look through the history of 5,000 women to get at the foundation of these returns.

3911. Have those returns been checked?—They have been checked by my assistants.

3912. Therefore you may say they have not been checked in the sense of having been before the public; they have been "manufactured" to use the word not in the least in an offensive sense in your office?—We have had no opponent to check them certainly, but they have been compiled from actual experience.

3913. You have spoken of the register; you are aware that the register is a private document and not open to inspection by anybody?—That is so.

3914. You have never seen it?—No.

3915. And in arriving at the conclusion that a woman is or is not upon the register, you go mainly by her own statement; what evidence have you to check that statement?—We have the evidence of it in this form; it comes to us from the person or persons who send young women to our care; it comes to us from their own lips in answer to questions put in a form especially adapted to elicit the truth; as for instance by this question: "How many times have you been in a Lock Hospital? how many times have you been in the Royal Albert Hospital?" and we find that in almost every instance, scarcely with an exception, we elicit the truth by not allowing the girl to see what our object is in obtaining the information.

3916. You cross-examine her, in fact?—We cross-examine her; but having first shown her that we are so far her friends, that whatever her offence may have been, it will not prevent her well-doing in any case in which we can forward it.

3917. You will agree that most of those women are not very reliable in the accounts they will give of themselves?—I quite feel, after 30 years' experience, that the information we elicit from those women is the truth. After checking it and being with our matrons, and in constant communication with them, and going through all their family affairs, we believe that they do tell the truth in this matter, with exceptions, and especially in those matters in which there is no necessity for disguise.

3918. But the temptation would be to present themselves as rather better than they have been. Now, I think you have stated that being on the register is the cause of more or less degradation?—Those women are quite ignorant how the information affects us; they may not know but that being on the register would be rather a source of confidence by us in them, so that there is no temptation afforded for any misstatements.

3919. Do not you suppose that a good many of those women come from the subjected or protected districts in order that they may not be placed upon the register?—I have no doubt they do, to escape the register.

3920. So that probably some of those women whom you put down as unregistered were women

21 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

women who have come from the subjected districts for the purpose of escaping from the register?—No doubt that would be so; for they could not conceal their clandestine course for an unlimited time, and then they would seek to get away from the district.

3921. Does not it strike you that this is not quite a fair comparison between the registered and the unregistered women. The registered women all belong to what I may call the professional class of prostitutes, and would naturally be the more hardened; whereas the others, the unregistered women, would include, as I gather from you, many women who had only sinned once or twice. Surely the comparison between these two classes of women, and the chances they have of being reclaimed, is not a very fair one?—But dealing with those two classes, I could scarcely admit that you have correctly described them. For instance, some of those we have had had not been of the old class; but the short experience they had of the Contagious Diseases Acts had corrupted them; and moreover, in the case of those who came to us as unregistered, I cannot remember more than one or two who had been only once or twice astray from the path of virtue.

3924. Can you give us any idea what the proportion of the professional street-walkers received by you is compared with those who are comparatively innocent?—We receive both under our care; but in the case of those who have gone once or twice wrong, we have other means of providing for them than that of entering into our homes. If a young woman had merely had a child, we should seek not to place her in our homes, but to provide for her otherwise.

3925. The fact of a woman being registered proves, I think you will admit, that she is a hardened professional prostitute; that is common ground to everybody, is it not?—Not always; because we, having the choice of applicants, have increased in the direction of those who have not been upon the streets for any length of time.

3926. That would apply to the term “hardened”; but still you would agree that every registered prostitute was a professional prostitute, would you not?—Yes.

3927. Even if she were only on the register a few weeks?—Yes.

3928. Now, with regard to the unregistered prostitutes, surely the presumption would be rather the other way, would it not?—There are a great many who get a living, and others a partial living, in that way; in fact, most of them, I ought to say; because they cannot retain their situations and carry on a course of clandestine prostitution, in those subjected districts particularly.

3929. I suppose you do not know the subjected districts personally; you have not lived in them?—I have not lived in them, but I have seen some fearful consequences of the Acts there.

3930. You would agree with the witnesses who have been examined in opposition to the Acts here that the women who are unregistered are those who carry on some other calling?—That is not my experience; because when a woman has fallen from the path of virtue she is generally out of a situation; 80 out of 90 are domestic servants who have come to the streets entirely for a living.

3931. Would you go as far as to say that the unregistered and registered women are exactly of the same class, and under the same condition of life?—Yes; taking into consideration the fact that those registered women were, upon their being first registered, comparatively young and untutored in vice, and that the unregistered women that we receive under our own care are in the same stage as those were in when they were registered.

3932. Still there is this difference, that the one has been found out and the other has not?—The one hides away from the police and the other has been detected.

3933. Surely the fact of being found out and ear-marked as prostitutes would of itself rather tend to bring them into the category of professional prostitutes?—Undoubtedly it hardens them in every step they take.

3935. But I beg you will put the Acts out of your mind for a time. Take London or Norwich, for example; you have there a certain number of women who are admittedly carrying on the trade of prostitution as a profession, and on the other hand you have a certain number of women who commit fornication on the sly, and who do not brazen it out by going upon the streets to solicit, openly for the purposes of prostitution; surely in that case you would say that the second class would be infinitely more open to reclamatory influences than the first, would you not?—Certainly not, because I may say that the women generally professing prostitution do not remain any length of time upon the streets. Taking London for instance, they would remain a very few months in a life of prostitution; that is, in the case of a woman who entirely gets her living by it, there is hope of her, and almost as much hope, if not quite as much, as of one who is leading a clandestine course, and who has not the bitterness of having to get her living altogether as a professional prostitute.

X

3936. You

21 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

3936. You do not think, putting the Acts aside, that the professional prostitute would be more difficult to reclaim than a clandestine prostitute?—With that explanation, I would not.

3937. Then further, you would not admit that there was any sort of good to be derived from the Acts?—I do not see a single characteristic in their favour. I admit that some of the police appointed by the Acts endeavour to their utmost to rescue these women, especially in the districts of Woolwich, Gravesend, and Greenwich, and other parts, taking hold of any agency that may be placed within their reach. I admit that; but it seems to me that the clauses of the Acts present such difficulty in the way of the police that it would be impossible for them to carry them out to any good result.

3938. There is something, as you would say, so radically bad and difficult to carry out about the Acts that they are of no manner of use?—They are so utterly difficult to carry out to produce any good effect.

3939. I observe at page 36 of your report, a chapter headed, "A new piece of mischievous legislation," and there I observe a very strong denunciation of the Contagious Diseases Acts; did you write that?—Yes.

3940. That, I suppose, expresses not only your own views but the views of the society generally?—It does.

3942. I can hardly understand how, considering the large number of registered women you have, you could speak of their being "smuggled in"?—I am very glad to give an explanation of that.

3943. I think you said that you knew Miss Webb, the Matron of the Chatham Lock Hospital, to be a very excellent woman?—I am sure she is.

3944. Do you know her personally?—I do not know her personally, but I know from her letters, and from communications I receive from others, that she is bent upon doing good to those women.

3945. Do you know that her conduct was called in question with regard to the case of a girl called Catherine Whybrow?—I was not aware of that.

3946. But from your knowledge, you say that she is very desirous of rescuing fallen women?—I am quite sure she is.

3947. Have you ever been present at any of the Lock Hospital religious ministrations?—I have never been admitted; if I had had the prospect of admission I should have gone to all the Lock Hospitals.

3948. Why were you refused admission to the Lock Hospitals?—I never thought of applying; I presumed I should be refused. On one occasion I went to the Albert Lock Hospital, and there I saw underground cells in which these women were, as a punishment, kept; and their cries stifled by padded doors, and things of that kind; I was in communication with Miss Bull there, whose experience led her entirely to see that the Acts were a source of mischief.

3949. Is she the matron of the hospital?—No, she gave it up and left upon that ground.

3950. You do not know for what offences those women were confined in those cells, do you?—No; I only know from the young women's statements that they were not able to get out, and broke the windows, and that sort of thing, and that they got into constant trouble.

3951. Is there any reason why the young women in Government hospitals should not be employed in useful labour as they are in your homes?—I do not see any reason why they should not, if you can get them to work; but they are kept at the expense of the Government, and I am afraid you would find every kind of opposition made to the doing of useful work; they have a notion that they are Government women; that they are a necessity; they have stated over and over again to me that they are a necessity.

3952. But there is no reason, is there, why those women should not be employed in useful labour in the Government hospitals just as in hospitals like yours?—I do not see any reason myself; but the reason I gave was rather from the women's point of view, as to their being employed by the Government, and kept there by the Government.

3953. But what has that to do with their not performing any useful labour?—Because they are kept there in a state of confinement against their will.

3954. But is that any reason why a woman sent to a hospital should object to be employed in useful labour?—A great deal more compulsion would have to be employed to make her do it than in our homes.

3955. Are these women absolutely idle in the Government hospitals?—I do not know that.

3956. Are your homes supported by voluntary contributions?—They are, except that we have a large amount of income arising from the labour of the women and the girls.

3957. You do not receive any help from the Government?—No, we do not; and the 923 women we have received from the suspected districts have cost us about 11,000 £.

3958. Have you applied for repayment?—We have not.

3959. Why not?—Because we would do anything rather than try to foster the Acts.

3960. Have your subscriptions increased or fallen off of late years?—Our subscriptions are about the same; I do not see any difference.

3961. I was going to ask whether your funds are at present sufficient for the support of the homes

21 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

homes and the hospitals?—Yes; I am thankful to say that we are well supported; but we could do with more money; I have been 30 years secretary, and I should not wish the work to be of such magnitude that I could not supervise it, and I cannot do the work now that I once could.

3962. You said one thing which astonished me rather, and that was that the highest average length of the career of a woman upon the streets is only 12 months; how does it come to an end?—Because she cannot bear the life any longer; that is away from the subjected districts.

3963. Does she die?—She seeks escape from it by many methods, and gets elsewhere; she seeks escape perhaps by means of a home; the homes of London take in about 2,000 women every year from the streets.

3964. Do you mean that she is so poorly paid, or that she does not like the life?—The life becomes unbearable, and there is a conscience in her. There is no conscience in the women in the subjected districts.

3965. Do you mean that the conscience being taken out of a woman she is unable to continue her career longer; you say that the highest average length of the career of a woman on the streets is 12 months; I want to know in what way her career is cut short at the end of that time; is it by disease, or death, or conscience?—By conscience; I have already stated that she endeavours to escape from it, not being able from many reasons to bear the life any longer.

3966. Do you mean to say that the absence of conscience only lasts 12 months, and that at the end of that time her conscience returns, and induces her to abandon that life; I should have thought it was the other way, that at the end of that time she became hardened and more inclined to adhere to it?—It is not so; apart from the Acts, these women have a sense of shame when they enter that course, and that sense of shame increases as time goes on, and as the woman has the opportunity of leaving. But I do not mean, of course, to draw a hard-and-fast line of 12 months; it may be six weeks in one case, six months in another, and so on.

3967. You would say that the longer a woman pursued the trade the more acute her conscience would become, and that at the end of six months, or 12 months, her conscience becomes so acute that she is driven to give up the life?—It may be that she waits until she gets an opportunity, or until somebody lays hold of her. There are a thousand ways in which a woman who has entered upon the path of wrong is brought to a consciousness that she has done wrong, and that it is best for her to quit her evil course.

3968. You would say that but for the Acts the chances are that before the end of the 12 months at the furthest a woman would be snatched from her evil life, is that so?—Yes; quite so.

3969. And that even if no external influences are brought to bear upon her, her conscience before the end of that time becomes so active that she voluntarily abandons the life as intolerable?—That is so.

Mr. Ernest Noel.

3970. It is not only their conscience, but the general misery of the life, I suppose?—A general sense of the wrong.

3971. There are other accompaniments of the life which are exceedingly miserable; so that after a time a woman, if she sees any chance of escaping, takes that chance of escaping which she would not have taken at the first moment?—That is so.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

3972. What is the average number of beds daily occupied in your hospital?—We have now about 12 inmates in the Lock department, and we have room for 25, but the remainder of the 25 beds are all occupied by those who have recovered.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.
Mr. Burt.

Dr. Farquharson.

Mr. O'Shaughnessy.
Mr. Stansfeld.
Colonel Tottenham.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. DANIEL COOPER, re-called; and further Examined.

Dr. Farquharson.

3973. I THINK, as far as I can make out, you have about 25 beds in your Lock department?—Yes.

3974. You have 12 patients actually under treatment?—Yes, at the present time.

3975. Are the rest convalescent, waiting for their discharge?—Yes, those who have recovered from treatment and are waiting, it may be a considerable time, until they can be placed in situations. Ours, as distinguished from an ordinary hospital, is one in which we retain young women, with rare exceptions, until we can recommend them to situations, i.e., until they have earned a character, and justified us in speaking well of them.

3976. Then are the hospital and the Home one and the same?—Quite so.

3977. Then there is no difference made in the wards between the sick and those who are not in that condition?—Not the slightest.

3978. Then in that case, of course, the medical part of the hospital is entirely restricted to women who have expressed a desire to reform?—The medical department is entirely restricted to those who are diseased.

3979. Do they come directly to the hospital, the same as they would come to any other Lock Hospital, without passing through the Home first?—They do not come to the place; they come to our offices in the same way as the young women at the Lock Hospital in the Harrow-road come to Dean-street for admission.

3980. You do not pass them through the Home first?—No.

3981. They are merely admitted on account of their condition of disease?—Quite so. In some instances, as I think I stated, they have gone to the Homes, and been found there, through the matron's discriminating observation, to be in a state of disease, and then have been sent to the hospital through us.

3982. What do you mean by the discriminating observation of the matron?—I wanted to convey to you the idea that we do not submit any of these young women to a medical examination on their admission to our care.

3983. But then, how does the discriminating observation of the matron enable her to detect disease without examination?—It is not easy for me to point that out. She sees signs of disease upon the women's clothes, I suppose, and she is open to hear remarks from the other inmates of the Home, and by one thing and another she ascertains it, and sometimes by their demeanour, and their apparent state of ill-health outwardly.

3984. Of these 65 clandestine women who were admitted in a state of disease, did any of them voluntarily confess their disease, or was it all discovered by the discriminating observation of the matron, and other means?—That only applies to a very few. By far the majority of those who came to us came to us admitting that they were diseased; and those were comparatively few who, having entered the Home, left it to be found out that they were diseased.

3985. I think you admit that your hospital is sometimes rather deficient in funds?—I do not think I have admitted that; I should be very sorry to admit it.

3986. In your evidence on Tuesday you said, "I am sorry to say that we are sometimes deficient in funds?"—That that must have had reference to the society generally. I intended that remark to apply to the society's funds generally.

3987. Then you have plenty of money to keep up the hospital itself?—We find that it attracts special gifts, possibly more than the general operations of the Home; it may be because it is comparatively new.

3989. We find at the present time that in the London

London Lock Hospital the voluntary side is largely crippled, and that they have a large number of beds which they are obliged to keep empty on account of the want of funds, but I never heard any remarks made about the want of energy of the chairman, Lord Kinnaird, and the other officers of the society?—I think, so far as the public may be aware of the fact, that the Lock Hospital receives women under the Contagious Diseases Acts with the feeble results following; it may have deterred the public from supporting it. I am quite aware that they have issued very special appeals for the Lock Hospital in London. I am afraid to say it, but I cannot help saying that if the public were generally aware of their receiving Government aid with women under the Contagious Diseases Acts, they would find the obtaining of funds more difficult still. I do not wish that they should find it more difficult, but I am afraid that that would be the consequence.

3990. But, in the face of that undoubted fact, do you not think that it would be rather difficult to establish, by voluntary effort, a large number of Lock hospitals throughout the country?—I do not, if it were done consistently with the plan which we have adopted, of seeking the reformation of the women; not merely receiving them and curing them, and turning them out careless of what became of them, but with the evident desire to save the women from a bad course of life.

3991. Then you think that funds would flow in freely?—I have no doubt of it; but if there were instances in towns where the funds did not flow in from a voluntary source, I should not hesitate to say that it was a call upon the Government to give subsidies to such hospitals.

3992. But you are aware that all the large hospitals of London, except those which are endowed, lead a very struggling life, and are hardly able to keep their heads above water; do you think that the benevolence of the public would be sufficient to maintain a great increase of the Lock Hospital accommodation over England?—So far as Lock Hospital accommodation is needed. My own impression is that it is not so greatly needed as the question would imply; but so far as Lock Hospital accommodation is needed in London, if the thing was represented to the Christian and benevolent public in the right way, I have no doubt that the funds would be forthcoming. I may say that we have less difficulty in getting funds than the unendowed hospitals of London. We scarcely ever issue any appeal.

3993. But the unendowed hospitals of London are all in a very struggling condition at this moment; the London Hospital and the other hospitals in London are sending out very urgent appeals, as we know well; and a great many of them are obliged to close their wards from time to time, and, in fact, are making the most urgent appeals every day. In the face of that great difficulty of supporting hospitals, about which there can be no possible doubt in the public mind, do you think that the public would respond liberally to the establishment of large Lock hospitals all over the country?—I think the public would liberally respond to appeals for the establishment of Lock hospitals, in the form of 0.75.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

our hospital, or in the form of the small Lock Hospital in Bristol, because of the immense results following in the reformation of those women.

3994. Then how is it that your rescue society, which is doing so much good, is in want of funds, as you admitted?—I think I stated that, speaking personally, after 30 years of exertion, it would be beyond my ability to supervise an increased number of homes and accommodation besides; because I ought to say that in addition to the rescue work we have servants' homes, which shelter 1,300 servants in the course of the year who might fall into danger; then I have under my care an Orphanage; and my time is so fully filled up that I do not think the Committee could put upon me any additional duties or responsibilities beyond those which I have. But I believe if small institutions were established generally throughout the country, on the same principle as ours, they would be well supported.

3996. Then does not that reply of yours give rather a false estimate, of course inadvertently, because you say, "I am sorry to say we are sometimes deficient in funds (though I have not any complaint to make against the public in that respect), and our reception of inmates is limited accordingly." That is a very definite statement?—Yes, it may be sometimes, but generally I think I ought to say that we are well supported. We could do with more.

3997. Do you think that patients come now early enough to a voluntary hospital, and voluntarily interrupt a perhaps flourishing business, to come for treatment unless they are obliged?—The question must have reference to the women who are not in business. They have not a flourishing business; their business is the very reverse of being flourishing; and they eke out a miserable existence by the proceeds of their bad trade, sometimes in a half-starved condition, very unlike the women who are found in the subjected districts, who are comparatively well-to-do, and well-dressed, and well-fed, and well-housed.

3998. Then you think that they come sufficiently early; does not the fact of those 65 clandestine women coming to your hospital in a state of disease rather militate against that theory of yours?—I think not.

3999. And there was a certain number who had not announced that they were suffering from the disease, but in whose cases I think the disease was detected, you say, by the matron?—They were in a state of destitution, and, as I have already said, conscience-smitten, and wrought upon by the course of misery which they had followed; and they sought us with a view of getting getting a shelter in a home, and they either confessed themselves at the time to be diseased, or a very short time after admission, and were admitted to the hospital.

4000. Then we distinctly understand that there is no form of examination carried on by the matron?—Not any; we particularly avoid it.

4001. She does not even look at their clothes?—Not in the slightest; we never fail to discover that a woman is diseased within a very short time of her admission.

4002. Is it not the case that a great many women do not know when they are diseased?—I have heard so, and it may be the case; some of those who are admitted to our Homes are unaware at the time of their admission of their being in a state of disease, but I presume it is (not being a medical man I do not know) that the disease develops, and in a very short time shows itself.

4003. I do not like to go into hygienic points, because we are not now on that branch of the question; but I may mention that the most dangerous sore, the hard sore, is quite painless, so that it might readily escape observation by the woman, and of course that is a very dangerous class of the disease. The other great difficulty which has always been felt is the difficulty in keeping in the women until they are cured. I gather that, even in your hospital, where the women are under the influence of your rescue labours, 13 per cent. go out before they are thoroughly cured?—Yes.

4004. But you are aware that Mr. Lane, who has a much wider experience, says that 25 per cent go out uncured?—Yes, I remember that statement, but I remember also (whether or not the statement was made by Mr. Lane I am not sure) that the women stayed to the extent of 82 per cent., and that only 18 per cent. left uncured.

4005. In answer to Question 2435, Mr. Lane says: "I gave some evidence in 1871 before the Royal Commission on that point. I gave three years, and it was found that in each of those three years, as nearly as possible, 25 per cent. went out uncured: (Q.) And of course in a contagious condition?—(A.) In a contagious condition. I have here a recent statement for the years 1878, 1879, and 1880, of the number of women who left at their own request uncured, or who were discharged uncured for misconduct. The number of women who left uncured in 1878 was 92"?—This is the evidence of Mr. Lane, in answer to Question 2437: "The total number of voluntary patients admitted was 459, but the percentage is 20·043. The number discharged for misconduct was nine; that would be 1·96 per cent. The total number who left uncured was 101, which would be 22 per cent. In 1879 the number who left uncured was 63, or 16·75 per cent. The number discharged for misconduct was 13, or 3·45 per cent.; the total number who left uncured was 76, or 20·21 per cent."

4006. You admit that there is great hygienic danger in letting patients go out of hospital uncured?—Quite so.

4007. Then would you not think it desirable to have some form of restraint by which you might compel them to remain until they were cured?—No; on the face of it they would not enter on the voluntary system if they had not the liberty to leave; and when I remind you that our number is 13 per cent. only having left uncured, instead of 25 per cent., according to Mr. Lane's evidence, you will see that the risk, so to speak, to the public is much less.

4008. That is only, of course, your own opinion, that the compulsory detention prevents their going into the hospital; you have no statistics to support that?—I thought that it was so clear on the surface that I need not bring any argument forward. At all events, from conversation with the women I know it to be the fact that in workhouses where there is such restraint they will not enter; in so far as the workhouses are known to confine the women, the women will not enter.

4009. Do you know that merely from the vague statements of the women?—From the statements of the women, but I do not admit that they are vague. It is a statement of the women repeated for many years, which I have not any reason whatever to doubt; they have no motive whatever in stating that.

4010. In your hospital who is the judge as to whether a woman is cured or not?—Our medical men.

4011. That is to say, in the case of those women who remain, but you do not put any compulsion upon the women to remain?—We try to do what we can for those who go out. In some instances they have friends to go to, and in many instances they go out comparatively free from disease, though perhaps in the strict sense of the term not quite cured. What I mean is that from what I have observed amongst these women there is a strong desire to be cured, and wherever they find a kind medical attendant and good Christian kind care, they will remain to be cured apart from their intention to remain to be reformed.

4012. All except those 13 per cent. and 25 per cent.?—Which 13 per cent. is very small.

4013. Comparing your system with the Governmental system, you say that, in your hospital, the women are throughout willing subjects, submitting their minds and wills entirely to your control and to your teaching; of course you do not mean to say that those 13 per cent. of the women go out in accordance with your permission to do so?—It is against our will that they go out; we do all that we can to prevent their going out.

4014. Why are those 13 per cent. so completely removed from your control and teaching, which you say is the great difference between your system and that of the Government; why have not your control and teaching sufficient effect upon those 13 per cent. to induce them to remain in the hospital until they are cured?—The reasons are multitudinous. The fact is that in dealing with these women we have to deal with the most difficult class of persons on the face of the earth; we cannot completely control these women's tempers and prevent their associating with friends that they wish to mix with; and there are a thousand other causes inducing them to leave, all of which we cannot cope with.

But

Mr. COOPER.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

But we do it to a greater extent than is done on the voluntary side of the Lock Hospital, and I have reason to believe that they put forth very great exertions.

4015. With regard to riots in the hospitals under the Government system, have you had any recent evidence?—I have not any particular individual details to bring before you under that head; but I am constantly hearing from the young women who have been subjected to the Contagious Diseases Acts of the uproars in the hospital. I have in my mind probably that which I have seen, more generally, years ago in the newspapers, and heard reported. I know that there is great difficulty, and the women constantly complain to me, not only that they are admitted when they are not in a state of disease, but that they are kept in the hospitals when they are not in a state of disease, that is to say, that they are not allowed to go out when they are cured; and they allege, as the reason of that, that it is for the benefit of the hospitals, that is to say, that the hospitals make a profit out of them; and that is so clearly so that one cannot deny it.

Chairman.

4016. May I ask whether you believe that they are taken into the Government hospitals without being diseased?—I remember reading a paper in reference to the Devonport Hospital, stating 500 and some odd women were admitted to the Royal Albert Hospital, and were found by the visiting surgeons there, who were honorary surgeons, not to be in a state of disease, that is to say, they kept them for a period of a few days, say 10 days, to ascertain whether they were in a state of disease, and not finding that they were, they discharged them. In harmony with that are the constantly-repeated statements of these young women, one of whom I saw a few days ago, a thoroughly Christian woman.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4017. What do you call a Christian woman?—I mean a converted woman, one who believes in God; one who is brought to God; one who is saved.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4018. Do those women say that they are kept in the hospitals after they have been cured, in order to benefit the hospital in some way or other?—They do.

4019. And you believe that?—I have not any reason to doubt it.

Dr. Farquharson.

4020. But who is most likely to judge whether she is in a state of disease or not, the medical man or the woman herself?—I think, probably, the medical man; but there are instances in which a woman would know whether she were diseased; and besides, she would know by the amount of care and attention that she received. Many women have complained to me that they have ceased to be medically treated, and that they are employed in the work of the hospital, and are kept there just at the convenience of the authorities; and many of them, because they are rebellious and will not go into the Home which the matron wishes them to enter.

0.75.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

4021. Even granting all that to be the case, is it not quite possible that the woman may be detained in the hospital under what we may call medical observation, though she is not actually taking drugs?—I have no doubt it is. Still she is smarting under the sense of injustice (and that is a matter of consideration, it appears to me) arising from the comparative neglect of treatment, and her being fully occupied in the work of the hospital, that she is kept there not for her good, but for their convenience; and she smarts under it, and it makes her rebellious and reckless.

4022. Are the women of your establishment allowed to prescribe for themselves; do they conduct their own medical treatment?—I need scarcely say No to that.

4024. In which she is wrong, perhaps; you would not, I presume, take the opinion of the woman on a medical point in every case as superior to that of the medical officer?—I would not; but I think that there is something in the fact that those women, according to their own statement, are kept, as I have already said, waiting until they become obedient to the dictates of those who wish to get them into Homes, for instance; it may be benevolence itself, but if the woman is cured it is an injustice, and it is worse than useless to try to persuade women to enter certain Homes, for instance, to be detained two years, some of them not of a character of which I can approve; I say that it is worse than foolish to detain women, as they feel that they are detained in order to make them go into these Homes.

4025. You mean that a medical man is detaining a woman in hospital until he can make arrangements for her being taken to a Home?—I do not mean that exclusively; I mean that for general purposes, purposes that I do not understand, the women feel that they are kept in the hospital when they are cured of disease; whether they be right or wrong I do not know, but this I know, that it is a very strong conviction in their minds, and that being the concurrent testimony of the women, I think there is something in it.

4026. Then it merely rests upon the opinion of the women?—I have no other opinion, and when we have had them under our care two and three and four and five and six months, and have brought them under Christian influences, we find that they tell us the truth.

x 4

4026*. The

25 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

4026* The difficulty, in my mind, is this, that the woman is talking about a thing she does not understand; the condition of disease and incubation of disease is a thing which she cannot understand, and which the doctor understands; and the doctor, for the benefit of the woman, may keep her in the hospital, although it is not necessary at the time to subject her to active treatment?—I quite admit that it may be so; I do not admit that it is necessarily so.

4027. I do not want the impression to go abroad that you have made an accusation against medical men, that they keep patients in the hospital for their own advantage longer than is necessary?—I would rather exculpate medical men from it; I think that it depends more upon the hospital authorities; I stated, as I have already said to you here, that at the Royal Albert Hospital I spoke to one of the committee, a magistrate, and told him my conviction, based upon the statements of these women, together with other evidence, which I cannot bring to memory now, that those women were brought in for the benefit of the hospital funds, especially when I saw that a profit was made by the Royal Albert Hospital out of the women brought in; I saw it to be feasible, not only that the women should be brought in, not in a state of disease, but that they should be kept there.

4028. Do you think that a medical man would willingly take a patient into a hospital whom he knew not to be diseased, simply for the purpose of augmenting the funds of the hospital; I cannot conceive a more serious accusation to be brought against the medical profession?—Let me recapitulate what I have already stated. It is in evidence that 570 women were so admitted to the Royal Albert Hospital before the agitation against these Acts began; I refer to my former answers.

Mr. Stansfeld.

4029. Do you mean in evidence before the Royal Commission?—In evidence before the Royal Commission.

Dr. Farquharson.

4030. Would you refer us to that evidence before the Royal Commission?—I cannot.

4031. Are you referring to the evidence of Mr. Wolferston before the Commission?—I am not sure whose evidence it was. I am now speaking from memory. It is 11 years since the Royal Commission sat.

4032. I ask you the question, because that evidence was most emphatically contradicted by Mr. Sloggett, and I will refer you to the evidence, if you like; I think I may refer to Question 3624; is that the evidence that you refer to?—So far as I can judge from reading those few sentences, I should think it was.

4033. Has this evidence been accepted entirely unchallenged by the authorities of the hospital?—I do not know; I should not think it very likely.

4034. Let me refer you to the answer to Question 4682; you see that that is contradicted by Mr. Sloggett, who has naturally had ample means of investigating the question as visiting surgeon; he is asked: "With respect to the 609 discharged by the authorities of the Royal Albert Hospital as free from contagious disease after you had sent them in as suffering from contagious disease; you have no knowledge of the fact? (A.) I think they may have been discharged within 10 days. A certain number may have been cured within that time, but of 609 cases I have no knowledge. I must deny the fact in toto, absolutely and entirely deny it;" do you see that the statement at No. 3624 is contradicted by the hospital authority at No. 4682?—I see that it is a contradiction, but I do not say that it is a satisfactory one.

4035. All that this evidence really amounts to is that there might have been an error of judgment (to which all human beings are liable), upon the part of one of the surgeons, but that the women were not sent in with any deliberate purpose of deceiving the authorities; do you not think that that is a fair interpretation to put upon it; does your evidence point to an error of judgment, or a difference of opinion on the part of the medical men, or to a deliberate wish on their part to send patients to the hospital whom they knew not to be diseased?—I cannot conscientiously say that I regard it as an error of judgment in the face of all that those women have told me. Believing, as I do, the statements, and seeing, as I have seen, that a profit has been made out of the women admitted to these hospitals, I cannot say that I look upon it as an error of judgment merely.

Chairman.

4036. Do you mean pecuniary profit made out of it by the officials?—I mean a pecuniary profit made, not by the officials, but by the hospitals; by the subscribers, if to shelter anyone from responsibility it may be so put.

4037. We are entitled to know what you mean by pecuniary profit; pecuniary profit gained by whom?—By the hospital.

4038. The hospital is only a building; by what individuals connected with the hospital was the pecuniary profit made?—The managers as a whole, of course; whoever has the responsibility. I cannot speak of anyone individually.

4039. You think that the managers of the hospitals gain pecuniary profit by those cases?—It is not a mere matter of thought; I believe that it is shown.

4040. You do not mean, of course, profit to their own pockets?—No.

4041. You mean to the institution?—Certainly.

4042. Getting money from the Government, and thus saving the necessity of going for private subscriptions; is that what you mean?—Quite so.

Dr. Farquharson.

4043. Does a medical officer get any possible advantage, pecuniary or otherwise, from having the beds of a hospital occupied?—I should think not; I am not aware of any, and I should think it very improbable.

4044. Would not his tendency be rather to save himself trouble, by keeping the beds empty?

—You

25 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

—You are referring to the hospital doctor in the hospital, not the doctor who sends them to the hospital.

4045. He retains them, as you say, for the benefit of the hospital; why does he not send them out at once, and save himself trouble by keeping the beds empty?—I cannot answer that question. I have stated already one reason: that the hospital authorities consult their own wishes, according to the statements of these women, as to sending them out; that, according to the statements of the women, they retain some in order to coerce them into entering homes which they do not wish to enter; and in other cases they make use of them in the hospitals for cleaning, and washing, and so on; and there may be other grounds. I am stating the results of my conversations with the women.

4046. Do you think there is any difficulty about filling the Government beds in the Lock Hospitals, and that they have to strain every nerve to get hold of the cases in the way that you suggest?—I do not know of any difficulty which they experience, and I cannot say.

4047. The assumption must be that there is some difficulty in filling the beds; have you heard of any difficulty of that sort?—I have heard from the young women that, when they first come up for examination, it is very frequently, not to say generally, the case that they send them into the hospitals when they are not diseased; I do not know anything about the beds.

4048. Of course you will agree with me that there must be very strong inducements to persuade a medical man to resort to deliberate deception and misrepresentation for the purpose of filling the hospital. I think you are almost bound to show what advantage a medical man gets by going through a course of deliberate deception in the way in which you have explained. You have accused the medical profession of sending to hospital, and detaining in hospital, knowingly, cases of undiseased persons for treatment. If you accuse an honourable profession of this course of deliberate deception, you are bound, I think, to show us some very strong inducement?—Pardon me if I say that I do not think I am bound to show anything. I have only the statement of the women to show it; I have no knowledge myself, except through the women.

4049. People do not commit crime without a motive, and this is a crime; can you show any motive?—I was about to state one ground of motive, as repeated to me, and that was that these women are consigned to the hospitals, according to their statements, they being young, and being new comers, in order to get them into homes; the intention may be a benevolent one, but it is illegal.

Chairman.

4050. The question is, whether any advantage to the medical men can have induced them to have sent those women into the hospitals?—If you ask me whether there is any pecuniary motive, I say no.

4051. Is there any motive?—A good motive, 0.75.

Chairman—continued.

such as I have stated. I see no motive of advantage; it is not for their own advantage in any degree.

Dr. Farquharson.

4052. Is there any motive at all which would induce them to deceive?—I have just stated one motive, as alleged by the women, and that is, that, when they go up first to the examination, if they are young, they are told by the doctors that a few days in the hospital will not do them any harm, and that as soon as they find themselves in a hospital efforts are made to get them into homes, and sometimes before entering into homes a hint is given to them that it might be well to get them into homes. That might be a benevolent motive, but inasmuch as it is not a legal ground upon which to send a woman to hospital the woman rebels against it.

Chairman.

4053. Are you now talking of cases where the doctors induce them to go in without being diseased?—I am.

4054. Then you do say that the doctors get them in without their being diseased?—I am repeating their statements which I do not discredit.

Dr. Farquharson.

4055. You have given us some evidence, I think, also referring to your evidence before the Royal Commission about the cells, or lock-ups, which you saw at Devonport; you gave your evidence in April; may I ask at what period of the year you saw those lock-ups that you speak of?—To the best of my recollection it was in the spring, or summer, but it was 11 years ago.

4056. In the spring or summer of the preceding year?—I gave my evidence in 1871; it referred to the previous year, 1870.

4057. Had you made any investigation at the time you gave your evidence as to whether those places were still in existence?—I do not remember that I did.

4058. You are not aware that they had been done away with in April?—I am not.

4059. Are you referring to the same places as what are popularly known as "Segregation Wards"?—Certainly not. I referred to a place underground. I think I explained at the time before the Royal Commission (I am speaking from memory) that those lock-ups were to confine women who were rebellious in, singly. Two were not put together, but a woman was put there when she was rebellious and would not conform to the rules of the institution.

4060. I think you will admit that those wards which you spoke of were known by the term of "Segregation Wards"?—I never heard that term used there; I can only say that, if it was used, it must have been used subsequently.

4061. It is used freely throughout the proceedings before the Royal Commission with reference to what you mean. Then you do not agree with an eminent authority, Sir Sydney Dacres, who, before the Royal Commission, used this expression. He said: "When the First Lord

Mr. COOPER.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

Lord went down the other day he went into the the segregation wards, and Sir Sydney Dacres used this remarkable expression: "That during the whole time that he was at sea he never had such good accommodation as was to be found in one of these segregation wards." Do you agree with that opinion of Sir Sydney Dacres?—I have no doubt that the segregation wards there described were such as he described; and, as such, I should thoroughly approve of them. They are such segregation wards as Miss Webb refers to in a letter to me, in which she states that the young women were kept separate from the elder women, the less depraved from the more depraved, with a view to prevent their communicating evil the one to the other. Those I should understand to be segregation wards, and very good things they are.

4062. But that is not the sense in which they are referred to by Sir Sydney Dacres. He says: "There was a great difficulty in finding any part of the hospital in which segregation wards could be established;" and then he goes on to say that, during the whole time he was at sea, he never had such good accommodation as could be found in one of these segregation wards. The result of his observation was different from yours?—My observation had only reference to one ward below stairs, and was quite distinct from the general building of the hospital; and Miss Bull, to the best of my recollection, explained to me that that was for a girl when she was rebellious, and had to be punished.

4063. As to why the efforts at reclamation which you say, and which we all know, have been carried on very vigorously lately, have become so much more vigorous of late years, do you consider that it is because attention has been drawn more prominently to the question of prostitution, and other points, in consequence of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I am really at a loss to understand what reference is made to. I am not aware that I stated that extraordinary efforts had been made since the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts began for the reclamation of women.

4064. With regard to the greater age of prostitutes in the protected districts than in the unprotected districts, as I think the Judge Advocate General stated to you, the registered women are all what we may call professional prostitutes, but the unregistered women include a variety of people, such as young girls, who are perhaps temporarily prostitutes, and maid-servants, who are just beginning prostitution, and perhaps even married women; would it not be more correct to say that professional prostitutes generally, without reference to the protected and unprotected districts, are becoming older in their trade than they were formerly?—I do not think so; I have no evidence to show that. On the contrary, my impression is, judging from London and from those who come from other towns and villages in England to our Homes, that there is a decrease in that respect; that is to say, that the women are not becoming, as a class, older, but that they are rescued from the streets on an average at a younger age than they were years ago.

4065. But it would be a fairer comparison to make two headings, one of professional women in protected districts, and the other of professional women in unprotected districts; can you tell us that the actual professional prostitutes in protected districts are older in their trade than in the unprotected districts?—I only know the age of the professional prostitutes in the subjected districts by what I have heard, and by what it is open to any one to learn from the returns; but with regard to professional prostitutes in London, and away from the subjected districts, my impression is, that they are younger, and that the cases are very exceptional of a woman who has arrived at mature years, from 25 to 30. I may say that, in round numbers, there must be 20 to 1; I was going to say 99 out of 100 of the younger class.

4066. Do you think that the greater age of prostitutes is not to be ascribed to their generally better condition, from their being better paid, from the working classes getting better paid, and from the soldiers getting better paid; and do you not think that it may have had something to do with the better treatment which they get?—Do you mean the subjected districts?

4067. In both?—There does not seem to me to be any comparison between the women and their ages in the unprotected districts and those in the protected districts. They may be professionals for a day, and they may be professionals for two days. It depends upon what constitutes a professional prostitute. If it constitutes a professional prostitute to receive a shilling or half-a-crown for hire, then I say that all the women that we meet with in London are professional prostitutes; but they do not remain on the streets for any length of time.

4068. I call a professional prostitute one who is living by prostitution entirely, who has no other means of livelihood?—That is the case of the professional prostitutes of London. I stated before that 80 out of 90 were domestic servants. A woman who has left her situation becomes a professional prostitute the moment she receives money for hire.

4069. Do you call a girl carrying on business as a dressmaker a professional prostitute in that sense. Such a girl must have a respectable appearance, or else she could not continue her occupation?—Many women are in business, and increase their earnings by sly prostitution; but they are so few that I can scarcely bring them within comparison.

4070. I wish to ask you one question about the examination of women. I think you hold a strong opinion that the degradation, which you allege is much greater amongst the registered than amongst the unregistered women, is mainly due to the examination?—Very largely.

4071. Do you mean the actual physical operation of the examination?—That is the least part of it. What I mean is that the circumstances under which they are illegally, from my point of view, brought under examination are galling in the extreme to these women. Then there is the circumstance of their being brought up to the examination house in mid-day in the presence of lookers-on, in the presence of policemen. There are other grounds which I can give.

There

25 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

There may be a public-house close by the examination room, which holds out an inducement to them to get drink; they go up in the presence of policemen at the door of these examination rooms, and in the presence of lookers-on in the streets, and ill-names are called after them, as for instance: "Are you going to the meat market?" I say that all that is so degrading, so forbidding, and so lowering, that it leaves a woman without anything in her upon which to work for good.

4072. But you do not mean to say that there is anything more degrading in the actual physical operation of the instrument being passed into the woman than there is in her own occupation?—You could not make a woman prostitute herself to a man against her will.

4073. I am only referring to the actual operation of passing the speculum; do you consider that that operation is a degrading element in a prostitute's life and career?—I do, most decidedly, because it is a forced examination against her will.

4074. Do you consider that the actual physical operation of passing a speculum, which is done to hundreds of modest women in hospitals every day, and which is done with perfect privacy and decorum, is specially degrading to a woman in the position of a prostitute?—It would be degrading to any person when it was done by force instead of in agreement with her own will, she knowing that she was subject to no ailment.

4075. You will admit, probably, that in a large proportion of cases at all events, the woman has voluntarily agreed to have the instrument passed; she has signed a voluntary submission and goes upon the table, and permits a doctor to pass the instrument?—I do not admit that she signs a submission voluntarily; I insist that it is an involuntary submission, a forced submission, and therefore it is a forced examination, and for what purpose? For securing her from disease, for the public good, for the good of soldiers, and for the good of the inhabitants generally, which is most degrading, because she is quite as well aware of the motives and all belonging to it as we are.

4076. But the only purpose of the examination is to find out whether she is diseased or not, and this same operation is carried on in hospitals and private houses in the case of innocent women and girls every day?—Not against their will, and for such a purpose.

4077. A doctor does what he thinks necessary, and a woman has no reasonable conception of what this instrument is?—A woman is not examined because she is diseased, but to ascertain whether she is diseased, and that makes all the difference.

4078. But she goes to a doctor to find out whether she is diseased or not; and therefore, the object of the two examinations is exactly the same, viz., to find out whether an individual woman is in a state of disease?—It does not appear to me in that light.

4079. Have you ever heard complaints from the women as to the harsh way in which the examination is made, and the pain which they suffer?—I have heard complaints from women, but I confess I have not laid much stress upon them. I have a very high opinion of the general humanitarian feelings of the medical men who examine them; but I have heard them complain, and it seems to me justly so, of the whole surroundings and concomitants.

4080. Do the women object to this part of the examination?—I have heard that the women object very strongly to a woman being present, a female nurse, when the examination takes place; I have heard them called her the most foul names that it is possible to conceive, such as I could not repeat here.

4081. Then if all the surroundings are so terrible, do you not think that it would have some deterrent effect upon the young girls who are just beginning prostitution, in showing them the miseries and evils of the life that they have embarked upon?—I will give you the reply that one of the women made me the other day. She said: "I do not care what becomes of me." Instead of deterring her, it made her desperate, and caused her to give herself up to a bad life, which the day before she had determined not to enter upon; and that is the general consequence as it appears to me.

4082. Do you not think that showing her the evils and miseries and degradation of her life, and putting the degradation prominently before her, would have a deterrent effect?—There are other counteracting influences with regard to that; there is the inducement upon the part of the women themselves who are under these Acts. As I have already stated, a great many are induced by bad women to come under the Acts, and when once they have submitted to the examination they get allied with these degraded women, and they gradually sink lower and lower.

Chairman.

4083. With regard to the case that you refer to now, that was the case of a woman who had been actually brought under the Acts, and not the case of a woman who had not up to that time been brought under the Acts?—It was.

Dr. Farquharson.

4084. In the case of a young girl beginning prostitution and being still comparatively innocent, would not the very presence of these degraded women around her fill her with horror?—If they were of the degraded character outwardly that was mentioned by the Glasgow witness, dirty, ill-looking, and vagabondish, it might deter her; but when she sees them well-clothed, reputedly clean, with language less brutal than it was, and altogether wearing another appearance, it becomes in a measure fascinating to a woman; and I believe many are induced to enter the streets and to surrender themselves to this examination by women of that character who are on the register.

4085. Then you admit, at all events, that the Acts have had the effect of improving the appearance of the women, and making them cleaner, and more self-respecting?—Undoubtedly, and I believe that is one great mischief of the Acts.

4086. But you admit it?—I do admit it to the great disparagement of the principle contained in the Acts.

Y 2

4087. Do

25 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

4087. Do you admit that the Acts at all events have improved the appearance, demeanour, and cleanliness of the women, and made them more self-respecting, because, of course, a clean woman is a more self-respecting woman, whatever she may be?—A woman under the Acts being sought after more by men has received more money, and has taken care to dress herself better, and make herself more presentable, so that the solicitation that she carries on may be more acceptable to men.

4088. Why are they more run after by men?—Because they are guaranteed free from disease.

4089. How do you account for the existence of this enormous class of clandestine prostitutes in the subjected districts of which you speak; why do not all men go to subjected women if they are free from disease; if these women are guaranteed free from disease, why are men such fools as to go with women who are not guaranteed?—Because they are such fools in one sense, to use your expression, but in many instances they very much disapprove of the women who are under the Acts; they regard them as mere machines. A woman who receives 20 or 25 men in a night, becomes in the estimation of a man one of the most brutal machines that he can use, as distinguished from a young woman who has not gone far in vice, and who is in the first stages of wrong doing. Men have their preferences in these matters, and that is their preference.

4090. If the great proportion of men go with clandestine women and neglect subjected women, how do the subjected women obtain the funds which enable them to present this appearance of prosperity which you describe?—I do not think I said that all the men went to clandestine women, or I did not intend to say it.

4091. You did not say that, but you make out that there are nearly double the amount of clandestine women in the protected districts that there are of known registered women?—I have not said so; my statistics show a little more than an equal number; and as to the women getting more money when it is shown, as has been shown by a witness, that a woman receives 20 or 25 men in a day, receiving pay from each, she must have a much larger trade, and a much larger sum of money than she had originally.

4092. Has that come out lately?—I believe that is in Dr. Barr's evidence.

4093. Was not that in the old days at Aldershot?—It was his evidence in 1881, last year.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4094. I suppose you have read the account of the miserable condition in which these women were in the subjected districts before the passing of the Acts?—I have read that in some districts, at Aldershot for instance, where they had no dwellings, they were in a very degraded state, and they were a much less source of mischief when they were in that degraded state.

4095. I suppose you have read Dr. Barr's evidence?—I have.

4096. Do you know that on one occasion he had a woman, her daughter, and her granddaughter, all at one time under his care for contagious disease?—I have no doubt of it; I have met with such instances myself.

4097. Generally, would you say that the women were in a miserable condition in the subjected districts or not?—My impression is that in the district of Aldershot they were in a very exceptionally low and degraded state; but I do not think that applies, from my knowledge and reading, to the districts generally, but only to Aldershot, and I think the Curragh camp in Ireland.

4098. Then do I rightly understand you to say, that the condition of the women at that time was not such as to require any special interference to relieve them from that condition, except in those districts?—I have no doubt that they required, as all women who are prostitutes require, interference, that is, they ought to be arrested by the police.

4099. But I am speaking of their suffering from those diseases; are you of opinion that previously to the passing of these Acts there was a necessity for a large interference on the part of somebody to relieving these from the condition of disease in which they were?—I am not aware of it; I entirely repudiate the necessity of mere medical interference. The interference, as I have already said, should have been by the police, and then they would have been brought under medical treatment.

4099.* I am now speaking wholly of their physical condition; I understand you to agree that in the camps of Aldershot, and of the Curragh, there was a necessity for something to be done with the women?—I do not admit that there was a necessity for mere medical interference. I think the interference should have been upon the part of the police to arrest the women, as all such women should be arrested, as the law requires.

4100. But can the police arrest a prostitute?—When she is known to be a prostitute she can be arrested.

4101. Not unless she is doing some act which is a violation of the law; are you aware that a woman who conducts herself as a prostitute, without giving offence to passers by, is not liable to be arrested by the police?—I suppose it only requires evidence to prove that she is a prostitute, and no evidence surely could have been needed beyond that which was on the surface to show that women in the degraded condition in which these women were at Aldershot were prostitutes.

4102. Are you under the impression that the police are called upon to arrest every woman who is a prostitute?—Undoubtedly; I have no hesitation in saying that it ought to be so; knowing her to be a prostitute, they can take her up for loitering.

4103. Then what would you say to the conduct of the police in London?—In so far as they neglect their duty, it is reprehensible.

4104. Do you ever walk along the public thoroughfares of London without seeing scores of prostitutes?—I cannot say that I see scores of prostitutes soliciting; in other words, giving evidence that they are prostitutes.

4105. You omitted the word "soliciting" in your first answer; I asked you whether you thought the police had power to arrest prostitutes generally,

25 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

generally, and you said they had?—Where there is sufficient evidence on the face of it to show that they are prostitutes, I presume that under certain Acts of Parliament the women can be arrested.

4106. They can be arrested if they do some overt act of prostitution; but simply because they are prostitutes they cannot be arrested?—Which overt act at Aldershot must have been so clear that there could have been no doubt. I am only judging from what I have read of the state in which they were.

4107. The women, for instance, who lived in huts at Aldershot, and were not soliciting soldiers, but were visited by soldiers, would not be amenable to punishment by the police, would they?—I understood that the women at Aldershot were women living in gutters and under hedges, and that, therefore, they could be arrested as vagrants, having no ostensible means of livelihood.

4108. But not all of them; is it your opinion that in the present day efforts should be specially made to reclaim those women that are in the subjected districts?—Undoubtedly.

4109. Up to the present time, I suppose you will admit, in fact I think you have told my honourable friend, the Member for West Aberdeenshire, that the volunteering efforts are inadequate for that purpose?—On the contrary; nothing could be further from my thoughts than to admit that the voluntary efforts are inadequate for the purpose of reclamation.

4110. To reach all the women in the subjected districts?—To reach all the women in the subjected districts that are willing to be rescued.

4111. But your society, at all events, does not touch them now. First of all, your accommodation is too small to have any appreciable effect upon the large body of prostitutes in the subjected districts, is it not?—We receive 300 or 400 in the course of the year, and ours is only one society; there are other societies in London which admit a large number.

4112. How many diseased women have you received in five years; is the number 262?—Those are not from the subjected districts; those are chiefly from London, not to the exclusion of women from the subjected districts.

4113. How many diseased women have you received in the five years?—I have collected no facts to show.

4114. Are these 262 women all women who come from London?—The majority are from London.

4115. Is it not the fact that, during the period covered by this report, five years, from the early part of 1876 to the end of 1880, there have been admitted into the Lock Hospital Home 262 young women requiring medical treatment, and that that is all you have admitted?—That is all we have admitted into the Lock Hospital Home.

4116. I am now speaking of diseased women?—I quite beg your pardon I thought reference was made to reclamation.

4117. I understand that you have only received 262 women during the five years from the early part of 1876 to 1880?—Quite so.

4118. That is a number which as compared 0.75.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

with the total number of subjected districts, is quite appreciable, is it not?—It is very small.

4119. I gather from your evidence, No. 3737 to No. 3741, that you have now come to a resolution to decline to receive women from the subjected districts?—We have gradually been compelled to do it.

4120. In a former answer you said that you found it undesirable to receive them?—We did.

4121. In answer to Question 3798, you said that you declined to receive a patient recommended, or suggested, by Miss Webb?—We did; though I think I stated afterwards that we admitted her.

4122. Therefore the diseased women from the subjected districts receive, practically, no treatment from your hospital?—Not to a very large extent, simply because they are under hospital treatment there, and they do not require any treatment from us if they are registered, as I understood your question to imply.

4123. If the women out of the subjected districts desire to go to your hospital, they would either be declined, or the accommodation for them would be very small?—But ours is not the only accommodation; there are other Lock Hospitals.

4124. What I understand from you is this: that, practically, your Lock Hospital gives a very small amount of relief to the diseased women of the subjected districts?—In proportion to the reputed number of women diseased it would be comparatively small. We give very little; we decline to receive them.

4125. Not on account of the limited nature of your powers of accommodation, but also because you advisedly decline to receive them if you can possibly help it?—The latter is the ground upon which we do not receive them.

4126. The other is a very important ground if you have only 25 beds for your patients?—We have only 25 beds.

4127. After all, those 25 beds would be a mere drop of water in the ocean amongst the diseased prostitutes throughout the United Kingdom?—I admit that it would not be much.

4128. Then I come to this point, which I want to establish: that your Rescue Lock Hospital gives a very small amount of relief to those diseased women in subjected districts?—Yes, we did not establish it at all for the purpose of giving relief to women in the subjected districts.

4129. That is the result, is it not?—It is quite extraneous to the question.

4130. Never mind what the reasons are, that is the result, is it not?—I admit that we have small hospital accommodation.

4131. The result is you give a very small amount of relief to women in the subjected districts, is it not?—Yes, designedly.

4132. That is the result?—That is the designed result.

4133. Now we come to the other Lock Hospitals. You have told my honourable friend that the Lock Hospitals throughout the country are unfortunately very limited in their accommodation?—No doubt they are; but I do not think they are so defective as is generally supposed, but they are limited. I do not think the deficiency is anything

25 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

[Continued.]

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

thing like what it is supposed to be, in London, for instance.

4134. The London Lock Hospital, as we hear from Mr. Lane, has 53 beds; then there is the Glasgow Lock Hospital, in which the accommodation is very limited, and the funds are very small; are you aware of that?—Yes, but I believe they take all that come.

4135. In a large town like Glasgow, you are aware, perhaps, that there are only beds for some 20 or 25 patients?—That may be, but it is sufficient, as I understand it, for the purpose.

4136. From whom do you understand that?—From the evidence that Dr. Patterson gave.

4137. In Bristol there is but a small number of beds, I believe?—Quite so. Reference was made to the accommodation in London, as if the Lock Hospital in London were the whole of the accommodation offered in London. I wish to say that it is not so; there is large accommodation in London for patients venereally diseased quite distinct from the Lock Hospital.

Chairman.

4138. What other accommodation is there in London besides the Lock Hospital?—There is accommodation, more or less, in all the hospitals in London, because, although they do not professedly receive women afflicted with venereal disease alone, I find, by inquiry, that patients are admitted, it may be ostensibly with some other disease, but who are venereally affected. In the London Hospital there is accommodation for a certain number; in St. Bartholomew's Hospital they have accommodation for 60 venereal patients; in Guy's Hospital they have accommodation for 30 venereal patients; in Westminster Hospital and in St. Thomas's Hospital they have accommodation for a large number of patients; I am not able at this moment to state how many.

4139. You mean in all those cases venereal patients?—Venereal patients.

4140. Do you know whether this accommodation is for patients suffering from primary or secondary disease?—They are called venereal wards.

4141. Do they cover all kinds of venereal disease?—No doubt. That is additional to those admitted, ostensibly, for some other disease.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4142. At Question 2666 of last year's evidence, Mr. Lane is asked by my honourable friend, the Member for Glasgow: "What other accommodation is there in London for that class of disease?" And his answer is: "I cannot speak very positively as to that; but I believe they have a ward at St. Bartholomew's Hospital and St. Thomas's Hospital; but the accommodation is very limited indeed. I should think that 200 beds in the whole of London would comprise it all, but I cannot speak positively as to that." That being Mr. Lane's statement, and in all probability correct, will you tell the Committee whence you derive your information?—From an intimate knowledge of the hospitals. Before we established our own hospital, we used to send all our patients to these various hospitals, and we knew intimately, through our matrons and persons visiting the hospitals, what accommodation they had.

4143. How many beds should you say there are capable of being made up in London for patients suffering from these diseases?—I think Mr. Lane's evidence may be generally correct, if we include those only who are admitted simply with the disease, and exclude those who are admitted, as I said before, with some other ailment, but who are also treated for venereal disease. But in the Lock Hospital there is only accommodation for, I think, 50 patients, so that there is four times the provision made in the general hospitals that there is at the Lock Hospital.

4144. I understand that you substantially agree with what Mr. Lane says?—Substantially, with the addition that in the general hospitals many are treated, as I said before, for some other disease, as well as for the venereal affection, but are not counted as venereal patients.

4145. On the whole, throughout the country you agree with me that the accommodation for venereal patients derived from voluntary sources is inadequate?—I consider the workhouse provision.

4146. But outside the workhouse?—Yes, I should think it was inadequate, but probably this would be the explanation: that in many places they would know that there was special provision in the infirmary wards of the workhouses, many of which wards are very good, and that that would be a check on the necessity of establishing Lock Hospital wards in general hospitals.

4147. But patients are not received in workhouses unless they are on the parish, are they?—Any woman is received, I believe.

4148. You understand that, in order to avail themselves of these workhouse hospitals, the patient must be considered as a pauper?—Yes, she must go and make application for admission.

4149. That admission, or submission, in itself would be a great deterrent, would it not?—It is adapted more particularly for a low class of people; many of the low class of people go.

4150. But it would be a deterrent in itself, would it not?—No doubt it would be a test.

4151. Do you consider that on the whole the voluntary accommodation is not insufficient for the wants of the country?—I think it is generally insufficient, but, considering the workhouse accommodation, I do not look at it as a serious defect.

4152. Supposing that all the Contagious Diseases Hospitals under the Contagious Diseases Acts were removed at once, there would then be a greater insufficiency of Lock Hospital accommodation, would there not, for the diseased women?—I do not think that there would be, because the other hospitals would find it more incumbent upon them to provide such accommodation.

4153. How are you going to find the funds for the other hospitals?—By asking for them.

4154. And how are you going to ask for them?—By begging, as funds are got for any other object.

4155. But how do you know that there would be

25 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

be any reply to that appeal?—I judge from our own experience, of the experience of the hospital at Bristol, and many others that I know.

4156. But yours is very small?—It might be multiplied a hundred-fold.

4157. But your Lock Hospital is a very small affair; I do not know what the income is?—We devote from the Rescue Society just what it costs us.

4158. But you might want 10,000*l.* or 20,000*l.* a year to supply the place of the Contagious Diseases Hospital?—We might.

4159. How could you get that?—By asking for it.

4160. Do you think you would get it if you asked for it?—I have no doubt of it.

4161. Why do you not get it now?—It is not our work. We have other departments of labour besides establishing Lock Hospitals. We cannot do all the work in London.

4162. Why should you not increase your Lock Hospital accommodation; do you think there is sufficient?—We are not led to increase it at present.

4163. Do you think that you have sufficient Lock Hospital accommodation at present?—For our purpose we have.

4164. How is it that so well established an hospital as the London Lock Hospital cannot get these funds?—They do get a large amount of funds. I was looking through their report the other day, and I see that they received 18,000*l.*, including the money received from Government.

4165. The income of the Lock Hospital from subscriptions and donations was only 1,800*l.* last year; I confess when I read it the other day I was quite shocked to see how small the income of the Lock Hospital was. Do you not think that the London Lock Hospital would be able to fill many other beds besides those that are occupied if they had sufficient funds?—I have no doubt they would.

4166. In your opinion, as a man of great experience in these matters, how is it that the Lock Hospital cannot get increased subscriptions?—They may have damaged their cause by taking cases from the Contagious Diseases Acts districts, and I am strongly inclined to fear that, though I wish it may not be so.

4167. But how could it be so?—Because people will not support similar institutions. I see that the Lock Hospital had 8,000*l.* for the female department, including stock of 3,000*l.*, but that was a gift at one time. The stock which they sold was at one time subscriptions.

4169. Do not let us wander into the asylums.

0.75.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

Will you be kind enough to confine your answers to the female hospital. I am sorry to say that I am under the impression that it would not be possible to get sufficient voluntary subscriptions to supply the places of the Government Lock Hospitals. I asked you whether you knew any ways and means by which such a result could be arrived at; and I understood you to say that one great obstacle to getting fresh subscriptions was the fact that the hospital received relief under the Contagious Diseases Acts from Her Majesty's Government. Did you not say that?—I think it is very likely.

4170. Can you give me any grounds for that opinion; can you tell me of anybody for instance who has refused to give subscriptions to the London Local Hospital because it had Government patients?—I do not know anybody.

4171. It is mere surmise then?—It is mere surmise. I judge from my own feelings, and from the feelings of those who are in co-operation with me. If they had been subscribers to the Lock Hospital, I know that every one of them would withdraw.

4172. Can you tell me of anybody in this country who has declined to subscribe to the London Lock Hospital, or to any other hospital which takes Government patients, upon the ground that they did so?—I do not myself know a single subscriber belonging to the Lock Hospital referred to, and therefore I am not likely to know of anyone who would withdraw his subscription.

4173. Do you think that the classes of society who have the most money to dispose of are opposed to the Acts generally?—I think so undoubtedly. So far as my experience in connection with the subscribers to our Rescue Society extends, I believe that 19 out of 20 are thoroughly opposed to the Acts, and I believe that philanthropic and religious people everywhere are totally against the Acts.

4174. But I am speaking now of those persons who have most money to dispose of, and who are likely to become large subscribers; is it your experience that, as to the society generally, there is an indisposition to subscribe to hospitals which are in any way supported by the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Quite so.

4175. Amongst the learned professions, for instance, amongst the medical profession?—I do not know specifically amongst the medical profession.

4176. Or the legal profession?—Generally. I have in my mind Christian and philanthropic people; they give the most money. It is not a question who has the most, but who gives the most; and I find that the Christian and philanthropic people, engaged in philanthropic works generally, are those who give. You find the same names over and over again, and they one and all, I think, I might say, would decline to subscribe to any society which favoured the Contagious Diseases Acts.

4177. They would decline to subscribe to any hospital where Contagious Diseases Acts patients were received?—Yes.

4178. What is the feeling amongst the military profession, or the legal profession, or the medical medical profession, you are not able to say !—I cannot pick out the professions.

4179. If these Acts were repealed the women who suffer from the diseases would be deprived of a very large amount of advantages which they at present receive, would they not?—Not in my estimation.

4180. Not as regards the relief from suffering?—They would all be benefited by that considerably. They would find admission to other hospitals as they did before.

4181. But you have just told me that they could not find other hospitals, because they were so few?—Other hospitals would be established. It did not take us many hours to establish our little Lock Hospital.

4182. Do you mean to tell me that you could in a few hours establish Lock Hospital accommodation for all the prostitutes who are now being treated and cured under the Contagious Diseases Acts?—There is no difficulty in establishing them immediately, except the want of funds, which is a question that we have already gone into.

4183. How would it be possible for you to raise even half the amount?—The money might be obtained by begging, disconnected with anything that favoured prostitution as a profession.

4184. There must be a considerable interval of time, must there not, before these Lock Hospitals could be established, if all the Contagious Diseases Acts hospitals were shut up?—I have already stated that it would not take long to establish hospitals if there were a disposition to do so.

4185. Is it not common sense to suppose that a very large space of time must elapse before other hospitals could be established, if to-morrow, or in the course of a month, all the Contagious Diseases Acts hospitals were shut up?—The other existing hospitals would open their doors, in case of an emergency, no doubt.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4186. Do you know that at Dublin the Contagious Diseases Acts are not in operation, and that there is a Lock Hospital there, for which they cannot get any voluntary support whatever?—I think that where venereal patients are admitted, and great efforts are not made for their reformation, people are reluctant to give; they will not support women in a course of vice. It is a check to the general subscriptions to hospitals, when hospitals treat women, and allow them to go on in a course of vice without making any very strenuous efforts to reform them.

Chairman.

4187. I suppose you do not know much of the history and condition of Dublin Lock Hospital?—I know nothing of it.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4188. At Question 8046 of last year's evidence, I asked Mr. Shaen this question, with regard to the compulsory detention: "Do you think that these persons (referring to prostitutes under the Contagious Diseases Acts) ought to be allowed to go forth and to perish if they think fit?" And his answer was: "I do not think that the law ought to detain them compulsorily." Then I said to him: "You think that they ought to be allowed to go out and perish?" And his answer is: "If they choose, I do." Do you think that the women who are brought to the hospital compulsorily in that way ought to be allowed to go out, if they think fit, at any time?—I quite think that they ought to go out of their own accord, if they desire it, not to perish, because very few of these women perish, but simply on the basis that if they are compulsorily detained in an institution, they will not enter when they need to enter.

4189. Then, however advanced may be the stage of disease that they may be in, you still think that they ought to be allowed to go out?—I think that, on the grounds of policy, it is not well to detain them; it is bad policy to detain them.

4190. Even if they go out, as I said to Mr. Shaen, to perish?—I never knew one to go out to perish.

4191. You speak, both in your evidence before the Royal Commission and in your evidence here, of their being a strong feeling against these Acts among a certain class of people, do you not?—I have stated already this morning that there is a very strong feeling. I do not recollect whether I said so before the Royal Commission.

4192. In your evidence before the Royal Commission you said that you considered that there was great injustice to women by reason of their being compelled to go to these examinations?—Undoubtedly.

4193. Are you aware that there is now very little reluctance generally shown by women to go to these examinations?—I am not aware of it, and I should require a great deal to make me believe it.

4194. Have you read the evidence of Mr. Krause?—I have read Mr. Krause's evidence.

4195. Are you not aware that he says that the women go very willingly to examination?—Yes; the women confirmed in vice.

4196. The subjected women generally?—That includes especially those who are confirmed in vice, hardened and depraved.

4197. There is no distinction in Mr. Krause's evidence at all between the different classes of women; are you aware that there is a great change in the opinion of the women on that point?—I think it is very probable indeed, and that is the very token of this increased depravation.

4198. And that was confirmed by Mr. Rim-bault, of Maidstone; are you aware that generally there has been no evidence to prove any reluctance on the part of the women to go to the examinations?—I know of no evidence showing reluctance to go up to the examination on the part of the women who have become confirmed in vice by being for a considerable time under examination.

4199. There is no distinction in the evidence between the classes of women at all?—In the case of the registered women who have been only registered for a day, for instance, I have no doubt whatever that it is with the utmost reluctance that they consent to examination; but, in the case of a woman who has been registered for five

five or 10 years, she goes with the greatest delight, because it is a source of profit, and she is so hardened and degraded.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4200. Do you speak from your own knowledge of the women?—I speak from what I have seen of them at Plymouth, in 1870 and 1873.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4201. You are now referring to the evidence which you gave before the Royal Commission?—I am referring to evidence subsequent to that.

4202. I am speaking of the years 1880, 1881, 1882; there has been no evidence given by the opponents of the Acts to show in any way that there is reluctance on the part of the women to go to examination; have you read that?—No, and I should not accept Mr. Krause's evidence, or Mr. Rimbault's evidence on the point.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4203. May I ask how long it is since you were in these subjected districts?—I was in Plymouth in 1873, two years and a half after I gave evidence before the Royal Commission; I was in Windsor, and I saw fearful scenes there about the same date; I was in Colchester and I saw the most fearful scenes there that it was possible to see at a subsequent date; and I am basing my observations now upon that which I saw.

4204. But what was the latest period?—I do not remember that I have been in those districts since 1873.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4205. You have no evidence to show that the women at the present time object to go to examination?—I have the evidence of the women themselves that we receive from those districts.

4206. When did you see those women?—I saw three the other day.

4207. Where?—In my office.

4208. But I thought that you did not receive those women?—We receive them very reluctantly, and only a very few; but still we rescue a few of the more hopeful ones; as I stated before, we received one from Miss Webb very recently. An application has been made to us to-day to receive a child of 13 from the Lock Hospital; but I said that we were very reluctantly obliged to refuse to receive those who have been for a considerable time under the Contagious Diseases Acts, because they were such a source of temptation to others.

4209. Then it is simply from the statements of those women that you have arrived at the opinion that they object to the examination?—It is from the concurrent statements of all the women that I see that I come to the conclusion that they object.

4210. Do you mean the statements of the women who come to your Home?—I do.

4211. Would they not be likely to say what would be agreeable to you?—They would not know what my mind on the subject was. I only know of two instances out of many hundreds in which the women did go voluntarily to examination, and one of those made a great impression upon my mind. It was a girl of 16, who said that the other girls told her that they would not allow her to carry on her trade unless she went up for examination, and she went up of her own accord.

4212. When was that?—Some few years ago, but I do not think there is any difference between now and then.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4213. Could you give us the date at which this girl made this statement to you, which you say made such an impression upon you?—I do not remember the date.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4214. With reference to the opinion amongst many well-disposed persons with regard to the Acts, do you not think that they may have arrived at those conclusions by misrepresentations of facts as to the operation of the Acts?—They may have thus arrived at these conclusions, but I have not so arrived at them, and I give them credit for forming their conclusions on as good bases as those upon which I have formed mine.

4215. I have great experience from the public discussions in this matter, and from seeing how constituencies are worked by agitators; I should like to call your attention to some gross mis-statements which have been made, and I regret to find that some of them are absolutely in your Report. I would first of all refer you to page 18, line 5, where you say: "Admitted into general hospitals they (that is to say the prostitutes) had only to conform to the rules of those institutions, and were, it was found, visited by keepers of disreputable houses or their agents, and thus enticed back to their evil ways." This I regret to find in the report of a very philanthropic society, of which a most venerable and respected nobleman, my Lord Shaftesbury, is at the head. I think you are bound to give your grounds for making that statement, and I ask you to substantiate it?—I do not know what I am to substantiate.

4216. You are asked to substantiate the statement that general hospitals are frequently visited by the keepers of disreputable houses or their agents, and that the inmates are thus enticed back to their evil ways?—That is a fact, and a notorious one. I am not speaking of the hospitals under the Contagious Diseases Acts, but of the general hospitals in London.

4217. But those are women confined for Lock hospital purposes?—If you will read the whole of what is before you, you will see that has no reference whatever to hospitals under the Contagious Diseases Acts, but to the general hospitals in London.

4218. Then that is a serious charge against the general hospitals in London; do you believe that to be the fact?—Undoubtedly.

4219. How do you substantiate that?—By our own knowledge of the young women whom we used to place in these hospitals.

4220. Do you believe that the managers of the general hospitals would admit it to be so?—I do not think that they could deny it, because the admissions are not in any way restricted: any person who wishes to go and see a young woman, be she a brothel keeper or any other person, cannot be denied admission. That is one of the very reasons which prompted or justified us in establishing a hospital where that evil did not exist.

Mr. COOPER.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4221. These are the words of your report: "Admitted into general hospitals, they had only to conform to the rules of these institutions, and were it was found frequently visited by the keepers of disreputable houses;" what do you mean by "it was found?"—We found it. We found that our young women that we used to place there, 30, or 40, or 50 in the course of the year, were, some of them, visited by persons who kept disreputable houses, and they were, many of them, drawn aside by it.

4222. Did you call the attention of the managers of any of the general hospitals to that fact?—I do not know whether we did, but it would be perfectly useless to do so. They cannot cross-examine a woman visiting a patient on the regular day as to what she is.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4223. Can you tell me the name of any general hospital to which you have ever known the keeper of a disreputable house to go and entice a girl away?—It refers to hospitals generally.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4224. Can you give us the name of one only of the hospitals in which this has occurred?—I am very anxious not to bring upon myself a reflection on account of any statement that I make with reference to these hospitals, especially as it might be supposed by them that I accused them of permitting brothel keepers to visit the inmates willingly and designedly; I have no such intention. What I say is that their rules are such that it is impossible, with the very best intention, to exclude persons of bad character, who come simply with visitors with all other comers to the hospital.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4225. I am quite willing to accept your explanation, if you do not intend to make any imputation upon the managers of the general hospitals in London?—Decidedly, I do not.

4226. Now we will pass on to page 19 of your report, and in the last few lines of the paragraph there occurs this: "There have been hundreds of cases in which young women have been detained in hospitals through the ignorance or caprice of the medical attendants, who, not being in reality diseased, ought never to have been coerced into entering, or detained when they had done so." In this paragraph which I have now read to you, do you refer to any other cases except those which are specified in the evidence before the Royal Commission in the matter of Mr. Wolferstan against Mr. Sloggett?—None other, except what I have already stated, viz., the fact that those women under our care have, over and over again, one and all, stated to us that which seemed greatly to corroborate the statement which Mr. Wolferstan brought forward as that made by the three voluntary surgeons at the Royal Albert Hospital.

4227. But those women could never have been under Mr. Wolferstan; that was 12 years ago. In this report of the Rescue Society, of which Lord Shaftesbury is the chairman and Lord Cholmondeley the vice-chairman, you make a charge of the gravest possible character against the medical officers of the hospitals; upon what evidence is that statement founded?—I grounded my evidence upon a pamphlet written by Mr. Bulteel, and three other medical men at Plymouth, who were honourable surgeons to the Royal Albert Hospital.

4228. Do you know anything else, except the case of Mr. Wolferstan and Mr. Sloggett, which would justify this statement which appears upon page 19, that there are hundreds of cases; can you give me any one instance of a case in which a young woman has been detained in hospital through the ignorance or caprice of the medical attendants since the report of the Royal Commission?—I can state to you that which these women have stated to me. I repeat what I have said over and over again, that I have beyond this no other evidence of it except the statement of Mr. Bulteel which I read.

4229. That was before the report of the Royal Commission. Surely, if there had been such a serious case as that of hundreds of women being detained as Mr. Wolferstan says, do you not think it is likely that the Commission would have made some mention of it in their report?—I wonder they did not.

4230. Do you not know that in the report of the Commission, in paragraph 23, the Commission unanimously go out of their way to exonerate the police?—They may have done so.

4231. If they went out of their way to exonerate the police, do you not think it is likely that if the medical officers had been guilty of this very serious offence, they would have been condemned?—I repeat that I wonder they did not condemn them.

4232. I suppose they believed Mr. Sloggett?—They may have done so; I believe Mr. Wolferstan, Mr. Bulteel, and the other three surgeons.

4233. You tell me that you are not able to give the particulars of any case in which a young woman has been detained through the ignorance or caprice of the medical attendants?—I will read to you a statement which I received from a young woman only the other day, if it is of any use.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4234. I suppose that a woman could not always tell whether she was diseased, or not, could she?—I quite think that. I am only stating their impressions. A young woman came to me the other day, and she said that the police pounced upon her when she had been in Chatham only two days, she having gone there with a soldier. The other girls advised her to go up, or she would be fetched by the police. She signed the voluntary submission in utter ignorance of its nature; she was told that she had to sign, and she signed. She said, "I was kept" (meaning to be placed in the hospital); "they always keep keep a girl the first time, and nothing was the matter with me." She was, she said, perfectly free from disease. That is one case.

Mr. COOPER.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

4235. That is the girl's own statement?—That is her own statement, and she is, as far as we know, a thoroughly truthful girl.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4236. She does not appear to have been kept in the hospital; was she kept in the hospital?—She meant that she was kept back by the surgeon with a view of being sent to the hospital.

Dr. Farquharson.

4237. Was she sent?—She was.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4238. Was she kept in the hospital though she was quite free from disease?—That is her statement.

Chairman.

4239. She told you that she was examined?—Yes.

4240. Did she tell you that she was then, as she said, "kept," meaning thereby, sent to the hospital?—Yes, she was considered to be diseased.

4241. She told you that she was considered by the surgeon who examined her to be diseased?—Yes, that is the impression that she gave me. I am avoiding the use of her words.

4242. The impression that she gave you was that the surgeon, believing her to be diseased, sent her to the hospital?—Yes.

4243. She was then taken to the hospital?—Yes.

4244. And it afterwards turned out that she was free from disease?—She said so.

4245. Did she say whether she was subsequently examined in the hospital?—I do not remember that she did, but I have no doubt that she was.

4246. Did she give you any details of her treatment, or of what was done to her in the hospital?—No.

4247. How long did she remain in hospital?—She quite gave me the impression that she was free from disease during the time that she was in hospital.

4248. Did she tell you how long she remained in the hospital?—She was in the hospital three months.

4249. Did she tell you that she was free from disease all that time?—She left that impression on my mind.

4250. Did she state so to you?—As nearly as I can recollect.

4251. But impression is one thing and statement is another; do you recollect her stating to you that she was free from disease at any time while she was in hospital?—I understood her to say that she was free from disease during the whole time she was there.

4252. I presume that she also left you under the impression that, in her opinion, she was free from disease when the examining surgeon examined her?—Quite so.

4253. Did she tell you that the hospital surgeon made any statement to her with regard to her being diseased, or not?—No.

0.75.

Chairman—continued.

4254. Then, altogether, you have only her word for the allegation that she was not diseased?—Only that.

4255. And against that you have her statement that the examining surgeon treated her as being diseased?—He kept her as if she were diseased.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4256. Do you mean to say that this girl told you that, although she was perfectly free from all disease, she was kept in hospital for three months?—Quite so.

4257. Do you believe that?—I do not know whether to discredit it, or not.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4258. Have you any other cases besides that?—I have another case, but it is on another matter.

4259. Have you any other cases as to the ignorance or caprice of the medical attendants?—I have not any case by me here.

4260. Do you think that that case is sufficient justification for the publication of a paragraph containing these grave charges against the medical attendants of a hospital?—I do not, far from it. I stated that it is a frequent subject of complaint on the part of the women that come to us that they are kept in a hospital when they are free from disease, as well as being sent to hospital when no disease is upon them.

Chairman.

4261. As I understand, that is the only case which you now refer to?—It is the only case that I have here. I have not taken any particulars of cases. I have judged from my conversation with the women generally.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4262. Are you responsible for this report?—Yes.

4263. But that is not what the report says. The report makes what we call a distinct statement of fact, that there have been hundreds of cases in which young women have been detained in hospital when they have not been diseased, and so on; do you think that the case which you have just read, whatever it may be worth, is sufficient to justify a statement of that kind?—No, but I believe the statement that this Committee will not receive, which is contained in Mr. Bulteel's pamphlet, and which clearly shows it.

4264. Have you any information with regard to any cases which have occurred since the report of the Royal Commission, and since that statement was made?—It is the statement supported by that of the women coming to us, that they are sent into the hospital when they are not diseased, and kept there when they are not diseased.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4265. May I ask what is the date of this statement which this girl made to you?—She made it to me the other day.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4266. After what has passed, are you prepared to advise the explanation or omission of that paragraph

25 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

graph from your next report?—I do not think I should be justified in doing so in the face of what I have stated as to Mr. Bulteel's pamphlet.

4267. Notwithstanding that since the year 1870 there has not been one single case?—I have not admitted that. It is supported by the frequent statements of the women who come to us.

4268. But you have not produced one?—I did not for a moment suppose that I should have this to controvert, otherwise I might have given the names of all the women who have come to us, and who have made it as a general statement.

Chairman.

4269. Were the statements generally of the same nature as the statement that you have just read to us?—Yes.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4270. Their statements, you say, contain these grave charges against the medical attendants of the hospital?—Yes.

4271. At page 27 of your report I see this: "Here, then, is another decided advantage of the method we have adopted over an ordinary hospital, and most conspicuously so over a Government detention hospital, where, as is from time to time made known by the public newspapers, the inmates get into a chronic state of dissatisfaction, ending, too often, in open turbulence, rebellion, window breaking, and finally in imprisonment." That matter was referred to by my honourable friend, and I will not repeat his question; but I will merely ask you whether you are able to point out any circumstances which have occurred of late years which will justify that statement?—I have not the reports of the newspapers here, which I have seen, if that is what is meant, nor have I the information, which has come to me from indirect sources. The nearest information to it that I have is the accounts that the girls have frequently given of the state of the hospitals.

Chairman.

4272. In recent periods have you received statements from girls about these disturbances in the hospitals?—I do not recollect in later years. My statement was intended to cover the whole period of my recollection of the Contagious Diseases Acts.

4273. Except late years?—Not excluding late years.

4274. Have you, during late years, received statements from girls upon that subject?—I do not remember what I have received from them, but I think I must have done so.

4275. You do not remember receiving statements from girls of late years?—I do not remember; but I do not remember, on the other hand, to have received statements in conflict with this.

4276. Have you seen paragraphs in newspapers of late years describing these things?—I do not remember.

4277. Therefore, as far as you can remember, the paragraphs in the newspapers and the statements of the girls upon which you relied for these allegations, are paragraphs and statements which have not come under your notice of late years?—Not to the exclusion of anything which may have come to my ears since.

4278. Which you do not remember?—Which I do not remember.

4279. And whatever the value of those impressions is, they do not refer to late years?—Not so much to late years.

4280. Do they refer at all to late years?—Yes.

4281. Do you now say that you have seen paragraphs of late years stating these cases?—I must have seen them, but I do not recollect any paragraphs.

4282. Do you now say that you have heard from girls of late years statements of these things?—Yes.

4283. You said a moment ago that you had no recollection of hearing such statements from girls of late years?—I may have made reference there to individual girls, but I have received information from them generally.

4284. If you have received that information generally from girls of late years, you must have received it individually?—I could not summon to my mind of individual instances.

4285. You said a moment ago that you could not call to mind any instances of such statements made by girls of late years; do you now say that you can?—I cannot call to mind now any individual assertions that they have had made to me.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4286. Are you able to give the name of any case in what you call a Government detention hospital where there has been a rebellion and window breaking, &c., leading to imprisonment?—I do not remember any individual instance; it is only from general information which has come to me.

4287. I wish to call your attention to an observation which you made in reference to Mr. Marshall, in answer to the Right honourable gentleman who examined you in chief. In answer to a question you stated that you placed every reliance on Mr. Marshall, and that you had no cause to repent it, and in answer to the following question you said that, in all your transactions with him, you had never the slightest doubt of his honesty or straightforward and Christian character, and that you had not to this day any reason to doubt it; you remember that, I dare say?—I do.

4288. Are you aware that about a year ago Mr. Marshall attended a meeting at Canterbury upon this subject?—No.

4289. The meeting was held under the auspices of the National Association for the Repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts, and at the end of the placard which he issued you will find this: "Working men of Canterbury! Mr. Marshall is a working man; he has watched the operation of these Acts for more than 10 years, and has rescued some hundreds of women from the tyranny and degradation of this barbarous legislation." I wish to ask you, in the first place, whether Mr. Marshall is a working man?—Yes.

4290. How is he a working man; what does he do?—What I mean is that before he was engaged

25 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

engaged by the National Association to rescue these women he had been engaged in ordinary toil. I fancy he was a sailor; I am not sure what his occupation was, but I have understood, from various sources, that he was a working man.

4291. He says there that he is a working man; my question to you is whether he is a working man now?—I understand him to be of the working class. He belongs to the class of working men.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4292. In what sense is he a working man?—He works for one thing; he labours.

4293. We all labour; at what does he labour?—I do not know what he is engaged in now. I have always understood that he is what is known generally as a working man.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4294. At a meeting which followed, which was presided over by the Rev. J. Aldis, who I understand is a Baptist minister of Canterbury, Mr. Marshall addressed the meeting, and this report, which was taken from the "Canterbury Free Press," the only paper in Canterbury which published these proceedings, goes on to say that Mr. Marshall narrated cases of very brutal conduct on the part of the Government police, both while acting as spies on the miserable women, and while helping to carry out the compulsory examination of the Lock Hospital. I wish to know whether, since 1870, you are acquainted with any cases of very brutal conduct on the part of the Government police towards women?—I should say that their conduct generally was brutal.

Chairman.

4295. You mean the system?—I mean the system, and that is what Mr. Marshall means clearly. He does not mean individual cases of brutality.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4296. You do not know of any cases of brutality?—I should not use the term brutality; but I should say they go very near to it when a woman is brought up to examination, as I have seen her with one policeman going before her and another after her.

4297. Is that since 1870?—I am speaking of my recollections in 1870.

4298. All the questions that I am addressing to you have reference to a period subsequent to 1870; I wish you to address your mind to the events of the last few years, because there has been, so far as I know, a unanimous consensus of opinion, that there has been no act of brutality on the part of the police since, and certainly, on reference to paragraph 23 of the Report of the Royal Commission, the police were entirely absolved from any such conduct, whether rightly or wrongly, I am not going to say; but I ask you now if you know of any cases of "very brutal conduct on the part of the Government police, both while acting as spies on the miserable women, and while helping to carry out the compulsory examination of the Lock Hospital"?—I do not know of any cases of actual brutality; but it is the system. For instance, in the year 0.75.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

1873, at Plymouth, I saw policemen preceding and following women who came up to the examination house, and children peeping in, and men pretending to drag each other in, and all that fearful scenery.

4299. In the last five years?—I know very little about it of late; I have not been to the district; but my impression is, that there is and must be the same state of things now as there was then. Mr. Christien stated it.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4300. Upon what is that statement founded?—Upon the evidence that I produced here upon the last occasion from Mr. Christien, who, a month ago, as I stated, went to hold a midnight meeting in the Devonport district, and made the statement which is recorded in evidence.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4301. But you do not know of any such cases?—I have not been there myself, and, therefore, I should not know.

4302. There is another point which is a very important one in my opinion. Mr. Marshall is reported to have declared, in very vigorous language, "that the Acts were meant to apply only to one class of society; that the sisters and daughters of working men were alone looked after by the police, and that women of a higher social stratum may sin as openly and more infamously, and could do so with impunity, if they were under the protection of some lord or gentleman." Are you not aware that it is the practice of the police not to interfere with any woman who is living with only one man?—It may be the practice now, but it was not the practice when I was in the district; so that if it has been altered it has been since, because I, myself, brought two or three cases before a magistrate where the women were living with only one man, and they were relieved by the magistrates. One woman was named Hicks, and the other Bowden, and there was no doubt whatever that neither of those women ought to have been brought under the Acts.

4303. Do you not know that that is the practice of the police at the present time?—I do not know.

4304. It is surprising to me that you should not have informed yourself upon that point. Perhaps you are aware that there is no means employed so often to influence the working classes against the Acts as the habitual mode in which those classes are told that the Acts are only to apply to them and their wives, and their sisters and daughters, and not to apply to the upper classes?—I do not wonder at its being frequently stated, because it is so true that the women coming under the Acts belong to the working classes. If they belonged to the upper classes such a law would not be tolerated.

4305. You say that the conduct of the police towards the women of the lower classes is such as would not be tolerated if the women belonged to the upper classes; will you be good enough to explain that?—I beg to withdraw the statement, if I really said that. I understood the question to relate, not to individual policemen, but to the effect of the Acts—that, from all my experience, the Acts seemed only to include persons of a certain class; and my opinion is, that if the Acts included within their scope women of a higher class, they would not be tolerated.

4306. That is your opinion, of course?—That is my opinion.

4307. When you spoke of cases that you yourself had brought before the magistrates with regard to women who were living with one man, you referred, I presume, to a period before the Report of the Royal Commission?—About that time.

4308. And you have seen nothing of such cases since?—I have not had the opportunity.

4309. What was the result of those cases?—They were discharged.

4310. That is to say, the magistrates were of opinion that where a woman was living with one man she was not amenable to the Acts?—Quite so; that was after these women had been actually subjected to the Acts.

4311. But you are not aware, you tell me, that at the present moment the rule of the police is not to interfere with such women?—I do not know whether it is, or is not. It may still be for aught I know.

Chairman.

4312. Have you, in your experience, come across girls in the refuge of your hospital in London who have associated with the London soldiers?—If I may give an explanation, I fail to see that there is any class of women in London who are exclusively confined to the use of soldiers.

4313. Have you come across many girls from the neighbourhood of Chelsea Barracks?—Not a large proportion.

4314. In your experience of women in the different institutions, have you come across any girls who carry on the trade of prostitution about Chelsea?—I do not remember that we have more than from other parts.

4315. About the Tower where the soldiers are, have you come across many of that class?—I do not know that we have had a great number of that supposed class. No such impression has been made upon my mind.

4316. Have you had many of that class of soldiers' women?—No, we have not.

4317. Have you had many of the class of women who are down at the East End, and who associate with sailors?—We have; that is to say, in the first stage of their wrong doing.

4318. But you have not had many of the confirmed sailors' prostitutes from the banks of the river here?—No, I do not think that there are many confirmed sailors' prostitutes.

4319. In calculating your average of the length of time which prostitutes generally pass in their trade, do you include those low classes of London prostitutes?—Quite so.

4320. And you think that, even taking them into account, the average length of the period of prostitution is only a year?—Yes, I have given the period considerably higher than my own impression is. I may just say that the women come to us and to other societies, and they are questioned as to how long they have been living a bad life; and almost, I was going to say uniformly, but so generally as to make it appear to us almost uniformly, they confess to a period of three months or so; and the inquiries have not led us to suppose that that is a generally incorrect statement.

4321. Then the general statement of the girls coming to you is that they have been on the streets for about three months?—Yes, frequently; I think I may say generally.

4322. Has it struck you that the mere uniformity of the statement is a reason for doubting them?—It has; but the inquiries that we have made have not discountenanced the supposition that the statements may be true.

4323. Looking for a moment only to the class of women at Chelsea and about the Tower who associate with soldiers and sailors, do you think that a year would be anything like the average life of a prostitute of that class, and belonging to that locality?—I quite think so, or less.

4324. You spoke a short time ago of the desirability of the police arresting those girls who were plying the trade of prostitutes?—So far as it can be done.

4325. Are you under the impression that it can be done when once a woman is known to be leading the life of a prostitute on the streets, even although the police may not take her in any act of solicitation or indecency?—I think it is beyond my province to give any opinion about it.

4326. In making the statement that you did, were you under the impression that the police had a right to take up any woman who was plying the trade of prostitution here in London, or any other place, not under the Contagious Diseases Acts?—When they have the evidence that she is a prostitute, they may charge her for loitering, &c.

4327. Did I correctly understand you to say that according to your view, having been taken up by the police in that way, the women could be brought under medical treatment?—I mean that, if put in prison, they are forcibly, as I understand it, brought under medical treatment.

4328. And you advocate that in substitution for the present system?—I spoke of it rather as a certainty, as a thing which must take place, and as one that was preferable to the enactment of a law which would merely seize all those women at Aldershot, and bring them under the Contagious Diseases Acts.

4329. Although in the case that you put, assuming that your law is right, according to your view the treatment in prison would be forcible?—Yes, but I have not approved of the forcible treatment in prison.

4330. But you would approve of their being taken up by the police?—In preference to the other, but I should not wholly approve of it. I do not see any necessity for enforced examination in prison.

4331. Still you would approve, in preference to the present system, of the girls being taken up by the police and being treated in prison?—Yes; in giving that evidence, I had in my mind the general repression of prostitution.

4332. You have come across many cases of girls who informed you that they were put into these hospitals without being diseased, and you, from their demeanour, and other circumstances, accepted their statements on that subject?—I have done so generally.

4333. In any of the cases where you have accepted

25 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

Chairman—continued.

accepted their statements, have you yourself obtained any medical evidence of the truth of those statements that they have been through Government Lock hospitals without being diseased?—I do not recollect any instance in which we have done so.

4334. Therefore you rely altogether on the statements of these women that they passed through the hospitals undiseased?—Yes, it being a concurrent and almost universal statement.

4335. But in no case confirmed by medical examination or authority?—No, we have not thought it right to place any girl under medical examination; it is against our principles. We have not sought by medical inquiry to confirm the statements of the women.

4336. You also made a statement that you believed that these women were kept in hospital for the purpose, amongst other things, of doing hospital work?—They have stated that to me, and I have no reason to discredit it.

4337. Have you sought for any evidence for the purpose of testing the value of that statement?—I have not.

4338. Have you sought for any evidence for the purpose of testing the value of the statement that they were introduced undiseased into the hospital for the purpose of being brought into homes?—I have had no interest in getting such evidence.

4339. You have not sought it?—I have not sought it.

4340. Have you sought any confirmation of the statement that they were put into these hospitals for the purpose of benefiting the hospitals?—Merely from reading the reports of the Royal Albert Hospital, and from what I have generally read.

Mr. Stansfeld.

4341. With regard to your 28th Annual Report, upon which the Right honourable gentleman has examined you, I need hardly ask you whether you had come here with detailed evidence to substantiate every statement in that report?—I had not the remotest idea of it.

4342. One of your statements in your report is one which has been much animadverted upon, to the effect that there have been hundreds of cases in which young women have been detained in hospital, without really being diseased, during that detention; whether that be true or not, or whatever amount of truth there may be in it, the general remark in your report was founded, was it not, upon the notes in your books of statements made to you by the women who have come to your hospital and homes?—Yes.

4343. And whether those statements are reliable or not, they would be found, would they not, if your books were examined, scattered throughout their pages in considerable numbers?—Yes.

4344. And some of those books are on the table behind you?—Yes.

4345. Then with regard to another statement of yours in that report, you contrast your voluntary hospital (voluntary in this sense, that no compulsion is used towards the inmates) advantageously with the compulsory hospitals under Government care?—Yes.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

4346. And you say here that that is another decided advantage of the method which you have adopted over the method which is adopted in an ordinary hospital, and most conspicuously so over that adopted in a Government Detention Hospital; you are speaking there of the advantage of the employment in useful labour of the inmates?—Yes.

4347. You say, "Most conspicuously so over a Government Detention Hospital; where, as is from time to time made known by the public newspapers, the inmates got into a chronic state of dissatisfaction, ending too often in open turbulence, rebellion, window breaking, and finally in imprisonment." My Right honourable friend wanted to know whether you have any evidence of circumstances of that nature since the Report of the Royal Commission, and I think you answered him that you were not prepared with any such evidence; but have you any doubt, as a matter of general recollection, about the fact of such things having occurred since the year 1870, and up to the present time?—Not a shadow of a doubt.

4348. If I stated that cases of dissatisfaction on the part of the inmates and of turbulence and window breaking have occurred in these Government hospitals since the Report of the Royal Commission, you would be prepared to believe that statement?—Undoubtedly.

4349. In making that comparison I understand that your object was to show the superiority, especially from a reclamatory point of view, of the voluntary over the compulsory principle?—Undoubtedly.

4350. And it was not within your object to reflect upon the personal management of these Government institutions?—Far from it.

4351. What you would say would be this, that in a voluntary hospital, where there is no compulsion, it is more easy from your experience to employ the inmates with profit to the institution, and it is more easy to maintain them in a state of satisfaction with the treatment which they receive?—To a large extent so.

4352. In fact the same treatment in a hospital which they felt to be a prison would not satisfy them as well as it would in a hospital from which they could go when they chose?—Far from it.

4353. Therefore, these comparisons of yours were not meant to reflect upon the personal management of these Government institutions, but as illustrations of the superiority of the voluntary over the compulsory system?—Quite so; on the contrary, I shall be glad to testify from my knowledge to the general good management of these institutions, knowing the matrons of them, and that every effort is made by them to get the women into homes, and to benefit them generally.

4354. But you think that with all these good motives on the part of matrons and others concerned in the management of these institutions, they work under a certain disadvantage with regard to the moral condition, and the chances of reclamation of the inmates, because they work in a compulsory institution?—Quite so. In our case the women are all with us; whilst in their case the women are all against them.

4355. The

25 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

4355. The Right honourable gentleman began, I think, by asking you some questions about the amount of voluntary hospital accommodation for venereal diseases, and he first of all referred to Glasgow, and asked you whether you were not aware that they had very few beds in the hospital at Glasgow; I think he said that they were 25. Dr. Patterson told us that in a single year they increased the number of beds to 60, and that they have never been full since; therefore, the 25 was the number of patients, and not the number of beds?—Yes.

4356. This is my examination of Dr. Patterson, at Question 2895: "Up to the year 1869 how many beds had you?" and his answer was "35." Then at Question 2897 I asked him this: "Did you at one time treat many more patients than that number of beds would accommodate?" to which he replied: "Yes, there were 56 or 57 at one time in the house." Then at Question 2898 I said: "In consequence of this state of things, did you provide increased accommodation in the year 1870?" and he said: "The directors did so." I then asked him: "To what number did they increase the beds?" and he said: "To 60." Then I asked him: "Since then have all the beds ever been occupied?" and he replied: "Never; the number at once fell," and so on. Therefore in Dr. Patterson's evidence he shows that the number of beds which they have in that hospital at Glasgow is 60, and that from the date when they provided 60 beds those beds have never been filled?—So I understand.

4357. He also says, in answer to another question of mine, that they never refuse a case?—Quite so.

4358. My Right honourable friend also cross-examined you with reference to the evidence of Mr. Lane, who had expressed the opinion that 200 beds would comprise the hospital accommodation for venereal cases in the whole of London. That was in Answer No. 2666, in the evidence of last year, given by Mr. Lane to a question of my Honourable friend the Member for Glasgow. At the end of that answer I find these words: "But I cannot speak positively as to that." I understand that your figures do not differ very widely from Mr. Lane's?—Not materially.

4359. And you are not prepared to express any objection to the evidence which he tendered upon that occasion?—Not the slightest.

4360. You have expressed the opinion, in answer to the Right honourable gentleman, that the voluntary hospital accommodation was not seriously insufficient, taking into consideration the whole provision for the treatment of venereal cases?—Quite so.

4361. But however that may be, am I not right in saying that when you were arguing in favour of voluntary hospitals your point was that they should be hospitals, to which no compulsory law should apply, no law driving the women into the hospitals, and no law retaining them forcibly there?—Quite so.

4362. Is it a necessary part of your view to object to any payments from public sources in support of institutions of this kind?—It is; we thoroughly object to it.

4363. But do you object to the reception of venereal patients in the hospitals of the workhouses?—Not in any way.

4364. The workhouses are maintained, are they not, out of the poor rates?—They are.

4365. Therefore you do not object in that case?—I do not.

4366. As I understand your objection, first of all, it is to compulsion; secondly, you object to a specific and exceptional provision for the consequences of sexual vice to be paid for out of the rates or taxes?—Quite so.

4367. But you do not object to such a provision as that which exists under the poor law for the victims of venereal disease, as well as of any other disease?—I do not.

4368. With reference to the evidence of Mr. Krause, to which my Right honourable friend referred, you were asked whether you had anything to say against the opinion expressed by Mr. Krause, that the women no longer object to the system of examination. I have here Mr. Krause's evidence of last year, and the two last questions and answers are as follows: At Question 8825, my Right honourable friend asked this: "But so far as your knowledge could enable you to form an opinion, do the registered women at Woolwich regard these Acts as tyrannous and barbarous?" and the answer is: "They believe that they are a very good thing, and the registered women get a great deal more money through them." Do you concur in that opinion?—I thoroughly concur in that.

4369. Then at Question 8826 Mr. Krause was asked this: "I understand you to say that the registered women who are subject to those examinations are favourable to the Acts?" and his answer was: "Yes, those who have been any length of time on the register." That is precisely an expression of the opinions which you have yourself conveyed to the Committee to-day?—It is.

4370. Again, with regard to Mr. Lane's evidence, you were asked by my Honourable friend, the Member for West Aberdeenshire, whether the effect of his evidence was not that 25 per cent. of the women in the London Lock Hospital had left uncured in the last three years, and to that question you apparently assented at the time. This is the answer that was given by Mr. Lane in reply to Question 2435: "I gave some evidence in 1871 before the Royal Commission on this point. I gave three years; and it was found that in each of those three years, as nearly as possible, 25 per cent. went out uncured." Therefore the three years to which Mr. Lane refers were three years before the year 1871?—Quite so.

4371. In the last three years, from 1879 to 1881, I find that the proportion was reduced from 25 per cent. to 20 per cent. if you will look at the answer to Question No. 2437; in 1879 the number who left uncured was 16·75 per cent.; and in 1880 the number who left uncured was 20·41 per cent.; so that the numbers are very uniform for these last three years, but they are less than they were 10 years ago?—Yes.

4372. So that you would understand, would you not, the evidence of Mr. Lane to show that the proportion of women leaving the Lock Hospital uncured in those 10 years, had fallen from

25 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

from 25 per cent. to 20 per cent., and had not remained at 25 per cent.?—I understand so.

4373. In the Appendix to the Report of that year, I find at page 457 a Paper, No. 6, put in by Mr. Lane; and in that Paper he gives the number of women left uncured in the years 1878, 1879, and 1880; and these are his figures: He says that the per-centage having increased in 1871, was 20·043; in 1879, it was 16·75, and in 1880, it was 15·41; those rapidly reducing figures being brought up to an average of something like 20, by adding the number of those discharged for misconduct?—I see it is so.

4375. You were also asked a good many questions by my honourable friend about the examination, and you were asked whether the women did not submit voluntarily to it; am I right in understanding your view to be this: that the younger women do not submit commonly to it?—Yes.

4376. And that their signing of the voluntary submission is, to your mind, no evidence of a consenting will?—Certainly not.

4377. But you said that the elder and more hardened women willingly consent because they have lost all trace of modesty in their compositions, and they feel that the examination adds to the value of their profession?—Yes.

4378. If it were the view of the Legislature that that so-called voluntary submission should be indeed voluntary, then would it not be your opinion that the consenting will, even assuming it to have existed at first, should continue?—Quite so.

4379. Can you regard a so-called voluntary submission signed willingly or unwillingly for a year ahead, as necessarily voluntary throughout the period of that year?—No, and it was commonly so we found at Plymouth.

4380. It is really inconsistent with reasonable notions to bind a person by a submission which you call voluntary during such a period of time as 12 months?—Quite so.

4381. That is a period of time during which the will may change and the submission cease to be really voluntary in its character?—Yes, especially when it is surrounded with such difficulties of the women getting off the register as I have experienced.

4382. You were asked also about the deterrent influences of the Acts, and I understand you not to believe on the whole in their deterrent effect?—I do not; the familiarity with vice which these women acquire in seeing what they see at the examination houses through the doors and amongst the other women, takes away their dread of the Contagious Diseases Acts, even when their influence over the women is exercised beyond what the Acts justify.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

4384. If there be anything deterrent in the Acts, it is supposed to be the periodical examination?—Yes.

4385. You, yourself, would say that, to a certain extent, the fear of that examination was primâ facie likely to deter, would you not?—I should say so.

4386. That is one side of the question; but it might operate in two ways; it might deter from the practice of prostitution, or it might lead to the practice of clandestine prostitution?—It might, and it does.

4387. I further understand you to say that that deterrent influence of the system of compulsory examination is in your mind overbalanced on the other side by the familiarisation of the mind of that class of the community with the practice of vice?—It is; that is my experience.

4388. I will put it in another way: supposing that the object of the Legislature were to enact a law which should deter young women from a life of prostitution and that were the sole object of the legislation, do you think it would occur to the mind of any sane legislator with that view to invent the system of compulsory periodical examination?—Certainly not.

4389. Do you think that there would be any difficulty whatever if that were the object of the Legislature in devising deterrent influences much more potent than this system can ever pretend to be?—I do not think that there would be any difficulty.

4390. You expressed the opinion that young women were led astray by the elder and more hardened prostitutes?—I did.

4391. We have the apparent fact of the reduction in the numbers of prostitutes in the subjected districts; how would you consider that reduction or that apparent reduction as affecting your view of the influence of those elder and more hardened women upon the younger ones?—The reduction as stated by the authorities carrying out these Contagious Diseases Acts does not fairly represent what I believe to be the number of prostitutes, inasmuch as we have seen that a larger proportion of women carry on their trade clandestinely, or at least unregistered, than those who are on the register. Besides, the increased money-getting abilities of those women under Government guarantee, and support generally, together with the better dress and better language of the women, tend very much to draw young women into vice.

4392. A young girl, for instance, an orphan, or whose parents are in extreme poverty, sees those engaged in vice recognised and not punished, and sees them flourishing, as we have been told, better paid, and better dressed; do not those facts, in your opinion, constitute an enormous temptation to female children, on the whole?—They do, and also to orphan children. I have been extremely pained to see that three or four of the orphan children brought up at the British Orphan School, at Stoke, near Devonport, have been drawn into this path of vice, after costing the benevolent societies hundreds of pounds; and I have here now the names of four or five young girls from the Patriotic School and other schools who were drawn upon the register, I conclude by such means as those which have been referred to.

4393. With regard to solicitation in the streets, and the temptation of the young of the other sex, it has been said (I think incorrectly) that the Acts have tended to diminish that solicitation; what is your opinion upon that subject?—That is not my experience. I have seen the young women fraternising thoroughly with the police who are engaged in carrying out these Contagious Diseases Acts, and congregating in the usual resorts where they may be found, and soliciting in their own way, by their shuffling feet, and by their slow walk; and so far from thinking that solicitation is less, my impression is that solicitation is greater, if by solicitation is meant successful means of inducing men to go with them.

4394. Would you say that solicitation had somewhat changed its form of late years, and had become less violent and less coarse in its manifestations?—Yes, it used to consist in laying hold of men in a half-drunken state, and making them go almost at their bidding. Now, both in London and elsewhere, that has been greatly modified.

4395. And the change for the better, as far as outward decency is concerned, is to be found not only in the subjected districts but elsewhere?—Equally so.

4397. On the contrary, have any of your subscribers objected to the line which you and your Rescue Society have taken?—I only remember one, and he is an admiral, whose name I will not mention, and whose daughter is actually seeking now from our Homes co-operation in the rescue of the young women. When I announced to some of our friends that this gentleman had withdrawn his subscription of four guineas a year, I found that the subscriptions doubled and trebled, and more than that, by those who agree with us in the view that we take of these Acts.

4398. There is another point upon which you desire to offer an opinion of your own: the women used to be furnished with evidence that they had been in the examination room; that was felt to be objectionable, as being a kind of license, and as a kind of evidence, always available in their hands, of their being free from disease; have you any special opinion which you wish to express upon that subject?—I have a number of papers here that were given to me years ago by women who sought to do wrong, and they gave these papers to me to show that they were free from disease. In subsequent years, in conversing with these women, I found that these papers had been withdrawn, and the statement that they have made to me is this: that whereas the papers were a source of profit to them, acting as they did as medical certificates, those papers having been withdrawn, their withdrawal seemed at first to stand in their way of profit; but as time rolled on, it became known to all the inhabitants of the places that they were Government women, as they were called Queen's women, as they called themselves, and were regularly under examination; and they came to the conclusion that that being so, they being known by all the inhabitants and soldiers to be under Government supervision, the papers were not needed, and that if they were accused of being in a diseased state, the whole responsibility, instead of resting upon them, rested upon the Government employees, the medical men who examined them. This I found to be general amongst them, and it appeared to me to be a point which ought to be noted.

4399. Practically speaking, in their minds, that change of withdrawing this notice paper from them affected no alteration in the conditions under which they lived?—Quite so; that was the effect.

4400. Their re-appearance after the examination was itself a certificate of their having undergone that examination, and having been found fit for their trade?—Yes.

4401. And they became convinced that it was so accepted by the men with whom they consorted?—Exactly.

4402. And therefore I understand you to say, that they felt to some extent released from responsibility in looking after their own health, which they regarded as a Government concern?—Yes, that has been very strongly impressed upon me by them, that whether men got the disease or not, or whether they proved to be diseased or not, it was not their fault, that they had no responsibility in the matter, and that the whole responsibility would rest upon the Government.

4403. Going back to the figures that you gave us connected with your own institution, you gave us a return of 234, what you call preventive cases, the majority of whom were unfallen; could you describe more particularly what was the nature of those cases, and how you came across them?—I made a note of those cases, and in brief they were of this character: bad girls who were influencing them to go upon the streets; that was one class of cases. In another the mother keeps a brothel and the girl is illegitimate; I found that circumstance in several cases, and in one especially, the mother was keeping a brothel, and the girl was only 15. In another case, a girl of 15 was a servant in a brothel, there were three cases of that kind, the latter one being a girl from a Soldiers' Daughters' Home, who was found in a brothel. Another class of case was, that of servants to prostitutes, and in one case of a girl of 17, I found, from questioning her, that she was well acquainted with the modus operandi of the Acts. Then there is another class of case of very young girls whose parents lived in vice. In a number of other cases they were associated with prostitutes; for instance, a girl of 12, and another of 16, and others of the same age. In other cases the girls were associated in with semi-prostitutes, if I may so call them, women who were not entirely abandoned to the streets. In other cases the sisters were on the streets, and there was one case of a girl of only 15 years of age who had fallen. In other cases the father was

25 April 1882.]

Mr. COOPER.

was an adulterer, and in other cases the mother was an adulteress. In another case, a girl of 14 was bidden to go upon the streets; in another, the girl was turned out of the house; in another, the sister was on the streets; in another, a sister was confined in the Lock Hospital; and in another case, a girl was found in a "gaff" with other girls.

4404. Then in the majority of those preventive cases, the poor girls were in extreme danger of falling?—Yes; and in many cases they had probably fallen, though we gave them the credit of not having fallen in order to place them in our preventive homes.

4405. You have told us that there has been of late years a very great stimulus given to the efforts of moral and religious-minded people to reclaim young women having fallen, or being on the eve of falling into a career of sexual vice; do you attribute that increased energy of late years to the existence of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—On the contrary, the Contagious Diseases Acts I should say would prevent them; in fact, so far as I know there has been no increase of accommodation in Homes as the result of the Acts; two Homes at Plymouth, I think, have been closed; one I know, if not two.

4406. Do you know of any new institutions of the kind, rescue societies of any description, which have been founded since the passing of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I know of none; I have the list of the whole of the institutions throughout the country, and I do not find that there has been one established since then.

4407. You are aware, are you not, that to many minds the idea of legislation of this description is recommended or excused on the ground of the doctrine of the necessity of sexual vice?—I am aware of that.

4408. Do you acquiesce in that doctrine?—I totally disapprove of it, as the result of many years' experience; and in alluding especially to the statement which is actually put forward, for instance, by Sir William Jenner and others, that greater evils would follow if prostitution were not allowed, I may state as the result of 30 years' experience, that I have had many cases brought before my notice both of young men and young women, and I have found that the only mode of dealing with those individual cases was to suggest to them entire disuse of any indulgence. I have had cases in which young women have been infinitely worse than young men, and in one case a girl of 15 has just now gone to a lunatic asylum suffering from that dreadful malady; and I have found that Christian effort and moral persuasion, and every inducement which could be brought to bear upon the mind and the heart to cease such indulgence, have been the only means to obtain that result, and it appears to me that the same applies to whole classes, as in Glasgow, for instance, where there is repression; there the source of temptation is lessened, the number of women is lessened, men are awakened to a consciousness that they ought not to indulge in this vice, and there is growingly less disposition to indulge. Therefore I believe that the doctrine of the necessity of this vice is most pernicious, and I look upon it as the root of this legislation.

4409. To put it in the most general way, you would say, would you not, in the first instance, that to your mind it was an act immoral in its nature, and in its powerful consequences for the Legislature to sanction or to recognise vice of this description?—Undoubtedly.

4410. And that the functions of law ought to be exercised in the direction of suppressing, as far as may be practicable, or at any rate of discouraging the practice of vice?—Yes.

4411. And am I right in further interpreting your meaning to be this: that you altogether disbelieve that there is any moral advantage at all in the existence under any conditions of prostitution?—Entirely.

4412. It is sometimes said that the existence of prostitutes saves the sanctity and purity of homes; is that your view?—No, on the contrary.

4413. Your opinion, I take to be this, therefore: that there is only one way to preserve purity and virtue, and that is to discourage vice?—In every way.

4414. Is it not the general experience, and would you not say from your own reading of history, that in those countries and in those parts of countries where there is little temptation, because there is little temptation, there is little vice?—Yes.

4415. And because there is little vice there is little difficulty to the young of either sex in leading a virtuous and continent life?—Quite so.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY, IN THE CHAIR.

The Rev. JAMES PATERSON GLEDSTONE, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

4416. You are Minister of the Congregational Church at Streatham Hill?—Yes.

4417. How long have you been in the Ministry?—Twenty years.

4418. You have read the Contagious Diseases Acts, and are familiar with their contents?—Yes.

4419. Would you state to the Committee your understanding of the provisions of those Acts?—I understand them to provide for the registration of all common known prostitutes, either by voluntary submission, or by magistrate's order, and for the periodical examination of such women by the medical officers appointed under the Acts.

4420. What do you understand to be the object of such examination?—To see whether a woman is free from disease, and if she is free, she is allowed to depart, and to continue her course of prostitution; and if she is found to be diseased, she is sent to an hospital and compulsorily detained there until discharged as cured, or incurable, as the case may be.

4421. For what period of time?—She may be detained for nine months.

4422. When you say that she is found free from disease, she is allowed to depart and continue her course of prostitution, you mean no more than that she is not prevented from following it?—She is not prevented from doing so.

4423. And the same happens upon her discharge from the hospital?—The same happens upon her discharge from the hospital.

4424. I will ask you by and bye to give us evidence of the opinion of the denomination to which you belong; but I will first ask what is your opinion of the morality or immorality of such legislative provisions?—The provisions seem to me to be immoral, because they practically give a license to the woman in the life that she has given herself to; they give her a status in her trade.

4425. You have referred to the voluntary submission, I think?—Yes; when I said that she might come under the Acts either by voluntary submission, or by a magistrate's order.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

4426. Take the case of voluntary submission; she, by that so-called voluntary submission, binds herself under legal penalties to submit to periodical examination during a certain period of time; is that the case?—Yes; it may be any length of time, as I understand it, less than 12 months, and not more than 12 months.

4427. However the time is inserted in the voluntary submission which she signs?—Yes.

4428. Would this be a correct expression of your opinion; that the taking of her so-called voluntary submission for a specific and somewhat lengthened period of time to periodical personal examination, subject to legal penalties in case of default, implies an intention to continue the practice of prostitution during that period of time?—It does; it seems to me that she practically says, that by that she means to live as a prostitute for that length of time.

4429. And that during that length of time the fact of her intention to live as a prostitute is recognised by the Government and by law?—Yes.

4430. And that is one of your objections?—It is.

4431. Are you able to say, not only from a priori reasoning, but from opinions and expressions which have come before your notice, that that impression on your own mind is shared by people viewing the subject from a very different point of view from yours. For instance, is that impression of legal and Government sanction to prostitution entertained by the prostitute class itself?—Quite so; and also by those who consort with them.

4432. That you would think the natural and probable moral effect of such legislation, and you have had evidence which convinces you that that has been its actual effect?—I should regard it as the inevitable result of the laws.

4433. Let me take you back to the so-called voluntary submission. The so-called voluntary submission is obtained under these circumstances, is it not: that the woman knows that if she does not sign this so-called voluntary submission she will be brought before a magistrate, and that she may may not improbably be condemned and compelled to undergo the examination in question?—That is the case.

4434. I am asking you your opinion only upon the morality of this legislation; for the moment I am diverging from the question of sexual immorality to another question; as a question of morals, as well as a constitutional question, does it appear to you objectionable to bind a person to submit to penal consequences in favour of fulfilling a certain obligation taken upon herself for a period of nine months?—It does.

4435. Within that period of nine months it is at least conceivable that the will may change?—Quite so.

4436. Is it, in your opinion, consistent with morals (I do not know whether you would be disposed to express an opinion upon the question of jurisprudence) that you should take a voluntary submission for a specific period during which you have no continuous evidence of the will remaining unchanged?—I think it is not right to do so.

4437. And if at any time during the nine months, or whatever period it may be for which that voluntary submission has been signed, the will changes, then in your opinion, is the examination made in spite of the opposing will of the woman who is compelled by her so-called voluntary submission to undergo it?—I suppose it is until she can take the steps which are provided by the Act of Parliament for her leaving this kind of life.

4438. You have just referred to certain steps which the Acts of Parliament provide that a woman, having signed a voluntary submission to undergo an examination every fortnight (which implies, we will suppose, six months, if you do not take the extreme time) may take, if during that time she desires to leave the life of prostitution; and certain methods are provided by which she may be permitted to do so and to escape the necessity of this examination; that is so, is it not?—Yes.

4439. But are not those methods themselves, in your opinion, open to moral objections, because they oppose a difficulty in the way of leaving that life of prostitution?—I think it is one of the greatest blots of the Acts that they make it so difficult for a woman to leave this life when she wishes to do so.

4440. The voluntary submission, in your opinion, therefore, sanctions the life of prostitution by assuming its continuance for a specific and somewhat lengthened period; and the proceedings which are necessary to free the woman from that examination during the period, if she desires to quit her life, you regard as a difficulty in the way of her returning to the path of virtue?—I regard them as difficult and discouraging to her.

4441. At the end of the period of voluntary submission, whatever it may be, what happens?—Then she can submit again, as she did before; or the policeman can apply for a magistrate's order to see that she is made to submit.

4442. The whole process is recommenced ab initio?—It is.

4443. The same so called voluntary submission, or the magistrate's order?—Yes.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

4444. And the same difficulties are put in the way of her return to a life of virtue?—Yes, and the second six months would be like the first.

4445. If you take the case of an ordinary unregistered prostitute in a district not under the Contagious Diseases Acts, do any such difficulties stand in her way in returning to a life of virtue?—No, as soon as she chooses to give up prostitution she may.

4446. Do you know, as a matter of fact, that since the Contagious Diseases Acts have been enacted there has, in the subjected districts every year, been a tendency to an increase in the age of the prostitutes who are registered in these districts?—I understand there is.

4447. Captain Harris's tables show that, do they not?—They do.

4448. Therefore, Captain Harris's tables conclusively show, do they not, in your opinion, that the effect of the Contagious Diseases Acts is to retain women longer than they would otherwise remain in the practice of the profession of prostitution, either by the difficulties interposed in the way of returning to a life of virtue, or by the special attractiveness given to a life of vice, or by both combined?—Quite so.

4449. Have you before you Captain Harris's Return for the year 1880?—Yes.

4450. Have you there, added up in manuscript, the total number of cases in which the women have been examined during the operation of the Acts up to the year 1880?—The number given is 504,607.

4451. That is the total of column No. 22 in Captain Harris's return, No. 1?—It is.

4452. Then you gather from the total of the column No. 22, that during the operation of the Acts there have been 504,607 cases of examination?—Yes.

4453. Can you tell us, by reference to the same return, column 20, the proportion of those cases in which the women were found free from disease, and were consequently dismissed to continue, if they choose, their sinful avocations?—The total number is 457,242.

4454. In 457,242 cases out of 504,607 cases the women were dismissed free to return to the practice of their profession?—Yes.

4455. The residue amounted to 47,365, does it not?—Yes.

4456. And that is about one-tenth of the whole?—It is.

4457. In about one-tenth of the number of cases the women were sent into hospital?—Yes, and nine-tenths of them were allowed to go free, being without disease.

4458. After passing through the hospital they would be equally allowed to go free, and to return to the pursuit of their profession?—Yes.

4459. But, in about nine-tenths of the cases of those examinations, they were at liberty to return directly and immediately to a life of prostitution?—Directly and immediately.

4460. Is it not your view, therefore, that nine out of every ten of these personal examinations are practically made for the absolutely immoral purpose of ascertaining that the woman is apparently in a condition physically fit to conduct the business of a prostitute?—It is.

A A 3

4461. The

28 April 1882.]

Rev. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

4461. The examination in nine out of every ten cases can fulfil no other purpose?—There is no other purpose that it can fulfil that I can see.

4462. And each time that this examination is conducted it is made known to her, is it not, at what period she will have to come up for another examination?—She receives a notice paper on which it is stated when she must appear again.

4463. These examinations are periodical, are they not?—They are fortnightly, I understand.

4464. Therefore, as I understand you, every fortnight this disgusting procedure of the personal and instrumental examination of these women is gone through in nine cases out of ten, simply to ascertain that they are fit to minister to the lusts of men, with little danger to those men?—That is the result of it, to my mind.

4465. Some medical and official witnesses have put before us their view that these examinations cannot be very objectionable, because they are similar to examinations which modest women have to undergo, and which, when necessary, they do not shrink from undergoing in their own case; do not the circumstances to which I have now been drawing your attention, in your opinion, make the two classes of cases absolutely unanalogous?—There is no parallel between them, in my judgment, because, in the one case, the examination takes place because there is disease, and in order to discover what it is, so that it may be alleviated or removed.

4466. And with the absolute concurrent will, at the moment, of the woman herself?—At her desire. But in the other case there is no disease, and there is an investigation made in order that it may be ascertained whether there is disease or not.

4467. I know you are familiar with the Report of the Royal Commission; would you read to us the view of the Royal Commission upon the subject of these examinations?—On page 14 of the Report of the Contagious Diseases Commission they say: "We may remark that the case of a modest woman submitting her person to a medical examination by a private practitioner, and that of a prostitute coming up every fortnight to be examined by a medical officer are very different. Assuming that in either case the operation is conducted with an equal regard to decency, the object with which it is performed makes all the difference. In the one case the examination is voluntary, occasional, and may never be repeated. In the other the examination is compulsory and regular, and instituted, not because the woman is diseased or even suspected of being diseased, but because she may be diseased."

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4468. Will you proceed to read the next sentence?—"Whatever may be the moral effect of the periodical examination on the public women we are assured that a large proportion, if not the majority of them, appreciate the benefit of a vigilant watch over their health, and that the regular attendance at the examination room has wrought an improvement in their demeanour, dress, and general condition."

Mr. Stansfeld.

4469. I will ask you a question or two upon the additional sentence which you have been asked to read. I am examining you upon your view of the morale of this legislation. It is stated in this Report of the Royal Commission that a large proportion of the prostitutes appreciate the benefit of a vigilant watch over their health; you know, do you not, that the prostitutes, and especially the older prostitutes, approve of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I understand that they do.

4470. And it does not surprise you to be told that they approve of legislation which has given in their minds a certain sanction to their calling and largely increased their practice?—Not at all.

4471. The Royal Commissioners say that the regular attendance at the examination room of these women has wrought an improvement in their demeanour, dress, and general condition; judging from a moral point of view, do you think it advisable or right, that by law and Government, and public expenditure, you should endeavour to improve the demeanour and dress, and general condition of women whom you induce to remain longer in a life of prostitution?—I think not. I think that by doing so you become an accomplice with them in their evil life.

4472. And you think that by doing so you probably increase the demand which prostitution can supply?—I do.

4473. You increase the attractiveness of the prostitutes and you increase the practice of the sin of fornication in the country?—I should say so.

4474. You are aware of the avowed purpose and object of this legislation as expressed on the face of the preamble and title of the Acts?—It is expressed as "for the better prevention of contagious diseases at certain naval and military stations."

4475. The avowed object, therefore, of this legislation is the prevention or diminution of venereal diseases at certain places?—Yes.

4476. Do you find it easy to accept that definition of the object of this legislation?—I do not find it easy, because if that were the real object the laws ought to be made to apply to the men as well as to the women. Men propagate the disease as well as women, and the laws do not touch the men.

4477. The Contagious Diseases Acts do not provide for the examination of men?—They do not include men at all.

4478. It appears to you, does it not, to be an absurdity to suppose that the avowed object of the Acts can be accomplished by the examination of one sex alone?—I think it is absurd.

4479. If the examination of one sex alone could be supposed to effect any diminution of disease amongst that sex (upon which I will not ask you a question, because we have had evidence upon that subject), of what object would it be, to your mind, evidence?—The object, to my mind is simply that the men may be made safe, if it be possible, in their indulgence of vice.

4480. You cannot carry the object further in your judgment of Acts whose operation is limited to the examination of the persons of a certain class of women?—No, I cannot carry it further.

4481. They

28 April 1882.]

Rev. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

4481. They are Acts designed, therefore, in your mind, for the protection of men against women, and not for the equal protection of women against men in respect of the communication of this disease?—That is their object.

4482. And that, in your mind, is an immoral characteristic of this legislation?—It is immoral, and, as between the two persons, it is unjust.

4483. And, taking a broad view of the use of the term, to your mind, that injustice is, in itself, an immorality?—That injustice is, in itself, an immorality, and, from a sanitary point of view, I regard the arrangement as absurd.

4484. That is to say, the examination of women only?—The examination of women only, if the object of the Acts be to prevent disease.

4485. You take it, therefore, that the basis of all the enactments is the assumed necessity for making provision for the gratification of sensual passions in men with as little danger of physical injury as possible?—That is the view that I take.

4486. What, in your opinion, as a moralist and a Christian minister, must be the inevitable influence of legislation with such objects, and limited to such objects, upon the minds of men, and particularly upon the minds of young men?—I think it must be very demoralising, because it is presenting to them the hope of sinning with impunity, and therefore is likely to lead them on in sin.

4487. When by law, and government, and public expenditure you offer to the young the hope, at any rate, of being enabled to sin in this respect with physical impunity, do you not, in your opinion, convey to the minds of the young something like the sanction of law and government to the committal of that sin?—I should say so.

4488. Government and law recognise the practice of prostitution, and provides for its being, as far as possible, innocuous; and they point out, do they not, women whom, under their especial care, they recommend to the use of persons requiring such women?—Yes, all women who are abroad in the streets in subject places are supposed to have been at the examination room, and to be abroad because they are free from disease.

4489. You have no doubt, have you, that, in many cases, the prospect of immunity from disease, however fallacious, leads to vicious courses on the part of young men?—I cannot doubt that.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4490. Is that a matter of opinion of yours, or do you know it as a fact in any particular cases?—I judge, from what I know of human nature, that it would be likely to tend that way. It is a matter of opinion and evidence, which it seems that I cannot lay before the Committee; evidence which satisfies me; but, as I have it not first hand, it would not satisfy the Committee, and therefore it is of no use my stating it.

Mr. Stansfeld.

4491. But I would ask you particularly this (it is a subject upon which I myself have a strong opinion): is it not your belief that this legislation is calculated especially to operate immorally 0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

upon the minds of very young men, and to bring about an indulgence in vicious habits earlier in life than might otherwise be the case?—I should think so, because they get accustomed to the idea of these women being under Government supervision, and kept in a state of health, as far as may be.

4492. Therefore, you would expect such legislation to lead to precocious indulgence on the part of young men in sexual vice?—I should.

4493. Have you read Mr. Krause's evidence given before this Committee?—I have not.

4494. But it would certainly be in accordance with your expectation, judging from your knowledge of the young, that that injurious effect might be produced upon their minds?—I would state all that I think upon this subject in this sentence; that the greatest incitement to guilt is the hope of sinning with impunity.

4495. But I am asking you particularly with reference to the very young; the boy emerging into manhood, and who has not yet committed himself to sexual vice; is he not, to put it in the plainest way, likely to embark in the practice of sexual vice at an earlier age under legislation of this kind than without it?—I should say so, upon the principle that I have already stated.

4496. And I would ask you further, whether putting physical considerations out of the question, the few years between boyhood and manhood are not, morally speaking, of intense importance with a view to the future life of the man?—I think that what he is as a youth he will probably be as a man.

4497. And that if you debar him from dangerous temptation for two or three years at that critical period of a boy's or a young man's life, you do an immense moral benefit, and you give him a far better moral chance?—I think so. I think that the chances of his turning out a good man will be very greatly increased.

4498. The provisions of the Contagious Diseases Acts being purely against diseases, the natural inference would be, would it not, in the mind of the young, that it was wrong to run the danger of disease, but not wrong to indulge in the practice of fornication?—I should say that they would judge in that way.

4499. Do these general inferences of yours find confirmation, not only in the limited purposes of the express legislation continued in the Acts, but in the deficiencies of the Acts themselves?—Yes; the Acts make no provision for the suppression of brothels, or for the suppression of prostitution, or for the reclamation of prostitutes. The only provision is for the examination of the women.

4500. Section 36 of the Act of 1866, with regard to brothels, is the only penal section, is it not?—Yes; the effect of that section is, that if a brothel keeper has women who are diseased, he is liable to a penalty; I forget what the penalty is.

4501. Therefore, so far as these Acts are concerned, there is no penalty against a brothel keeper if he fulfils the object of the Acts and takes care to have healthy women only under his control?—None; and, therefore, it seems to me that they become incorporated with the law.

4502. In fact, the brothel keeper becomes an instrument

28 April 1882.]

Rev. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

[Continued.]

instrument in carrying out the policy of these Acts?—He does.

4503. You are aware, are you not, that that is followed by certain practical and inevitable consequences; you are aware, are you not, that the Contagious Diseases Acts Police make daily visits to the brothels to see that the women attend regularly and to register the names of new comers?—I believe they do.

4504. Must it not, in your opinion, be perfectly well known to the keepers of those establishments that, so far as the Contagious Diseases Acts' police are concerned, they will be left undisturbed in the pursuit of an illegal occupation, if they take care that their women shall go up regularly for examination?—They know that they are then working within the limits of these Acts.

4505. The keeping of a brothel is an illegal act, is it not?—It is an illegal act, but not under these Acts.

4506. It is an illegal because an immoral occupation; nevertheless we have, under these Acts, have we not, special centralised police sent down to certain districts to come into daily contact with the pursuers of this immoral and illegal calling, and practically to protect them in that calling if they conform to the policy of the Acts?—Police are sent down from London to all those stations to carry the Acts out.

4507. Are you sufficiently acquainted with the Acts to know whether their visits are paid by permission of the brothel keepers, or have they the right of entry?—They have not the right of entry, I understand, by law; they can only go into the house by permission of the brothel keeper; and, therefore, in giving that permission, the brothel keeper is acting with the police who are carrying out the law.

Chairman.

4508. You mean under the Acts?—Under the Acts.

Mr. Stansfeld.

4509. And the whole aspect, as well as the reality of the relations between the police and the brothel keepers, in your mind is one of co-operation for the purpose of carrying out the objects of this legislation?—Co-operation and friendliness.

4510. I need hardly ask you whether, under those circumstances, you do not consider the Acts and the practice of daily visits by the Contagious Diseases Acts' police under them to amount to a licensing of the brothels?—I think I stated it at the beginning, that I regarded it as a license.

4511. We had the Rev. Prebendary Wilkinson before us some time ago, and I think he did not share your opinion, but he gave a definition of a license. At Question 5056, my honourable friend the Member for West Aberdeenshire asked him this: "We have heard the word 'license,' used; but is not a license a thing which permits a traffic which would not otherwise be permitted to exist?—(A.) I should think so. (Q.) Then we can hardly call this State recognition of prostitution a license?—(A.) One would be direct, and the other may, perhaps, be called indirect recognition." But, direct or indirect, it is, in your mind, a recognition and a license?—It is, in my mind, recognition and license.

4512. Here is an unlawful calling; but as far as the operation of the centralised police is concerned, that unlawful calling is to be permitted to be carried on daily in co-operation with the police itself; is that your view?—That is my view.

4513. You are aware, are you not, that moral and religious instruction is provided, not for any man under the Acts, but for the women who are found on examination to be diseased, and who are imprisoned in hospitals?—According to the Acts, a chaplain is appointed to attend to the morals of these women when they are in hospital.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4514. Section 12 of the Act of 1866 is the one that the Right honourable Gentleman is referring to, and it runs thus: "A hospital shall not be certified under this Act unless, at the time of the granting of a certificate, adequate provision is made for the moral and religious instruction of the women detained therein under this Act; and if at any subsequent time it appears to the Admiralty or the Secretary of State for War, that in any such hospital adequate provision for that purpose is not made, the certificate of that hospital shall be withdrawn?"—That is the clause; and the "adequate provision," so far as I have any knowledge of it, amounts to a chaplain being provided in each of those places.

Mr. Stansfeld.

4515. A similar provision, to say the least, is made in the voluntary Lock Hospitals, is it not?—A similar provision is made in all hospitals of which I have any knowledge.

4516. Would you not expect such ministrations to be more effectual in a voluntary hospital than in one in which the patients were compulsorily detained?—I should; and I should think it was a great advantage in the voluntary hospital that ministers of religion have free access to them, and can see patients there at almost any time; every facility is offered to them to go and see patients.

Chairman.

4517. You mean ministers other than the chaplain?—Ministers other than the chaplain; but in the hospitals that are under the Acts such facilities are not offered.

Mr. Stansfeld.

4518. Do you find confirmation of your opinion in any figures in Captain Harris's Return?—According to Captain Harris's Return, No. 1, column 23, out of a total number of 47,365 cases sent into the hospital during the entire period of the operation of the Acts, no less than 40,959, or about 86 per cent., are known to have returned to their former evil pursuits.

4519. Of course that does not mean 47,365 women?—No; it means cases. It may be the same women many times over. Then further on he says: "are known to have returned to their former evil pursuits;" how many there may be that he does not know, of course cannot be stated.

4520. If

28 April 1882.]

Rev. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

4520. If you take that fact and couple it with the fact of the constantly increasing age of prostitutes in the subjected districts, you would say, would you not, that there is evidence of a confirmation in their evil life by the operation and influence of those Acts?—I think it establishes and settles them in that evil life.

4521. Have you referred to the evidence of Dr. Cook, the chaplain of the Lock Hospital in the Harrow-road, and have you read his description of the Government patients as compared with ordinary patients?—Yes.

4522. Will you read that passage, and tell us whether you agree with it, so far as your own observation enables you to express an opinion?—At Question No. 2684 he was asked this: "What distinction is there between the two classes?" and his answer was as follows: "The distinction is this, and I think it is obvious to almost any one at first sight that the Government patients are horribly alike, at one dull, dead level. The ordinary patients are very mixed, some of more and some of less education, some of more and some of less refinement of appearance, but the Government patients are brutalised beyond description in appearance, and in manner. As I speak to them it is painful." That is the result which I should expect to follow the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts.

4523. Are you able to say, from any knowledge of your own, whether the registered women in these districts are more difficult of reclamation than other women leading a life of prostitution?—From information gathered in one of those districts, I should say that they are more difficult to reclaim.

4524. If the fact be, as shown by Captain Harris's Return, that the tendency of the Acts is to keep women in the practice of prostitution to a more advanced age, that would be conclusive, would it not, in your mind, that these women must become more hardened, and more incapable of reclamation?—Certainly; whatever modest feelings they may have had, whatever revulsion from the Acts they may have had at first, must have passed away, or they would not continue in that life.

4525. And if they are kept in the practice of their profession, not merely by the difficulty of leaving it, but by the superior attractions which this system holds out to them of more custom and better pay, and careful watching of their health by State paid doctors, that you would think would be immoral, as affording an increased temptation to other young women to follow in their steps?—Yes, I take the language of the Report of the Royal Commission as my language on that subject.

4526. Can you describe to us accurately the proceedings which a woman must take before she can practically free herself from this life and from the periodical examination?—A written request for liberation from the requirements of the Acts has to be sent to a magistrate or to the examining surgeon. Either an appearance has to be made before the magistrate and satisfaction given to him, or the approval of the surgeon has to be gained. In every case the examining surgeon has to certify that the woman is free from disease, and the policeman has to give his assurance that she is not living as a prostitute. Thus those two men, or either of them, may keep her on the register; and the removal from the register is difficult and discouraging, and therefore calculated to perpetuate vicious habits when otherwise they might be forsaken.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

4527. These precautions and proceedings may be necessary from the point of view of the Acts, in order that a woman may not escape registration and examination, and yet practise prostitution; that you admit?—Quite so.

4528. But nevertheless your view I take it is this: that even if they are to be justified on that ground, they inevitably interpose difficulties in the way of the return of a woman desirous of returning to a more virtuous life?—The Acts are objectionable to my mind on that very score: that if they are to be carried out thoroughly, it makes it very difficult for a woman who has come under their operation to get back to a better life if she wants to do so.

4529. Is it not the fact that many of these women cannot write?—I understand so.

4530. And, therefore, they have to appeal to some one else to assist them in addressing that written request?—Yes.

4531. With regard to the medical profession itself, so far as it is concerned in the administration of these Acts, do you deprecate the moral influence upon that profession?—I deprecate the moral influence very much. I think that the work which the doctors under these Acts have to do is itself a degrading and a demoralising thing.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4532. Do you mean demoralising to the doctors?—Demoralising to the doctors.

Mr. Stansfeld.

4533. There are, as you know, medical men who share your opinion?—There are medical men who share my opinion, and the number of such, I believe, is increasing.

4534. Can you read us an expression of opinion upon this subject which you are disposed to accept and approve?—Yes, I accept and approve this: "There is nothing which would tend more to deprive medicine of the rank of a respectable calling than the fact that practitioners should be found willing to lend themselves to the dirty work of examining prostitutes, in order to enable them to carry on their trade. If the heads of the profession, or the colleges, ever desire an opportunity of protecting their members from degradation, here is one."

4535. For all the reasons upon which we have been going, I understand your opinion to be that these Acts are absolutely immoral, both in principle and in practice?—They are immoral in principle and in practice.

4536. Is the opinion which you have thus expressed also the opinion of the great majority of the religious body to which you belong?—It is the opinion of the great majority of the body to which I belong.

4537. Naturally no such body could be unanimous upon any subject outside the opinions which bind them together as a body?—There is not perfect unanimity in my denomination, but the great weight of opinion is against these Acts.

4538. Will you describe to the Committee the action taken by the Congregationalists from time to time with regard to the question of the continuance or the repeal of this legislation?—I would refer first of all to a memorial which was signed by 885 Congregational ministers.

4539. Out of how many in your body is that?—There are now 2,549, but in 1873, the date when this memorial was sent to Mr. Gladstone, the number would not be so large, perhaps a few hundreds less. In 1873 a memorial was sent to Mr. Gladstone, and was presented to him by Mr. Samuel Morley, signed by 885 ministers of our denomination. My own name is amongst the number, and there is one sentence in that memorial which so well expresses much of the evidence that I have given this morning, that, if I may be permitted to do so, I should like to read it: "If the State, at vast public cost, prepares a great highway, provides a special department to keep it in repair, and assures men that it is safe, it is idle at the same time to try to prove that frequenting it is an act of trespass."

4540. Is that the only passage to which, at this moment, you wish to refer?—There is another passage which I should like to refer to. "Your memorialists further submit that there are two sorts of recognition of any existing evil by the State. The law recognises other evils by punishment, or by attempting to put an end to them. The law in these Acts recognises prostitution by regulation, and by affording assistance to continue it with impunity, which your memorialists submit gives a direct sanction to profligacy, and threatens disastrously to confuse the moral sense of the nation." It is upon that last point that I should like to lay special emphasis; that it threatens disastrously to confuse the moral sense of the nation.

4541. Will you put in that memorial?—Yes. (The same was handed in.) I should like to refer specially to the action which has been taken by what are called, in my denomination, the county unions. Those are unions of churches within the bounds of each county. The ministers and delegates from the various churches meet at certain times of the year for the purpose of transacting business, and also, sometimes, of pronouncing a judgment upon public questions of importance, especially if those questions have a moral aspect. The subject has been brought before many of these county unions from time to time, and resolutions condemnatory of the Contagious Diseases Acts have been passed. The subject has been several times before the Yorkshire Union; it has been twice before the Lancashire Union, and it has been before the Cumberland and Westmoreland Union, the Derbyshire Union, the Northumberland and Durham Union, the Lincolnshire Union, the Shropshire Union, the Hampshire Union (where there are three places that are under the operation of the Acts, and where, of course, the work done under the Acts is well known to the ministers and delegates), the Sussex Union, the Somersetshire Union, the

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

Staffordshire Union, the Nottinghamshire Union, the Monmouthshire Union, the Denbigh and Flint Union, and the Carmarthen Union. There may be some other unions that I do not remember that have passed resolutions, but I remember all those that I have given.

4542. Have you passed any resolutions upon the subject of these Acts at the annual meetings of the Congregational Union?—We passed a resolution at the annual meeting in May 1881.

4543. Have you that resolution?—I have.

4544. Will you read it?—"That this assembly of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, believing that the purpose for which Civil Government exists is to maintain righteousness, and to be a terror to evil doers, and a praise to them that do well, feels bound to record its deliberate condemnation of the laws known as the 'Contagious Diseases (Women's) Acts,' First: Because being framed for the purpose of securing for our soldiers and sailors immunity from the dangerous and painful physical consequences of gross immorality in its most degrading form, they directly countenance vice, and are a standing outrage to public morals. Secondly: Because they bestow upon prostitution a legal recognition and status. Thirdly: Because the powers invested in a single magistrate upon the information of a single policeman without witnesses, jury, or express charge, to sentence, to insult and outrage, or to imprisonment, helpless women, who may possibly be virtuous and innocent, who, in any case, have been convicted of no legal offence, is a grave and dangerous violation of English liberty. Lastly: Because even if not extended over the whole country (as if sound in principle, they ought to be), the influence of these laws extends far beyond the class for whose supposed benefit they are enacted, viz., soldiers and sailors, and tends powerfully to corrupt the youth of our nation to debase public sentiment concerning the relation of the sexes, and thus to undermine public virtue."

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4545. Was that passed unanimously?—No, there was a long discussion.

Mr. Stansfeld.

4546. I understood you not to be prepared to give credit to the return of prostitutes under the age of 16, in recent years at Southampton, in Captain Harris's return?—I do not give credit to those returns.

4547. Those returns, of course, only speak of registered prostitutes?—That is all.

4548. But what I understand you to mean is this, that you believe there is a considerably larger amount of juvenile prostitution in Southampton than Captain Harris's return would suggest?—Yes.

4549. Without going into figures, have you made statements of that kind at public meetings in Southampton, and have those statements been accepted or refuted?—I have made that statement at public meetings at Southampton, and it never was questioned, except upon one occasion, and that was at a meeting held in the Watts'

Memorial

Memorial Hall, one of the largest buildings in Southampton; and when it was questioned, I mentioned the name of my informant, who happened to be at the meeting, and no further exception was taken to what I said.

4550. Now I would pass on to the opinions of your own body recorded in the resolution which you have brought before us; am I right in understanding that you have, yourself, canvassed the opinions of all the ministers of the Congregational body?—I have canvassed the opinions of the whole of the ministers of the body to which I belong.

4551. You have told us that the total number of ministers at present is 2,549?—That was the total number in England and Wales last year.

4552. Did you canvass them by letter?—I did.

4553. And you invited an expression of their opinion upon the subject of this legislation?—I asked for a direct expression of opinion upon this subject.

4554. You have given us a total of 2,549 ministers; how many sent you written answers absolutely favouring the total repeal of these Acts?—One thousand nine hundred and fifty out of 2,549.

4555. How many wrote to you in favour of the retention of these Acts?—Sixteen.

4556. Did any write to you in favour of their extension to the country at large?—I think I can remember two at least; I cannot charge my memory with more.

4557. Did any express themselves as neutral?—Six expressed themselves as neutral.

4558. And the residue gave no reply?—The residue gave no reply.

4559. You have spoken of the Congregational ministers at the present day in England and Wales; will you divide them and give us the figures for each?—There are 2,028 Congregational ministers in England and, of those, 1,530 were in favour of the repeal of the Acts.

4560. That is what proportion?—Just three-fourths. There are 521 Congregational ministers in Wales, and, out of that number, 415 are for the repeal of the Acts. That is rather a larger proportion; it is about four-fifths as compared with three-fourths in England.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4561. The date of this resolution of which you speak was May 1881, was it not?—It was passed in May 1881.

4562. I suppose that was the last annual meeting that you have had, was it not?—It was.

4563. I think you said that the resolution was not passed unanimously?—It was not passed unanimously.

4564. Was there not a good deal of opposition to it?—There was a very earnest opposition to it on the part of a certain number of men.

4565. Did not Mr. Bompas oppose it?—Mr. Bompas opposed it, but I think Mr. Bompas's standing in the Union might have been questioned, though we did not question it. Mr. Bompas really is a Baptist, and not an Independent; it was, I think, a mere matter of courtesy that he was allowed to speak, or to vote on the occasion.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

4566. Was there a division upon it?—There was a vote taken.

4567. What were the numbers?—The numbers were not counted, but the majority in favour of the repeal was very large; the meeting, I may say, was a very large one, and it lasted for a long time.

4568. But there was, if I remember aright, rather an earnest discussion upon the subject?—There was a very earnest discussion.

4569. Was there an excited discussion?—There was an exciting discussion.

4570. What is your actual personal knowledge of these subjected districts; you do not live in any of them, I suppose?—I do not live in them.

4571. Have you ever lived in any of them?—I have never lived in them; I have visited some of them.

4572. Could you state, generally, for what length of time, and at what particular periods, you visited them?—In 1877 I was, I think, in different districts for about two months. Perhaps it would be better that I should mention the districts: Aldershot, Winchester, and Southampton. I have paid also a visit to Portsmouth, but I cannot say that I know anything about the condition of things there.

4573. Have you been in any of these districts since 1877?—Yes; I have been at Aldershot since 1877.

4574. When were you there?—Last year I was there.

4575. For what length of time?—Only for the day.

4576. With that exception, have you visited any other of these districts since 1877?—Not since 1877.

4577. You spoke of women experiencing difficulty, when once on the register, in giving up a life of prostitution; may I ask whether that was an inference drawn from your knowledge of human nature, or whether it was a statement founded upon knowledge of any specific cases in which individual women have experienced that difficulty?—It is an opinion based upon the provisions of the Act itself; the difficulty is there in the Act. A woman must do certain things, I do not mean before she can leave this life, but before she can leave it as a registered prostitute.

4578. It is an opinion based, in fact, upon reading the Act, and not upon a knowledge of actual facts?—I know of no cases.

4579. The statements in Captain Harris's returns show that the women who carry on the trade of prostitution in these subjected districts are older, in point of years, than they used to be; is not that so?—Yes.

4580. From that you draw the inference that they, having once entered upon a life of prostitution, continue in it for a longer period?—Yes, that is the inference I draw from that fact.

4581. Might it not be also owing to the fact that they enter upon a career of prostitution at a later age than formerly?—It might arise from that fact, but I think that is very unlikely.

4582. Why do you think it unlikely?—I think when women have reached the age of 25, or 26, or

B B 2

Rev. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

[Continued.]

or older, they would be less likely to be led astray than young girls.

4583. I do not know whether you have read the evidence of some of the witnesses who have been examined in support of the Acts?—I have read the evidence of one or two of the witnesses.

4584. Perhaps you will take it from me that there was evidence to show that the Acts operated as a deterrent, particularly in the case of the younger and less hardened women, and consequently that they were in the subjected districts deterred from entering upon a life of vice; assuming that to be so, would not that in itself account for the fact stated in Captain Harris's return, that the prostitutes in the subjected districts are older, as a general rule, than the prostitutes in the unsubjected districts?—I should require that assumption to be substantiated by figures; it is a matter of fact.

4585. But assuming that there are fewer young girls who enter upon a career of prostitution in the subjected districts, that of itself would account for the fact that the age of the prostitutes in the subjected districts was higher than in the unsubjected districts, would it not?—I should say that it was an assumption with all the assumptions against it.

4586. But I have not asked you that question; I have asked you whether, assuming that the facts are as alleged by the witness to whom I have referred, would not of itself account for the fact that the women who practice prostitution in the subjected districts are older than those in the unsubjected districts?—That would account for it.

4587. It is stated in Captain Harris's Report that, taking the whole total, only one-tenth of the cases examined were found in a diseased condition?—That is so.

4588. That would seem from a sanitary point of view to be a very satisfactory result, would it not?—It would seem to be so, looking at it on the surface.

4589. Of course you could not form any idea how many of these poor women, if it had not been for these examinations and for the medical treatment they received, would have died; I presume a great many of them would have died, would they not?—I cannot say whether they would, or not.

4590. As I gather from your evidence, your opinion is that the Acts are so intrinsically bad in themselves, that even such a satisfactory hygienic result as that would not influence you in any way in their favour?—It would have no influence over my mind.

4591. In fact you hold that the Acts are so bad that nothing that can be said in their favour would in the least change the opinion which you have formed of them?—It would not change my opinion, but I should hold myself free to examine into all these facts as they came under my observation.

4592. If you were told that the Acts operated so as to deter younger women from entering upon a career of vice, I suppose in the first place you would disbelieve that statement upon whatever evidence it was founded, would you not?—I should doubt the statement; I should say that the probabilities were on the other side.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

4593. But, supposing that it was proved to your satisfaction that they had had that effect, still you would think that that was not an argument worth taking into consideration in deciding whether the Acts should be continued, or not?—I should look further as to the effects of the Acts.

4594. I understand, therefore, that that alone would not weigh in the least with you?—That alone would not.

4596. Have you ever been inside one of those hospitals, and do you know what goes on in them?—I have been in a hospital, but not where the women were; I was only in the matron's department.

4597. You have never seen anything of the religious ministrations that go on there?—No, I have not been present; I am not aware that any one is permitted to go.

4598. There I may tell you that you are wrong. Are you aware that clergymen or ministers of any denomination, including your own denomination, have free access to any of their congregation who may be inmates of the Lock Hospital?—I was not aware of that; and I should make the remark upon that, that I think there would be very few for them to look after. It is not a place where I should expect to find any of my congregation.

4599. That may be so; but are you aware that in no case would the request of any minister, whether Nonconformist minister or clergyman of the Church of England, to see any women inside the hospital be refused?—I am not aware of that, and I should like to know whether he is at liberty to go and see any women, or whether the person he visits must be a member of his congregation.

4600. I believe it is the fact that if he expresses a request to see any particular woman that request would not be refused?—I am not aware that that is so.

Mr. Stansfeld.

4601. Do you believe it to be so?—I do not believe it from what I know of hospitals; and I think that to speak of ministers being free to see those of their flock who may be there is idle, because that is not a place where I should be likely to find any of my congregation. Now and again it might be so, but it would be very rarely.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4602. Are you aware that, by the rules of the certified hospitals, in no case would the request of any minister to see any woman in a certified hospital be refused?—I was not aware of it, and I do not think it is the practice.

4603. May I ask what are your grounds for saying that it is not the practice?—From what I have heard of hospitals, and what is done inside them.

4604. Do you know of any cases in which a minister

28 April 1882.]

Rev. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

[Continued.]

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

minister has asked leave to see any young woman, and it has been refused?—No.

4605. Leave has not been refused to you, has it?—No, I never made the application.

4606. Do you know anyone who has made the application?—No, I do not. I should like to say, with regard to that, that as no evidence has been given on the other side in support of the statement which has now been made (none has been made public that I have ever seen), I think I am fairly entitled to abide by my present doubt, at any rate, with regard to that.

4607. Assuming again that the religious ministrations which take place in these hospitals are what the Acts evidently intend them to be, that is to say, that they are adequate and are directed to the reclamation of the unfortunate women who are there, you would not consider that as an argument which could be urged in support of the Acts?—No; because the legalisation of the women's calling I hold to neutralise, and more than neutralise, anything that might be said by the chaplain.

4608. I should infer from your statement that the male population in those subjected districts, and especially the youthful part of the male population, are much more vicious than in the unsubjected districts; would not that be the natural result of what you have stated?—I should say that their temptations are very much greater.

4609. And their temptations being greater, it would follow, would it not, that their habits would become more vicious?—Their habits would become more vicious.

4610. That is of course a strong statement; have you any facts that you can give us in support of that statement?—I could refer to some evidence that was brought before the Royal Commission.

4611. That we have before us; that was as far back as 1870, was it not?—It was.

4613. Have you any means of comparing a seaport town like Hull, for instance, where the Acts are not in operation, and Southampton where they are in operation; could you give us any data within your own knowledge which lead you to the conclusion that the population of Southampton, and particularly the youthful male population, is more vicious than that of Hull, or is this mere surmise on your part?—I have never lived in Hull; but comparing other towns in which I have lived, and from which I can speak from my own observations, with Southampton, judging from the statements made to me by people in Southampton, I should say that there was more juvenile wrong doing in Southampton than in the other towns.

4615. At what time did you live in Sheffield?—I left Sheffield in 1872. I lived there 10 years, from 1862 to 1872.

4616. When were you last in Southampton?—In 1877.

4617. You cannot give us anything later than that?—No, nothing later than that.

4618. You spoke of the object of these Acts being to protect men against women; surely that must be subject to this qualification, must it not, that when you speak of women you speak of a particular class of women who carry on a profession which no man can carry on?—But I refer also to a particular class of men, and though they are not carrying on a trade in life, to my mind they are just as distinct as the women themselves.

4619. To what class do you refer?—Vicious men.

4620. Would you suggest that those men should be examined?—No, I object altogether to the principle of the State interfering to give guarantees beforehand that evil-doers shall be freed from the consequences of evil-doing.

4621. And you do not think that any advantage which may be shown to accrue from the Acts would outweigh that objection which you have against them?—No advantage would outweigh that objection.

4622. You spoke of the different county meetings that have been held by your body, in which these Acts have been discussed; what action has been taken in consequence of those county meetings?—Do you mean what action has been taken to bring the resolution forward?

4623. Was there any action taken upon the resolutions?—In some cases memorials and petitions have been signed and sent.

4624. May I ask whether a pressure has not been put upon the Members of the different counties and boroughs in which those meetings were held?—The resolutions were intended to put pressure upon Members; I mean pressure in this sense, to let Members know what was the opinion of that section of their constituencies.

4625. I think I may go a little further than that. Were not the resolutions pretty plainly directed to let the Members know that, even though this inquiry was pending, if they did not vote for the repeal of the Acts, the whole force of the religious organisation to which you belong would be directed against their return?—No, I cannot say that. Each man would act according to his own conviction. I never heard of one of our county unions, nor of our general union, being employed in any such way as you suggest. It could not be so.

B B 3

4626. Would

28 April 1882.]

Rev. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

4626. Would not that be the practical upshot of your meetings, and was it not the practical object of your meetings to put pressure upon Members, even though this inquiry was pending, to declare themselves opponents of the Acts?—I do not know that I can go so far as that, because, in the case of many of those unions that I have referred to (not all of them), for instance, in the Carmarthen Union, that resolution was passed only lately; and the same in the case of the Denbigh and Flint Union; but in the case of the others, the resolutions were passed before this Committee began to hold its sittings.

4627. In the Denbigh and Flint Union the resolution was passed quite recently, was it not?—It was passed in December last. The date at which the resolution of the Carmarthen Union was passed, I do not know, but I think it has been passed since that time.

4628. I suppose you will admit that you have been doing your best to influence Members of Parliament?—We have been doing our best to influence public opinion and Members of Parliament throughout the country.

Dr. Farquharson.

4629. Would you compare the license which I think you say is given to brothels by the Contagious Diseases Acts' machinery with that which is conferred, say on public-houses by the licensing magistrates?—No, I should not.

4630. Then do you think that the term is equally applicable in both cases?—I think the cases are different, because, in the case of a public-house, a man may go anywhere and get what he at any rate esteems to be refreshment, without falling into the sin of drunkenness, but, in the other case there are no degrees.

4631. I am only asking you with reference to the definition of the word "license," to which my former question referred; a license to a public-house confers a certain protection upon the public-house, does it not?—It does.

4632. That is to say, it cannot be shut up by anyone else unless the regulations are flagrantly disobeyed?—That is so.

4633. Does this assumed license to brothels in any way prevent a brothel being shut up by the ordinary police?—Not by the ordinary police or by any person outside; any neighbour, for instance, who might bring a charge against the house of its being a disorderly house.

4634. Then it confers no protection against the action of outsiders or the ordinary police?—Not so far as outsiders are concerned.

4635. Then do you think that the term "license" is strictly applicable; would not "recognition" be a better term?—I apply the term "license" to the woman, and not to the house.

4636. Then you do not assert that the Contagious Diseases Acts' machinery confers any license upon the house?—Not upon the house; there are persons in some of the subjected districts who think the houses are licensed; but I do not hold that opinion, save in this; that, so far as these Acts are concerned, the police who work them are on friendly terms with the keepers of the houses.

4637. We have heard about the voluntary submission being made for 12 months, but that is only the extreme verge of the limit; is it not the case that women very often sign a submission for three months, or even for one month?—I believe that evidence has been given to this Committee that old prostitutes sign for the longer period of time; for the full period of time; and, as the limit of age is increasing, I think it is fair to come to the conclusion that generally it is for the longer period.

4638. Section 32 of the Act says that a woman shall not sign the submission in any case for a longer period than one year; that does not mean that she must sign a voluntary submission for one year, does it?—I am quite aware of that.

4639. She may and often does sign a voluntary submission for three months, and sometimes even for one month?—She may do so.

4640. And often does so?—I do not know the figures. I take the evidence brought here by Inspector Annis. I believe that the old prostitutes sign for the longer period.

4641. Is it not the case that every woman on leaving the hospital, and on every occasion of her doing so, is de facto released from the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts, and may give up her trade whenever she is discharged cured from the hospital?—I suppose she can; but, as a matter of fact, she is always looked after by the police, and asked to sign the voluntary submission again.

4642. Is any policeman allowed to say anything to her if she does not return to pursue the trade of prostitution; and, supposing that the woman determines to give up the trade of prostitution, and does not return to her old haunts and place herself under suspicious circumstances, is a policeman allowed by the law to stop that woman as she comes out of the hospital, and tell her that she must resume signing the voluntary submission?—He is at liberty to ask her if she will do so.

4643. Supposing that she says, "I will not; I have given up my trade"?—Then she takes her own course, unless he further interferes with her.

4644. Then what is the great difficulty which you describe in her escaping from a life of prostitution?—The great difficulty is whilst she is a registered prostitute, not when she is discharged from the hospital.

4645. But the registration ceases when she is discharged from the hospital?—Yes, I understand it does.

4646. Therefore, on every occasion when she is admitted into hospital, she is at once freed from her trade if she likes?—She is free when she leaves the hospital.

4647. Therefore, the difficulty of her escaping from that life is not so very great?—I should think it would be very great; I should think it was a very serious thing to keep women of that kind waiting for such a length of time before they could be liberated; I should hold that the chances of their desiring to be liberated then would be greatly diminished.

4648. With reference to the age of prostitutes do Captain Harris's returns show that the age of registered prostitutes is greater now than that of the non-registered prostitutes, or only that the age of the prostitutes is greater now than it was some years ago?—He makes the comparison with those who are registered, and not with those who are unregistered.

of

4649. That rather leads to the conclusion, not that those in the subjected districts are increasing in age, and that in the unsubjected districts they are not increasing in age, but that all women practising the profession of prostitutes are older than they used to be?—It is to the subjected districts only that Captain Harris's comparisons refer.

4650. With regard to the examinations, I think you stated that there was no analogy between the examination of prostitutes, and that occasionally carried on of virtuous women in hospitals; but is there not this amount of analogy: that they are both undergone for the same purpose, viz., for the purpose of detecting and curing disease?—In the one case the virtuous woman knows that she is unwell and feels unwell, but in the case of a prostitute it is not so; in nine-tenths of the cases there is no disease, and, therefore, I take it, no reason to suspect disease.

4651. But though the woman may feel unwell she does not know that she has any disease in that particular part, and very often the examination is carried on merely, for what I may call, diagnostic purposes?—It may be so; but the woman knows in the one case that she is unwell, and in the other case there is no such feeling.

4652. Then is the immoral influence that you speak of on the mind of the woman herself, or on the minds of the public in these examinations?—I think that the immoral influence is upon the woman and upon the doctor who examines her, and upon the outside public who know of such abominations going on.

4653. Is there anything much worse or more degrading in an instrumental examination of this sort, than in the actual process of her trade, which she carries on from day to day?—I should say that it was worse; but my mind would not be affected by a comparison of that kind, as to which was the worse; they are both bad.

4654. I think you say that it would be absurd to attempt to check disease by examining one sex alone; but why should it be absurd?—Because you are letting the others who carry about the seeds of disease go free.

4655. But I suppose you admit that venereal disease may be communicated by women to men?—Yes.

4656. Then, if you get a certain number of diseased women, and put them into hospital, that must prevent the dissemination of a certain amount of disease, must it not?—I do not know that I should be prepared to admit that, because I think that the men may be stimulated by the prospect of being safe, or by the fancy that they are safe to go and sin the more, and thus there may be more disease amongst them.

4657. Surely, if you take a diseased woman and put her into a hospital, that prevents her communicating that disease to men?—In the case of that one woman or twenty women; but if by taking that one or that twenty away, you increase the conviction in men's minds that they are safe, I think you will run the risk of increasing the number of times that they will commit fornication, and also that you will increase the number of men who would be likely to do it.

4658. The greater the number of men who go with a diseased woman, the greater the number of cases of disease that are created by the woman; therefore, by your own showing, a large amount of disease is checked by keeping that woman in hospital?—I do not see that at all; if you think that you are stopping disease on the one side, you are bringing into operation forces which increase disease on the other side.

4659. Would you not admit that if to examine only one sex renders the checking of disease less efficient, a certain amount of disease must be checked by apprehending and shutting off diseased women from the practice of prostitution?—If your work stopped there, I should be prepared to accept your conclusion; but your work does not stop there; by taking that diseased woman out of the market of vice you give to men an increased persuasion that they will be safe in committing sin, and the probabilities are increased that they will go and commit sin, and therefore the probabilities are increased that they will catch disease.

4660. I think you said something about the demoralisation of the doctors whose duty it is to examine these women; this, of course, is only your opinion?—I do not think that a doctor can do evil without being demoralised.

4661. But the object of the medical profession is the prevention and cure of disease?—It says so.

4662. This operation is essentially within those limits, is it not?—The Report of the Royal Commission said that it was to make the practice of prostitution innocuous; therefore, there is a moral element involved.

4663. Is there anything contrary to what is called professional morality in the duties in which they are engaged?—I do not know what the professional morality may be.

4664. Have you any other evidence from writers, or acknowledged authorities in the medical profession, to support your views on this matter?—I know that the number of doctors who are opposed to these laws is very much greater than it was, and that many leading doctors are opposed to these laws.

4665. Can you give us the name of one leading man who had ever expressed an opinion that the fact of having to perform the duty of examining these women is demoralising to the medical profession?—Dr. Nevins has, I think, expressed that opinion.

4666. Then do you hold that it is degrading for medical men to treat women suffering from venereal disease?—I should not hold such an opinion. My objection is to their examining them to see whether they have the disease, and then if the women have not the disease they pass them on practically accredited by the doctor as safe for the purposes of vice.

4667. Then a woman going out of any ordinary hospital, or out of any Lock Hospital, where she has been treated by any medical man, you may say goes out clean for the public by being cured?—I think that there is a distinct difference between the two cases. In the one case there is examination, in order to see whether there is this disease, and in the other case there is the disease, and it is healed. I take no objection to healing disease where it exists, by voluntary means.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

4668. I think Dr. Nevins, you say, is the only

The Rev. Professor CALDERWOOD, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

4669. ARE you Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh?—I am.

4670. How long have you held that appointment?—For 13 years.

4671. You are connected, are you not, with the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland?—I am.

4672. Have you filled the position of Moderator to that Church?—I am ex-Moderator to that Church; I officiated last year.

4673. I do not want unnecessarily to occupy your time, or the time of the Committee, and therefore I will not ask you in detail the questions which I have put to Mr. Gledstone upon the moral bearing of the Acts; you have heard his evidence, have you not?—I have heard that evidence.

4674. Do you agree with the answers that he gave upon those subjects?—I agree with them in the main, almost entirely.

4675. Does anything occur to you on which you would like to express more specifically your own opinions?—On the question of disease and its treatment I should like to say that, to me, it seems quite clear that you diminish disease, so far as you keep a diseased woman under restraint; and, thus far, I should wish to modify my concurrence in the opinion expressed by Mr. Gledstone, and to admit that there is gain within that line. However, I quite agree with the evidence led as to the increase of disease on account of the increased indulgence on the part of men.

4676. Do you agree in the objections expressed by Mr. Gledstone from a moral point of view to the so-called voluntary submission signed for periods up to 12 months?—I do, altogether.

4677. Have you referred at all to the evidence of Inspector Anniss on this subject?—I remember it, to some extent.

4678. With reference to the period of time for which these submissions are taken, would you read Questions and Answers 4143 to 4147?—“But is that submission for an indefinite period?—(A.) No, not for an indefinite period. In some cases I get them to sign for one month, sometimes for three months, and sometimes for twelve months. If they are old prostitutes who have returned from the hospital at various times, I get them to sign for twelve months; if they are quite girls, I get them to sign for three months; and, as I have before stated, in some instances, for one month. (Q.) Is your voluntary submission from a printed form?—(A.) Yes. (Q.) Have you one with you?—(A.) I do not happen to have one with me, but it is in the Schedule of the Act of 1869; called ‘Form H.’ (Q.) The medical man of standing who has expressed the opinion about this examination demoralising the medical profession?—His name occurred to me. There is Dr. Haughton, of Dublin; Dr. Bell Taylor, of Nottingham; Dr. Drysdale; and other men of less standing. If I sat here for five minutes names would keep occurring to me the whole time.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

form in the Act has a blank for the calendar months, and you fill up that number?—(A.) Yes, to any extent not exceeding twelve months. (Q.) What is your general rule?—(A.) In the case of young girls, where there is a likelihood of their discontinuing the mode of life, I get them signed for one, two, or three months. In the case of a woman who has been in hospital, or is known to be an old prostitute outside the district, I get them signed for twelve months. But I would like to show that in every case a woman, as I said just now, is told before she leaves the room, if she is found free from disease, that she will be exempt from that examination, if she discontinues her mode of life, prostitution.”

4679. With reference to the other subjects upon which I examined Mr. Gledstone, there is the question of practical licensing of prostitution by the system of the Acts; do you concur in the opinions that he expressed upon that subject?—I regard it as decidedly a license given to the woman to exercise the trade of prostitution until the next examination.

4680. You think it practically amounts to that in its effect upon the minds of those who become conscious of the system?—I think it is so, to the women very expressly. I should be inclined to extend my interpretation of it in the same manner to many of the men.

4681. Would you not think that such a system as that which obtained in the subjected districts was likely to suggest to the minds of young men that they were justified in indulging their sexual appetites?—I believe it does so; not in the way in which a licensed public-house suggests drinking, but in a manner somewhat different, not in the way in which a licensed public-house suggests drinking, but in a manner somewhat different, by public provision for security from evil consequences, encouraging indulgence. But it is to the woman expressly a license to practise.

4682. If you take the case of a license to a public-house, there is such a thing as drinking in moderation, and, therefore, a license to a public-house is not a license to drunkenness?—Clearly not.

4683. Drunkenness is not an offence as against which we ought, as legislators, to desire to guard; but in the case of the prostitute and the brothel there is no such thing, morally speaking, as an allowable moderation in that vice?—None.

4684. That is the distinction which you would draw between the licensing of a prostitute and a brothel, and the licensing of a publican in his trade?—Essentially, always understanding that this this word "license" does not, as applied, bear upon the brothel, but upon the women.

4685. Do you share the opinions expressed by Mr. Gledstone as to the degrading nature of the personal examination of these unhappy women?—I believe that it must morally degrade the women, even more than the life of prostitution does.

4686. Because it is added to the life of prostitution?—Yes, because it is a degrading addition.

4687. What do you understand to be the object of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—To prevent the extension of disease, as that is consequent upon prostitution.

4688. I presume you would agree that that is their object, only in a modified sense, seeing that the Acts distinctly avoid the measure which evidently, from the point of view of their supporters, would be necessary for the purpose; that is to say, they restrict the examination to one sex only?—Yes.

4689. You would infer from that, would you not, that the practical object of the Acts was not so much to lessen the amount of venereal disease amongst both sexes, as to limit the danger of carnal intercourse with the class of prostitutes for the benefit of men?—Yes, recognising always that this object is to be gained, whilst prostitution is continued.

4690. I know that you have read a good deal of the literature upon this subject, which some of us have been obliged to read; are you aware that it is a matter about which there is no difference of opinion amongst experts, that the hygienic purposes of legislation under a system of this kind cannot be accomplished without a sufficient supply of prostitutes?—The general tendency of opinion amongst the medical men in Scotland, so far as I know it, is this: that there must be a serious increase of disease if you, by means of the operations of the Acts, seriously diminish the number of women who are trading as prostitutes.

4691. I was following up your own statement of your understanding of the object of the Acts; you said, if I recollect aright, that it was no part of the object of the Acts to do away with prostitution; and I asked you further, whether it was not inconsistent with the sanitary objects of the Acts, to reduce too much the number of prostitutes; is that your opinion?—Yes.

4692. It is within your knowledge from reading upon the subject, that that is the opinion of those who are in favour of this legislation from a hygienic point of view?—Clearly.

4693. Then one of the dangers of a system of this kind, hygienically speaking, would consist in that which would be a moral advantage, namely, the reduction of the number of prostitutes?—Yes.

4694. And that I take it would be, therefore, in your mind another evidence of the immoral tendency of these Acts?—Yes, I object to them on those grounds.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

the necessity of the gratification, at any cost, of that instinct?—Certainly not. I hold the first condition of moral life to be self-regulation according to moral law.

4696. And under what conditions do you think that self-regulation and self-restraint in this respect of sexual indulgence are most likely to obtain and be successful; where there is a system of State regulation in force which professes to secure the health of the women leading a life of prostitution, or where there is no such system in force?—Where there is no such system, and where we deal with disease purely as disease, and as acknowledged by the persons who suffer from it.

4697. I assume, that in your mind, there would be no objection whatever to any amount of provision, however liberal, for the treatment and the cure of the disease?—There would be none. I have seen it repeatedly affirmed that the opponents of the Acts were adverse to the treatment of this disease on account of its being a consequence of sinning; but I am not aware of any opposition to the Acts in Scotland grounded on that view.

4698. Are you aware of any objection to the Acts upon that ground by any of the religious denominations of this country?—I am not aware of any such objection.

4699. Is there anything else in the general evidence of Mr. Gledstone with reference to which you would like to express more specifically your own opinion?—I think not; I very much concur with him.

4700. Your general conclusion, therefore, I understand to be identical with his; that these Acts are absolutely immoral, both in principle and in their practical effect?—Yes, and in the whole of their application, not merely to the women, but also to the medical men and to the police officers.

4701. Is that opinion of yours shared by the religious body of United Presbyterians whom you represent?—It is, as expressed in their petitions, year by year.

4702. Before we pass to the proceedings of your religious body, I should like to ask whether you have any evidence from your own experience of the demoralising effect upon the minds of the male youth of the population of the existence of this population?—The evidence to which I should like to point is connected particularly with our meetings throughout Scotland to secure the repeal of these Acts. I think we have never had a meeting in any district where we have not had present some very young men who manifested by their conduct that very pernicious influences had been exerted over their minds by the nature of these Acts, and especially by the compulsory examination.

4703. Do you mean that they manifested that influence by the nature of their conduct and by their remarks?—Yes, by their conduct and remarks in the meetings, and by their frivolity, and by many of the forms of expression of feeling which they gave.

4704. Their remarks showed some little knowledge of the Acts?—Yes.

4705. Were they of an obscene character?—No; we could never say that at any of our meetings they resorted to the practice of calling out
C c anything

anything while we were speaking; it was rather in the form of frivolity, jesting and whistling, or laughing when references were made to the examination.

4706. There was a want of seriousness?—There was no apprehension of the solemnity of what was involved.

4707. But that would hardly be evidence of the injurious moral effect upon their minds of the existence of this system?—Not in the sense at all of their familiarity with the system, except in so far as they recognised the provision made by the Government for this inspection.

4708. And did their remarks show to you that they recognised the practice in that respect under the law, and that they liked the notion of that practice?—Their conduct conveyed quite the impression of their delight in the arrangement, although I could not go further.

4709. Now I will pass to the action taken upon this subject by the United Presbyterian Church. Would you kindly sketch out to the Committee the proceedings of that Church upon this subject?—I have to mention that the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland has from 1871 continuously, with the exception of a single year, up to 1881, expressed condemnation of the Acts, and commonly petitioned against them; and on any occasion such as in 1874, when the Supreme Court of the Church did not petition, it counselled the inferior courts to do so and to communicate with individual Members of Parliament. I have asked the clerk of the Synod to give me a certified copy of an epitome of the deeds of the court on this subject, which I should like to put in evidence. (The same was delivered in.) 4710. Therefore, there has been no difference in point of action on the part of your Church since it first took up this question in 1871?—None whatever; and the petition has commonly been an unanimously passed petition. I am not aware of a single instance in which there was divergence of opinion expressed.

4711. You have never had difference of opinion?—No; it has always been unanimous. We are aware of one or two members of court who do not agree with us; but they have never formally expressed that disagreement.

4712. Have your petitions been always couched in the same language, or have you varied your grounds at all?—There has been no special variation from the starting point in 1871 to the concluding statement in 1881; they continue practically on the same ground, except that there is a reference in the petition in 1880 to the attempt in the previous year to introduce the Acts into Scotland.

4713. What was that attempt?—It was an attempt which originated with one of the Burgh Commissioners of Maryhill, near Glasgow, who submitted to the Corporation a proposal that they should request the extension of the Acts to Maryhill. I may explain that Maryhill is a small suburban district near Glasgow, which is the military centre for the west of Scotland.

4714. Would you state to us the general grounds which your Church has taken in opposing these Acts?—Invariably the opposition has been on the ground of the encouragement to immorality implied, and the infringement of personal liberty involved in the regulation of these women.

4715. Have you generally also laid some stress upon the inequality and injustice of dealing with one sex alone?—Yes, throughout.

4716. Have you, in these memorials or petitions, always taken up the position which, in common with Mr. Gladstone, you have taken to-day that these Acts are practically a legislative recognition of prostitution; has that been one of your objections?—The words used in 1871, when we first took action, were that these Acts “involve a legislative recognition of prostitution as a profession or trade.”

4717. And similar resolutions or petitions were adopted in each year?—Yes, except in a single year.

4718. Has your body petitioned not only through the Synod, but in any other method or form?—I should think all the Presbyteries, or very nearly all, have petitioned.

4719. You are aware, are you not, that the Contagious Diseases Acts could not have been extended to Maryhill except by legislation?—I am not aware of any limit implied other than the mention of the districts to which they did actually apply when passed.

4720. I understood you to say that some person of position at Maryhill proposed that the Acts should be extended to Maryhill; by what mode did he propose to procure their extension?—He proposed to petition the Government.

4721. That was under the idea, was it not, that by some Order in Council or Government procedure the Acts could be extended to Maryhill?—Yes, that was the impression.

4722. Will you take it from me that that was an erroneous impression?—Yes, I believe it is so.

4723. However, that impression, though erroneous, produced a great effect, did it not, on the Scotch mind?—Very great indeed in the district.

4724. There was great public indignation at the idea of such legislation being imposed upon the inhabitants of that district?—Very great indeed, manifesting itself largely in the excitement of the district. The Burgh Council refused an application for the use of the Burgh hall to hold a meeting in opposition. The consequence was that a small hall had to be engaged, and that was crowded with a very excited audience.

4725. What was the last time that you adopted a petition or memorial?—Eighteen hundred and eighty-one.

4726. Was that addressed to Parliament or to the Government?—To Parliament. They have been addressed to Parliament, as a rule. On one occasion I think a memorial was addressed to the Prime Minister; but commonly the petitions have been addressed to Parliament.

4727. Was there one presented on 6th May 1881?—There was; that was to the Imperial Government.

4728. What

28 April 1882.]

Rev. Professor CALDERWOOD.

4728. What is the ground that you there took?—The Synod adopted a memorial to the Government strongly condemnatory of the Contagious Diseases Acts, and recommended individual members of the Synod to correspond with their representatives.

4729. But in that memorial itself what is the expression of your opinion?—"That your memorialists unanimously regard with strong disapproval the Contagious Acts of 1866-1869 as tending to facilitate, and appearing to many to sanction, the commission of sin, and exposing those who are the immediate subjects of their operation to tyrannical, cruel, and degrading treatment."

4730. You are, I believe, tolerably familiar with public opinion throughout Scotland?—I am.

4731. Am I right in saying that in Scotland the vast majority of public opinion would be against any legislation of this kind?—The vast majority, I believe; the people would very seriously resist any attempt to extend the Acts to Scotland.

4732. But would the vast majority be against the existing Acts, restricted as they are?—Against their continuance under the present limits.

4733. Can you give us any evidence as to the action taken by other bodies; I do not mean other denominational bodies, because we shall have their evidence; but as to other petitions and memorials to Parliament, and to the Government, from Scotland upon this subject?—Petitions have been sent up to the House of Commons from almost all the larger towns of Scotland, and the corporations of the following burghs have formally petitioned for repeal at the ordinary meetings of the Councils under their seal, viz., Aberdeen, Inverness, Edinburgh, Dunbarton, Banff, Hamilton, Jedburgh, Dundee, Campbelltown, and Perth.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4734. Amongst the objections urged against the Acts at the meetings which you speak of, have there been any charges brought against the administrators of the Acts, either police or medical, of cruelty, harshness, or any other improper conduct?—As I understand it, the objection taken in respect of cruelty has always borne upon the measures used to compel, or to induce, women to submit, who were themselves against it.

4735. Can you tell us of any specific instances that have been brought before those meetings?—I am not sure that I can mention any. Objection has been taken to the policemen urging upon the woman suspected, the signing of a voluntary submission.

4736. Is not that in the direction of humanity?—I think that that is in the direction of cruelty.

4737. How can it be in the direction of cruelty?—It is in the direction of urging the woman to submit to a most immodest exposure, when she herself is averse from it.

4738. What is the alternative?—The alternative for Parliament as, I think, is this: that no right be allowed for police interference with a person until she can be proved guilty of some wrong.

075.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

4739. Have you ever read the Acts?—Yes, I know the Acts very well.

4740. What is the alternative to a woman in the event of her not signing the voluntary submission?—To go before a magistrate.

4741. Only when the superintendent of police has reasonable cause to suspect that she is a prostitute?—That is so.

4742. Whether it is better for her to go before the magistrate, or to sign the voluntary submission?—To me it seems a very cruel thing to ask any woman to sign a voluntary submission simply with the alternative that if she do not she must go before a magistrate.

4743. Then you think she ought to go before a magistrate?—I think so.

4744. You think that every woman who is reasonably suspected of being a prostitute ought to be summoned before a magistrate?—I think the voluntary submission a cruel contrivance.

4745. You do not think it is done for the advantage of the women?—I do not think so.

4746. Do you know of any case where a virtuous woman has been got to sign a voluntary submission?—I am not aware of any.

4747. Do you believe there is any such case?—I do not know; I have no evidence.

4748. Do you know that evidence has been given of only one such case before this Committee?—I do not know the amount of evidence. I have not read all the evidence. I have only been able to read certain portions of it.

4749. Have you ever heard of a case of a poor woman having been compelled by the police to sign a voluntary submission?—I have seen cases reported, but I do not possess evidence about them.

4750. Then I understand that your view upon this particular point is, that the voluntary submission should be done away with, and that every woman who is reasonably suspected of being a prostitute should be summoned to appear publicly before a magistrate?—I believe that the latter course is constitutional and right, if a woman is to be charged as a prostitute; and that the other course is unconstitutional and cruel; but I do not imply the propriety of the summons under the conditions.

Dr. Farquharson.

4751. I think it is generally understood that the voluntary submission was designed rather to save the feelings of the women?—I believe it was so designed.

4752. A woman has always the option of going before a magistrate, if she likes, has she not?—She has.

4753. Is not the voluntary submission read over and explained to her before she signs it?—It is read over and explained to her, or it certainly ought to be; but along with that there is on the part of the policeman pressure to induce her to sign.

4754. Then it is so far her own fault, if she does not completely make herself mistress of the voluntary submission, and elect to go before a magistrate, if she prefers to do so?—It is so far her own fault, if she do not, and so far the policeman's fault, if he urge her to sign.

4755. At

28 April 1882.]

Rev. Professor CALDERWOOD.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

4755. At all events the voluntary submission gives her the option of avoiding the disagreeable exposure of going before a magistrate?—If she is a prostitute. If she is not, no woman will regard that as a benefit.

4756. I did not quite follow whether you yourself hold that the diminution of the number of prostitutes would have a tendency to increase disease?—I think it must.

4757. Then of course if prostitution were abolished, disease would very largely increase?—One does not see that that is the conclusion; it depends entirely upon the continuance of the resort to prostitutes.

4758. You think that although the diminution of the number of women now under the Acts would increase disease, the abolition of prostitution altogether would not do so?—Certainly not; it would be all the other way.

4759. Then would you approve of attempts being made to stamp out or abolish prostitution legally?—I do not believe it is possible legally to deal with the subject in such a manner as to keep up the surveillance over action which would be necessary to prevent prostitution.

4760. Therefore you think the attempt would be impracticable?—It would be unwise, I should think; and a failure, I should expect. Of course it will be understood that my answer does not apply to the suppression of brothels at all. I should be quite prepared to answer otherwise, if it were supposed that the question took so wide a range.

4762. How is it that there is so much seduction and immorality in the rural districts of Scotland, where you have no prostitutes?—That is accounted for in a totally different way. You have not in those districts any such thing as the carrying off of young women. Nor are there in those districts examples of seduction in the ordinary sense in which we speak of it in the midst of larger populations; immorality which may be found in given districts is often immorality prior to marriage.

4763. Often, but surely not always?—Not always by any means; we have to lament a wider range than this.

4764. We know that the number of illegitimate births in the rural districts of Scotland is very large?—Yes, and those can be accounted for by the social condition of the people, specially as affecting the manner in which they live together; certainly no legislation after the manner of these Acts would help it.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

4765. But if we are to check disease solely by education and religious training, the people of Scotland are supposed surely to be in advance of those of other countries in education and morality?—I should think we should be wrong did we suppose that promoting morality by education meant merely by teaching; it must be by elevating the people by all their surroundings.

4766. But I am afraid the condition of things in Scotland is getting rather worse as regards immorality, although the condition of the people as regards education and elevating social influences is gradually improving?—I incline rather to think otherwise; that both the advance in the sentiment of the country on temperance, and the advance generally in sentiment as to aiding the people in social improvement, are very promising.

4767. But as yet that has had but little influence on the condition of the people as regards this form of immorality?—I should not say that we can point as yet to statistics showing a large advance, although we can show hopeful variations.

Chairman.

4768. But you expect it?—I certainly expect it, and I believe that what is now being done must ultimately show us very marked difference.

Dr. Cameron.

4769. Do you consider that illegitimacy is at all synonymous with immorality; is it your opinion that there may be a very great amount of immorality, and a very small amount of illegitimacy?—Yes, and you may have the results conversely; you may have a large amount of immorality and no illegitimacy, and you may have a large amount of illegitimacy and a much smaller amount of immorality.

4770. Would you go so far as to say that an absence of illegitimacy often indicates a very intense amount of immorality?—That would apply only where prostitution is common.

4771. But in connection with the illegitimacy in the rural districts, is it not a fact that the system of housing men, the “bothie” system, as it is called, which precludes the facility for marriage, must have a great deal to do with that?—Certainly, that along with the practices of courtship in the farmhouses.

4772. Do not those practices of courtship in farmhouses arise to a very large extent from the system of marriage that formerly prevailed, a system that led to irregular marriages being the rule?—In certain districts of Scotland only.

4773. What I refer to is a date, now a good number of years ago, in a man’s recollection, but not very long in the history of a country, when only clergymen of the Established Church could marry people, and when consequently a very large number of the population refused to be married by the ministers of the Established Church, and were married irregularly?—I agree that that was so within the more populous districts, not in the country districts so much; but that will apply largely to the lower districts of our great cities.

4774. That would lead to rather loose ideas as to

to the relations between the sexes, and would increase illegitimacy?—Yes, certainly.

4775. The honourable Member for West Aberdeenshire, said, as I understood, that the morality in Scotland was rather not improving; you are distinctly of the contrary opinion?—Yes, my opinion is distinctly otherwise.

4776. What you wish to give evidence about, as I understand, is simply the state of feeling on this subject in Scotland?—That mainly.

4777. Is it not a fact that the entire community may be said to be against the Contagious Diseases Act?—The great body of the community, I believe; and we must say that the medical opinion which was at first favourable to the Acts has been in Scotland steadily turning as evidence has begun to accumulate.

4778. There is one point, of which a good deal has been made, as to the improved maintenance of order which has arisen under the Acts; is it not the fact that in Scotland generally a very great improvement in decency and order has been made in the large towns and elsewhere independently of these Acts?—That is certainly the case.

4779. And I suppose you agree (in fact, your whole evidence is to the effect) that any examination which gives rise to an idea that a man may safely indulge in prostitution, is calculated to tempt him?—It is certainly tempting.

4780. You gave the history of the petitioning by the United Presbyterians; the other churches, Free and Established, have done the same thing, have they not?—The Free Church has uniformly petitioned in like manner; the Established Church has not done so.

4781. Has it never done so?—I am not quite sure that I can speak to that. I know that there has been the preparation of an overture to the Assembly on the subject, and that leading members of the Assembly have taken quite conspicuously the position of antagonism to the Acts; but I am not able from personal recollection to say to what extent the Assembly has petitioned.

4782. From your acquaintance with clergymen of the Established Church, have you any reason to believe that their sentiments on the subject as individuals are different from those of the other bodies in Scotland?—I am not sure that I can say so, except that they show more reluctance to enter upon the agitation. We must certainly acknowledge that.

Chairman.

4783. I suppose you know the suburb of Maryhill?—Very well.

4784. Is it near Glasgow?—It is within two miles of Glasgow. If the Acts were applied to Maryhill, they would take in the whole of Glasgow. I referred to a proposal made in the town council, or amongst the burgh commissioners; I am not sure whether the authorities are burgh commissioners or town council in Maryhill, which is a suburban district, and apart from the municipal government of Glasgow.

4785. Can you tell me, from your recollection of the occurrence, on what grounds the extension of the Acts was urged; was it on hygienic grounds?—On hygienic grounds.

4786. That is to say, I suppose it was alleged by the advocates of the extension that there was a good deal of disease among the women in Maryhill?—Yes, it was so suggested, and one of the burgh commissioners moved on that ground to petition for the extension of the Acts.

4787. And there was very strong opposition to the extension?—Very keen, the meeting being composed partly of those of prominent social position, and very largely of working men; for it must be understood that it was a meeting of men alone; there were no women admitted.

4788. It was opposed on principle?—Yes, entirely.

4789. Did any argument arise about the truth of the allegation that disease was rife around Maryhill?—There was nothing in the meeting to indicate a serious extent of disease in the district. It was even reported that the burgh commissioner who had moved was himself inclined to withdraw from the position he had taken.

4790. But you said a moment ago that one of the grounds on which it was done was that disease was rife?—Yes, his opinion had been so, but it was proved that that was the result of hearsay evidence from certain military quarters, and not from any knowledge that he had.

4791. Then that might have become a subject of discussion at the meeting?—To that extent. One of the burgh commissioners rose in the meeting after the regular speaking was over to say that he had had no part in the refusal of the Burgh hall, and he had come to the meeting for the purpose of learning something of the nature of the Acts, and that he would leave the meeting determined to oppose strenuously their extension.

Mr. Stansfeld.

4792. We have here a Paper put in by Mr. McCall, the Chief Constable of Glasgow, showing the per-centage of illegitimate births in Glasgow from 1869 to 1879; does that show an increase or a decrease during that period in the per-centage of illegitimate births?—There is a gradual decrease here from 1874. The numbers imply a variation in the earlier years; in 1869, 9·7; in 1873, 9·4; in 1876, 8·1; the same repeated for 1877; and the same for 1878; and for 1879, 8·2.

4793. Therefore, partly under the influence probably of the police administration in Glasgow, of which we have had evidence before, the per-centage of illegitimate births is not increasing, but decreasing?—Yes, certainly; and we incline to attribute a great deal of value to the action of the ordinary police in this matter.

4794. And I presume that it would not occur to you that the extension of the Contagious Diseases Acts to Scotland or to any part of Scotland, would either promote morality or tend to check illegitimate births?—We do not believe it could at all.

4795. In fact, I suppose, to put it plainly, you would deprecate the extension of the Acts on the ground that they would, in all probability, increase both immorality and illegitimate births? —We would very earnestly do so on both grounds.

4796. You were asked whether you were not aware that the voluntary submission is always read over and explained to the woman who signs it, so that she signs it with a full knowledge of its contents; you are not prepared to say, of your own knowledge, that the women sign the voluntary submission with full knowledge of its contents?—I am not inclined to think that they do, but I have not evidence to submit upon that point.

4797. Therefore you did not intend, in whatever answer you gave, to imply that you were satisfied upon that point?—Certainly not.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, IN THE CHAIR.

The Rev. GEORGE OSBORN, D.D., called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

4798. You are, I believe, President of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference?—Yes.
4799. You are also Theological Tutor at the Wesleyan Theological Institution at Richmond in Surrey?—I am.

4800. How long have you held that appointment?—Fourteen years.

4801. This is not the first time, is it, that you have been President of the Conference of your body?—No, I was President in 1863.

4802. And you have been in the Wesleyan Ministry 54 years, have you not?—I have; I am the oldest minister not on the retired list.

4803. You have read, have you not, the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I have, both of them.

4804. Would you kindly, in your own way, state to the Committee your view of those Acts?—Generally, I may say, that ever since I have known them, I have considered them to be in the highest degree objectionable. They are objectionable as they affect me, personally, and go to counteract the whole object of my life. I have given my whole life to try to teach men to fear God and keep His commandments; and these Acts counteract both those objects, and make me pay the expense of counteracting my own teaching. That is my personal objection, as a minister of religion; and I feel it very strongly. Looking at the matter in a more public point of view, and looking at the Acts in the broadest way in which I can look at them, I have come to this conclusion, that on two suppositions they may be tolerated. The first supposition would be, that they answer their purpose, about which, personally, I am not at all sure. The second supposition would be, that there is no God, and no hereafter; that is a supposition which I cannot entertain, and which Parliament cannot entertain, because Parliament makes a profession of the existence of a God, day by day, and recognises Him before it does any business whatever, and admits no man to a seat who does not profess also, in one form or other, the same fact; therefore I say that Parliament cannot entertain the supposition, either that there is no God or that there is no hereafter. If they could be entertained, there would be a good deal more to be said of the Acts. But, putting them out of view, I consider that the object being to make the soldier as effective a fighting machine as possible, the machinery breaks down, and the treatment of the soldier, which these Acts necessitate, cannot be justified. The nation gives him a kit, and puts a Bible into it, or some other book of devotion; and then provides for his contradicting and disobeying that Bible in his conduct. It provides him with chaplains to teach him to pray, and so lead him in his devotions, and to show him the way to heaven; and then, with prostitutes, to lead him on the way to hell. I consider, therefore, that the Acts are absurd in that respect, and that the carrying them out involves a great practical absurdity on the part of the nation. We must give up either the prostitutes, or the Bibles and the chaplains. It is for Parliament to say which it will give up, but one or the other it must give up in consistency. I have no right to tell a man that he shall not commit fornication, and then to smooth the way to the very thing that we forbid. I consider these Acts practically a license to prostitution; they are not so called, but the moral effect of them is a license to prostitution, as I understand it. I consider that by that virtual though not formal license, all parties are degraded; I think that the degradation inflicted on the woman is unutterable: whether she is examined by voluntary submission, or whether she is examined by magistrate's order, makes no difference, in my view of the case, as to the degradation involved in submitting herself to such examination.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

Chairman.

4805. You mean the moral degradation, I presume?—I mean the moral degradation. I think that a woman must be very far gone indeed before she can submit herself to a voluntary examination under the Acts.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4806. Under the Acts or otherwise?—Under the Acts. We can hardly say that an examination for the purposes of private practice comes within this category.

C C 4

4807. You

2 May 1882.]

Rev. G. OSBORN, D.D.

Mr. Stansfeld.

4807. You do not see any analogy between the case of the examination of a virtuous woman, desiring at the moment to be personally examined with a view to the ascertainment of her condition, and that of a prostitute, who is periodically examined for the purposes of these Acts?—If she is taken up on suspicion, one can conceive her desiring to be voluntarily examined; but I do not understand how, apart from any proceedings under the Acts, a woman could submit herself to examination.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4808. Would your remarks apply to a prostitute voluntarily presenting herself at a Lock hospital for the purpose of examination without being required to do so?—That I understand to be a charitable institution, established for the relief of disease, of which the woman might avail herself in circumstances of distress. I take that to be a widely different thing from attending, either by magistrate's order or of her own will in order to undergo an examination as to her physical condition, which appears to be a very objectionable thing, and to imply, on her part, an amount of degradation which I should be very sorry to inflict upon her. Then I think that the effect on the whole population that is cognisant of the operation of the Acts in the neighbourhood where they are carried out, the public recognition of her condition as being under Government inspection and treatment, is disastrous and degrading. That I take to be a very mischievous thing, and tending to lower the tone of all the population round about, and of all who are witnesses of it, making them think that this is a trade which is carried on with Government sanction. I take it that the provisions of the Acts as between the sexes are not capable of justification. If women are to be examined, I think men ought to be examined too; they have equal rights in this matter as before God and as before the State. I take it that the State would not step in to indemnify any other class of transgressors against the consequences of their conduct. If a soldier turns thief, I suppose he is punished, and the State would not indemnify him against the consequence of his crime; and I do not think the State has any more right to indemnify a fornicator against the consequences of his crime than it has to indemnify a thief. I think I said that it was bad policy to step in between a man and the consequences of his conduct, and that the State would not think of doing it in regard to other crimes, and especially of doing it at large expense; I think that that is objectionable.

Mr. Stansfeld.

4809. By other crimes you mean other moral offences, other sins?—I would say both; because theft is a crime and a sin, and I suppose that prostitution is a crime by the common law, though I am not so sure of that.

4810. I am afraid that is not so?—At all events there is no doubt about its being a sin against the law of God, and a deadly sin, as the Litany very properly calls it. The Litany very properly says: "From fornication and all other deadly sin;" and that is the standard which I, at least, am bound to maintain, that it is not a trifle, not a thing to be winked at, not a necessary evil that must be tolerated, but a deadly sin that must be forsaken and put away. I should further say that to me these Acts are especially annoying and offensive, because I find the Royal Arms at the head of them, and know that they are administered in the Queen's name. The Sovereign, being a woman, is made a party to the degradation of women. Being not merely admired as a constitutional Sovereign, but loved as a wife and mother, her name is invoked and her authority employed on behalf of practices which poison the fountains of domestic life.

4811. The Evidence and Report of the Royal Commission are before this Committee; when I inform you that in that way we have evidence before us that these women have been known to call themselves "Queen's women," is that, in your mind, an illustration of the degrading character of this legislation?—Certainly it is.

4812. I would further ask you whether it is your opinion that the use of such phraseology must necessarily be positively immoral in its tendency upon the minds of those who come to a knowledge of it?—I cannot conceive how it can be otherwise.

4813. I do not know whether you have concluded your statements of the moral objections to the Acts?—I would like to add that, however much I may respect the benevolent intentions with which I believe some persons support these Acts, I cannot but feel that their judgment is at fault, and that it is bad policy to mitigate suffering, in order to facilitate sin; and, as to protecting the innocent, I think the best protection for future generations is to promote virtue in the soldiers, and to encourage them to marry, and to facilitate their marriage as far as possible. I do not know that I need add more on that point; I have very long entertained these convictions, and they are shared, I believe, substantially, by the whole of the body with which I am connected.

4814. Having explained your moral objections to this legislation, will you kindly give to the Committee an account of the action which the Wesleyan body has taken from time to time on the subject?—The chief ecclesiastical authority in our body is called "the Annual Conference of the People called Methodists," founded by a deed poll executed by John Wesley. That Conference, ever since the year 1871, has passed a resolution year by year condemning these Acts.

4815. May I ask you whether that Conference includes laymen as well as ministers?—Since the year 1878 it has done so. The purport of that resolution was to express its disapprobation of these Acts in the most decisive terms. In the next year, 1872, the convictions of the Conference were expressed in a memorial to the First Lord of the Treasury.

4816. Have you that memorial with you?—I have a copy of it before me. It was signed by the president and secretary on behalf of the Conference, and then by 700 ministers, personally.

4817. Does that memorial express, as well as any other document which your Conference has issued, the general views entertained by your body?—

Rev. G. OSBORN, D.D.

body?—I have never heard any dissent from them in any quarter.

4818. Is that memorial the best expression of them that is on record?—I think it will put the case most succinctly, and, with the permission of the Committee, I will read two or three sentences from it. Amongst other things they say: "That founding their view upon the plain dictates of New Testament morality your memorialists hold that no argument drawn from supposed expediency can avail to justify measures which by offering comparative, if not entire immunity to offenders against the Divine Law, smooth the path to ruin. Your memorialists are not unaware of the various considerations based on social, economical, and sanitary grounds by which it is sought to justify the continuance and even the extension to the civil population of these most objectionable Acts, but they are convinced that all considerations of advantage are more than counterbalanced by the immoral tendencies of these Acts. The saving of expense, even if actually effected, bears no proportion to the injury inflicted on society at large by encouraging the formation of dissolute habits and poisoning the fountains of family life." Then further on they say: "Your memorialists further assure you that the sentiments and convictions here expressed are shared by great multitudes with whom they are associated, and although as yet but little public action has been taken on the subject they humbly trust that by timely effort on the part of the Government next Session the necessity for extensive and prolonged agitation may be averted. Most earnestly, therefore, do they implore you to use all the influence of your high station to wipe out this blot from our National legislation." In 1873, 1874, 1875, and 1876 similar resolutions were passed; in 1877 I find notice of the formation of a society within the Methodist body, established for the express purpose of seeking the repeal of these Acts, and a resolution of the Conference approving of its objects and general methods. I find, in 1878 and afterwards, the appointment of a very large representative committee.

4819. Do you mean a committee of Conference?—A committee of the Wesleyan Methodist body at large representing all parts of the country, and all shades of political opinion.

4820. Is that committee a distinct organisation from the society to which you refer?—Hardly; you may call it a committee of the society; it is a distinct organisation from the Conference to whom it reports its proceedings; and there has been year by year down to last year, a resolution passed by the Conference, approving of the proceedings of that society.

Sir Henry Wolff.

4821. What is the society called?—The Association for Promoting the Repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts. That society, I should say, has established a periodical which has now been carried on for seven years with the express purpose of diffusing information on this subject.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4822. Is that the paper called "The Shield"?—No; it is called "The Protest."

0.75.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

4823. Since 1877, what has been done?—The resolutions have been repeated year by year since 1871, with certain variations.

Mr. Stansfeld.

4824. Am I right in supposing that your Conference has always been unanimous upon this subject?—I have never known a dissenting voice.

4825. And there is no change of opinion of late years in the direction of favouring this legislation?—So far as I have an opportunity of judging, the feeling would go quite the other way; that increased acquaintance with the subject would bring about an increased desire for the cessation of all these provisions.

4826. I think the society of which you speak has its correspondence with foreign countries and with the Colonies, has it not?—It gives a general attention to the subject, and endeavours to awaken attention to it in the Colonies and in foreign countries.

4827. Amongst the Methodists, all the world over?—As far as we can do so.

4828. Have you now completed the statement of view and fact which you wish to lay before the Committee?—As far as I at present remember.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4829. You have said that the Acts do not, in your opinion, answer their purpose; may I ask you the grounds for that belief?—I say that I am informed that they do not answer their purpose; I have heard occasionally, and read sometimes, things which lead me to think that that is so.

4830. From what you have been informed, you have come to the conclusion that they do not answer their purpose?—Yes; that they accomplish the purpose for which they are intended is not so patent as to be a matter which is indisputable.

4831. Are you, yourself, acquainted with any of these subjected districts; you have not lived in any of them, have you, at any time?—During all the time that the Acts have been in operation, my duties have been professorial duties, and not parochial duties.

4832. As a matter of fact, you are not personally acquainted with any of these subjected districts, are you?—I am not, for the reason that I have stated.

4833. Then you do not speak from personal knowledge of what goes on in any of them?—No, how can I? I am living far away from them, and am occupied with another class of duties altogether. One of the Army chaplains would be able to give full information in regard to what he has seen in more than one of the subjected districts.

4834. I am not questioning your evidence in any way, only it is, of course, my duty to test it, and see to what extent it is founded upon personal observation?—I did expect to have been put in possession by a friend, who is an Army chaplain, of the results of his experience, but by some accident or other the document has miscarried.

D D

4835. I rather

2 May 1882.]

Rev. G. OSBORN, D.D.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

4835. I rather wanted to know the result of your own experience: and I think you admit that, as far as your own personal knowledge of the subjected districts goes, you can have no such experience!—I have already stated that I am wholly occupied with duties far away from them, but I know something of human nature in subjected districts and non-subjected districts.

4836. Then, in fact, you argue rather from your general knowledge of human nature (which I have no doubt is very great and varied) than from personal experience, of which, as you say, you have none?—Precisely.

4837. You have expressed a strong opinion, I think, to the effect, that if these examinations were carried on at all, they should be applied to men as well as to women?—Yes.

4838. Let me now read to you a sentence or two out of the Report of the Royal Commission bearing upon that point, as to which I do not know that there was any dissentient; at paragraph 60 of their Report the Royal Commissioners say: "Many witnesses have urged that, as well on grounds of justice as expediency, soldiers and sailors should be subjected to regular examinations. We may at once dispose of this recommendation, so far as it is founded on the principle of putting both parties to the sin of fornication on the same footing, by the obvious but not less conclusive reply, that there is no comparison to be made between prostitutes and the men who consort with them. With the one sex the offence is committed as a matter of gain; with the other it is an irregular indulgence of a natural impulse"; I understand that you entirely disagree with that?—I certainly could not endorse that, because I think both sexes are equally subject to the Divine law.

4839. But you do not consider that the question ought to be in any way affected by the fact that these unfortunate women carry on prostitution as a profession, and not on the impulse of the moment; that would not affect your opinion at all?—Not in the slightest degree, because they have no right to carry on a profession that is injurious to the State.

4840. Then the only remedy that you would suggest, I understand, would be, that prostitution should be put down by law; would it not come to that?—Not by law; by the spread of true religion and by the influence of the Gospel on personal character; by teaching men to fear God and keep His commandments; that is the only way to put down prostitution.

4841. And in the meantime you would think that the evil of this frightful disease being allowed to run rampant among the population would be very much outweighed by other considerations?—The lesser evil of the two.

4842. I do not know whether you have read the evidence which has been tendered in support of the Acts?—No, not thoroughly.

4843. Perhaps you will take it from me that evidence has been tendered (I say nothing about its weight) to shew that these Acts do, as a matter of fact, deter the younger class of women from entering upon a career of prostitution?—I should be very glad to hear it if it is true; but

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

I have no means of judging whether it is true or not.

4844. Assuming that to be the fact, would not that, in your opinion, be something to set against the great evils which you attribute to the operation of the Acts?—I should think not.

4845. You think that it is not an appreciable benefit to be set-off against what you consider the evil of the Acts?—It is doing evil that good may come, I should say.

4846. You are aware that provision is made under the Acts for the religious and moral instruction of these unfortunate women after they once get in hospital?—I have heard so.

4847. You have read the Acts, and therefore I assume that you are aware of it?—I have read the Acts.

4848. Section 12 of the Act of 1866 requires it?—Yes.

4849. You have never attended, I suppose, any of these Lock hospital ministrations, and you do not know what religious instruction is given there?—I do not know, because, as I have already stated, I have been out of the range of that.

4851. May we not assume that if this spiritual and moral instruction, which is required by the Acts, is properly given, it would tend to deter them from re-entering upon a career of vice; in some cases it has, I believe, done so?—And in others not. I am not aware whether there are any statistics that determine the proportions of those who have been reformed by instruction, and those who have returned to their former course of life.

4852. There are such statistics, but I gather that you have not seen them?—I have not seen them.

4853. You spoke of encouraging soldiers to marry; I suppose you are not aware that that would interfere very materially with the efficiency of the service?—I am not aware of it, and I do not believe it when it is propounded.

4854. You do not think that to have women and children in barracks would interfere with the military efficiency of the Army?—Provision is made for wives now.

4855. But to a very small extent?—That is the misery of it.

4856. I presume that you have not studied the question of what effect the marriage of soldiers would have upon the efficiency of the Army?—I have studied it carefully. It is determined in my mind by one consideration, that one sound and honest man is worth a good many that are not sound and honest, but are unchaste and diseased; he is worth more to the country in a physical point of view, and in a moral point of view he is likely to have more courage, and to have have more work in him, and to work from higher motives.

4857. Then one of your remedies for this state of things, which the Acts are intended at any rate to meet, would be to allow all soldiers to marry?—Yes; not to compel them to do so.

4858. But to give every facility for soldiers marrying?—That is the Divine remedy for fornication. The Divine remedy is, that every man should have his own wife and every woman her own husband; that is a law which cannot be contravened.

4859. You spoke of these memorials which have been signed on behalf of the Conference by, I think you said, 700 ministers of your important denomination?—Yes.

4860. Could you give me any idea of how many out of those 700 ministers came from or have had any experience in subjected districts?—That would be a very difficult question to answer, because our ministers, itinerate, that is to say, once in three years change their places of labour. In the course of that time a large number of them would have laboured in the protected districts, and in pastoral work they would have had an opportunity of seeing how the Acts operate.

4861. You could not give me any idea, I suppose, of the number?—It is not possible, without a careful examination of the documents, which I have not made.

4862. In these meetings that you say were held, was any prominence given to the statements of ministers who had laboured in subjected districts?—As far as I remember there have been such statements.

4863. But you could not give us the particulars, I suppose?—I could not give the particulars without notice.

4864. You spoke of the voluntary submission to the examination being degrading to the women; would not that also apply to the case of a woman (I am speaking of a professional prostitute, not of a virtuous woman) presenting herself at a hospital, say to a hospital supported by the State, and insisting upon it that she had disease, and asking to be examined?—I do not know of any hospital supported by the State; there may be such.

4865. I suppose you are aware that it has been proposed to meet the evil which these Contagious Diseases Acts were intended to counteract, by providing Lock hospitals at which women might present themselves voluntarily, and in which they might be detained until cured; I think that was one of the recommendations of the Royal Commission. Supposing that such a State-supported Lock hospital was established, would not the objections which you have raised apply very much, first of all, to the establishment of such a hospital, and, secondly, to the examination of women who presented themselves there?—Every woman who offered herself for examination would virtually profess herself a prostitute.

4866. Therefore, your objections, founded upon the inherent sin of prostitution and the wickedness of acknowledging it by the State in any form, would apply equally to a Lock hospital supported by State endowments, at which these women might come and present themselves voluntarily for examination?—They would.

0.75.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

4867. I take it that your view would be, that the more effective these Acts were from a sanitary point of view, the more objectionable they would be from a moral point of view, and that for the reason that you gave, that they would give rise to more sin?—Exactly; to make them effective, they would require to be made universal, and that would involve the establishment of these objectionable institutions throughout the entire land.

Dr. Farquharson.

4868. May I ask you whether you look upon venereal disease as a direct punishment for sin?—I believe it is never found but where the sin is committed.

4869. But if it is a direct punishment for sin, does it not fall with great inequality upon different sinners, inasmuch as the worse sinner may very often escape, while the lesser sinner may be struck with disease?—One man may take a great deal more wise than another, and it may affect him differently in proportion to his constitution; I think that is universal.

4870. But if it is actually punishment for sin, is not the punishment quite out of all proportion to the offence?—That is a point upon which I am not desirous of offering any opinions. It is enough for me to know that the sin is sooner or later connected with the suffering; I simply deal with the fact.

4871. But you do not wish to give any opinion upon the inequality of the incidence of the punishment?—I am not so well conversant with the details of that disease as to be able to give a satisfactory answer to that question. My experience of it has been principally gained in the hospitals in years gone by.

4872. What I mean is, that a young man who has had connection with a woman once, say when he was perhaps in a state of intoxication, may catch a disease which may adhere to him through all his life; whereas another very vicious man, who has constant connection with women, by using certain precautions, may escape altogether; so that he whom you may call the accidental sinner is more severely punished than the confirmed offender?—I take it that there can be no such thing as an accidental sinner.

4873. The only way in which I used the expression was, that it is accidental when a young fellow, in a state of drink, has connection with a woman, without perhaps really knowing what he is about?—It is two sins. The first sin is to get drunk, and, and having committed that sin, he is open to every other.

4874. I think I understood you to say that you would not propose to check prostitution by law?—I prefer the influence of moral considerations and of advancing knowledge.

4875. But that, of course, must be a very slow and gradual process?—It is going on continually; I am not aware that it need be very slow, because every man has a conscience, and man's conscience is on the side, generally, not of prostitution but of purity.

4876. Then you do not think that it is justifiable,

Rev. G. OSBORN, D.D.

fiable, in the meantime, to try and check the evil effects of this disease, which we cannot check by law, or of a system of prostitution which you do not recommend to be checked by law?—I am not sure that I understand the question.

4877. If you wait until moral and religious training has the desired effect, do you not think that, in the meantime, it is justifiable to try and check the evil effects of prostitution on the community?—I do not think it justifiable; I think it is an unmixed mischief; judging on moral grounds (and I think that the moral grounds outweigh all other considerations) no good can ever come of doing what is essentially wrong; and when you encourage prostitution you encourage what is essentially wrong, and incurably wrong, and universally wrong.

4878. Just one word about the question of the marriage of soldiers, as to which the Judge Advocate General asked you. You may be aware that if we allowed a whole regiment to marry, the increase of expense would be very large?—Quite so; but then it would save other expenses; it would not be a pure increase of expense.

4879. I think you stated that a married soldier would probably fight with more courage; do you not think that an unmarried man, who had not a wife and children depending upon him, would be more likely to fight with courage than one who had those persons depending upon him?—Not if he were a habitual sinner in the way of drunkenness and fornication; that is my point; that the want of moral qualities weaken the men and costs the country so much more.

4880. I think you are assuming what is hardly justifiable, that all unmarried soldiers must necessarily be dissolute characters?—I never intended to assume it, but it is notorious that many are.

4881. Then you would recommend universal matrimony for the civil population?—For those who desire it; I think it is the Divine remedy for the sin. The highest law says, as plainly as words can say it: "To avoid fornication let everyone have his own wife."

4882. But the Divine law does not support your wife and children if you have no other means of doing so?—It encourages those qualities which make them no burden to the country; it makes men temperate, and virtuous, and frugal, and self-denying, and so enriches the country.

4883. But it cannot provide them all with sufficient means to support a wife and family in comfort and decency?—Very well, then let the State do it, rather than incur the loss of morality and the loss of money which these Acts involve.

Mr. William Fowler.

4884. I want to get rather more clearly your view about the effect of the law in this matter as prohibiting a vice. You have no objection, as I understand you, to a law which does all it can to put vice down?—I have not expressed any opinion upon that point, I think.

4885. I want to get your opinion, because you are aware that prostitution, although it is not a crime, is an offence against the law now, and that the police have directions and authority to put down disorderly houses where prostitution is carried on; you have no objection, I apprehend, to that kind of law?—The peace must be preserved at all costs.

4886. But "disorderly houses" does not mean merely houses where there is riot and violence, but houses where prostitution is carried on; supposing a house to be of that character, I apprehend that you would approve of a law which sought to put it down?—Under these Acts?

4887. Under the ordinary law of England, which has nothing to do with these Acts whatever?—I do not see how such a law would work.

4888. We have had evidence before our Committee that it does work, and that in large towns a great diminution of the brothels has been effected by the old law, by the common action of the police putting them down (apart altogether from these Acts, but under laws which existed long before these Acts were thought of); so far as that goes I apprehend that your objection does not arise, because that is a simple prohibition without anything in the character of a license?—As I understand it, that practice affords no encouragement, and no additional facilities for the crime.

4889. It is a direct discouragement?—Precisely.

4890. The question was put as if you deprecated all interference of the law with this offence; I do not understand you to say that, but merely that you disapprove of this way of interfering with it?—I disapprove of any way of interfering which practically encourages the vice.

4891. You were not aware of the existence of those Acts to which I referred?—I expressed myself doubtfully upon a matter upon which I was doubtful.

4892. There was also a remark made, I think, by the Judge Advocate General, and your answer to it seemed rather to imply your indifference to the existence and prevalence of disease. If I understood you aright you did not mean that?—I should be sorry to be considered indifferent to the existence of so much bitter suffering.

4893. There was a suggestion made that you would object to any arrangement by which the State should assist a woman to obtain back her health by going (although she was not forced to go) of her own accord to a hospital?—At the expense of the State. I distinguish between private benevolence and State provision.

4894. If I understood you rightly, you have no objection to any woman going to a doctor and asking to be helped in her sufferings as a voluntary act?—That is not done under an Act of Parliament. My difficulty is that the Act of Parliament provides that the woman shall be examined, either voluntarily or compulsorily.

4895. But supposing that we had voluntary hospitals, where a woman could go of her own accord, and which were provided by private benevolence, the mere fact of the examination is not what you object to, because that is a matter incidental to medical practice?—If it is not compulsory, I do not object to it.

4896. Your objection is to a provision, as it were,

2 May 1882.]

Rev. G. OSBORN, D.D.

were, for cleaning up the women for their use for profligate purposes?—Precisely.

4897. But I understood you to say that you would object to hospitals paid for by the State, even supposing that there was no compulsion on the women to go into them, because I understood you to mean this, that if you put a hospital in one town to assist the prostitutes of that town, you must, by the same argument, put a hospital at the State expense in every town?—My answer implied that. I did not use those words, but it would imply universal inspection, universal regulation, and universal medication at the expense of the country.

4898. That is to say, that there is no principle upon which to distinguish the prostitutes of one town from the prostitutes of another town?—Not on the moral ground, only on the economical ground.

4899. If the soldier requires protection from disease, so also with the civil population?—Precisely.

4900. And if the State is so anxious and so nervous about the condition of the soldiers, the State ought to be equally anxious about the condition of the civil population, if the disease is so terrible, and so wide spread; is it not so?—I can see no reason why, what is held to be necessary for the citizen in a red coat, should not be held to be necessary for the citizen in a black coat.

4901. You are aware, I suppose, that there was at one time an organisation for the purpose of spreading this system over the whole country?—I have heard so.

4902. Do you not think that if the system be good, benevolent, and excellent, it ought to be spread over the whole country?—I have been accustomed to think so and to say so.

4903. The groundwork of the system, of course, as I suppose you are aware, was the health of the Army and Navy?—I think so. It began with that statement, "If you want a good fighting machine you must keep it in good order."

4904. Something was said about the services and the spiritual arrangements under these Acts; I think I understood you to mean that you thought there was something a little inconsistent in having all this spiritual machinery, at the same time that the whole system adopted and founded by the Acts implies that the woman is to go out again if she likes and carry on her trade?—I could not put that better than the late Dr. Guthrie put it: "The Redeemer sent the bad woman away, and said, Go and sin no more. The Acts send her away, practically, saying, Go and sin again."

4905. A great deal has been said about these arrangements with regard to the improvement of the women, and, of course, we admit that those who put them into the Act of Parliament had good motives; but you think, as I understand you, that there is an inconsistency on the very face of them?—I could not understand how a poor prostitute could be instructed to any advantage unless she was instructed to leave her calling, and then the intention of the Act would be defeated.

4906. Then you understand the intention of the Act not to be to abolish prostitution, but to make prostitution less harmful?—To make it as harmless as it can be made in the case of the military and naval population.
0.75.

Mr. William Fowler—continued.

4907. There is nothing in the Acts, is there, which points to the putting down of prostitution?—I do not remember anything.

4908. I have not discovered it, and I wanted to know if you had?—So far as I was impressed on reading the Acts, they appeared to support the idea that prostitution would go on, and that it must be rendered innocuous if possible.

4909. Is not the fundamental idea of the Acts that prostitution is a necessary evil?—I am afraid it is.

4910. Is not that the excuse for it, if there be an excuse?—I have understood so.

4911. One has seen that argument frequently?—We have seen that argument frequently, but, of course, as a Christian minister, I cannot admit that it is a necessary evil.

4912. I quite agree with you; but even looking at it from a somewhat less exalted platform, it would be a monstrous proposition, would it not, to say that such a thing was a necessary evil?—I could understand it in a heathen man; I could not understand it in a Christian man.

4913. But it is very degrading to human nature, is it not, to assume such a thing?—Yes, and very pernicious in every point of view. For a little temporary enjoyment everything is sacrificed, property and health and respectability.

Sir Henry Wolff.

4914. With regard to what the honourable Member has just asked you, in which he has endeavour to establish by your answers that you consider it an inconsistency that there should be spiritual ministration side by side with the physical supervision under these Acts, do you see any objection to there being any spiritual ministration to these women whilst under cure?—Simply on the ground of inconsistency. They are there under a system which is designed to provide for a continuance of malpractices, and which assumes that they will continue. The hospitals, as I understand, are not established for the sake of those who wish to leave, but for the sake of those who wish to go on in their former courses.

4915. But are you aware that every opportunity is given to the clergy, and the charitable ladies and others, who wish to reclaim those women, to come to the hospitals and endeavour to reclaim them, and put them through a good course of teaching?—I hope so; I am glad that it is so.

4916. You see no objection to that being the case, do you?—None, except that which I have already stated, viz., the circumstances under which they receive those attentions, and the fact that the cost which those attentions involve is borne by the Government for a particular and well-known purpose.

4917. Assuming that these Acts are in force, you see no objection, do you, to charitable persons and ministers of religion having access to those women with a view of persuading them to leave their career?—It is never too late for a sinner to turn from the error of his ways, and therefore I cannot object to any sinner being exhorted to do so at any time; but I would not set up an institution under such conditions.
D D 3 therefore

4918. But the institution existing, you do not object to good persons having access to these women, with a view of inducing them to leave their present course of life?—No, I do not understand that anything that I have said implied that. I certainly conveyed no idea of that kind, so far as I am aware.

4919. Therefore we are at one upon that subject. Has the Wesleyan Conference any correspondence with local ministers; do they write reports of what takes place in their districts, or anything of that kind?—Not to the Conference. Every man is amenable to a committee of the Conference, which meets annually, for any misdemeanour; but full reports and details of what every man does are not presented.

4920. Is there anybody to whom they send those reports?—Do I rightly understand the question to refer to ministers generally?

4921. To ministers generally?—No, they do not furnish reports in writing. We assume that every man does his duty, and we call him to account if he does not.

4922. Is there any permanent organisation connected with the Conference; have you a standing secretary, or any officer of that kind, a man who carries on the records of the Conference from year to year?—The records of the Conference are carefully kept from year to year.

4923. By whom?—By the secretary.

4924. Is he a permanent secretary?—He is not a permanent secretary, but a secretary chosen annually in the same way as the president is chosen.

4925. Is there a permanent office anywhere?—No, there is no permanent office.

4926. Then there are no means by which you can obtain reports from the ministers in these subjected districts as to their opinions of what is going on?—We could obtain them immediately by correspondence.

4927. Have you obtained any?—Not that I am aware of.

4928. None that you could give to the Committee?—No, the minister to whom I applied, in prospect of coming here to-day, to give me the result of his experience in one or two subjected districts, has unfortunately failed me. I have not the document with me, or I should have been able to produce it; it may be forthcoming at a future day.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4929. I understood that your impression was that the object of the Acts was to make a more effective fighting machine, or rather, to make as effective a fighting machine as possible?—Precisely, and to keep soldiers and sailors in good condition and fit for their work.

4930. But I suppose you are also aware that the object of many other supporters of the Acts was the desire to afford relief to a very suffering class?—I do not find that in the Acts.

4931. But I am speaking for myself and others who supported the Acts when they were first passed, when, I say, that our object, as frequently stated, was to afford this relief to the unfortunate class to whom they were to be applied?—I have already stated that I give many supporters of the Acts credit for the kindest intentions and the most benevolent wishes, but I entirely distrust their judgment on that point.

4932. You give many of the supporters of the Acts credit for humane intentions?—Very kind intentions.

4933. With regard to the medical power of treating this disease throughout the country, I presume you are aware that voluntary efforts are altogether insufficient to afford relief to this suffering class at the present moment; are you not aware that the voluntary hospitals throughout the country can only provide for a very small number of prostitutes?—I cannot say that my knowledge of the facts would enable me to answer that question positively; but I should think it very likely to be so.

4934. How many voluntary Lock hospitals have you ever heard of?—I am not prepared to answer that question at the moment; but in the days when I did see hospitals, I have seen patients of that class in ordinary hospitals.

4935. Supposing you were told, as the fact is, that there is only accommodation in this very city of London for 200 patients in voluntary Lock hospitals, should you not say that that was very inadequate accommodation?—I should fear so.

4936. Therefore, if the Government hospitals were suddenly abolished, there would be nothing, or practically nothing, to supply the void which would be thus created?—It might be so, if the voluntary effort did not increase it; a great impulse would be given, no doubt, to voluntary effort if persons felt that they could relieve suffering without promoting sin.

4937. We will leave the moral question for the moment, and go to facts?—I never dissociate them in any view of the case.

4938. That is a matter of opinion?—I only speak for myself; but I never do and never can dissociate them.

4939. Are you aware that, at the present moment, the subsidy from the State in aid of Lock hospitals, and therefore for the relief of those suffering from this terrible disease, amounts, in round numbers, to something like 30,000*l.* a year?—Yes.

4940. Would you desire to see that suddenly withdrawn, and nothing to supply its place?—I distinguish between a voluntary contribution to a voluntary institution, and a contribution which is not voluntary to an institution of a totally different kind.

4941. You must be aware that it would be impossible, for a very considerable time, to obtain any voluntary contributions which would at all amount to the sum of 30,000*l.* a year?—I have known very much larger sums raised in a very small time for charitable and religious purposes.

4942. Do you really think that if suddenly this grant was withdrawn, within any reasonable time a sum of 30,000*l.* a year could be procured by voluntary subscription?—I think it is not impossible.

2 May 1882.]

Rev. G. OSBORN, D.D.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

possible. I have had great experience in raising large sums by voluntary contributions.

4943. Then you really think that if the Acts were repealed at once, it would be possible for such a thing to be done?—I do, indeed, think it possible.

4944. Have you ever directed your efforts to raising subscriptions for a voluntary Lock hospital?—No.

4945. Why, if it is not an impertinent question, has not that been done?—My hands are full of other business.

4946. Will you give the Committee any information as to whether the members of your body, generally, have taken any pains to raise voluntary subscriptions in aid of Lock hospitals?—I have known them to be connected with similar institutions in various parts of the country along with their fellow Christians; it is not a matter for denominational action.

4947. I was not speaking of them as denominationalists; but I asked you whether you are aware whether those of your body with whom you are more intimately acquainted have made any decided efforts to obtain a voluntary Lock hospital?—No; I am not aware of their doing anything more than maintaining institutions of that description in the neighbourhoods where they respectively reside.

4948. Can you name any Lock hospital?—I am not speaking of Lock hospitals at all.

4949. As a matter of fact, have the members of your own body, or those with whom you are more intimately acquainted, taken any steps towards assisting Lock hospitals?—I am not aware that they have, otherwise than in their character as private citizens; not in their denominational character.

4950. You have expressed a very decided opinion that these Acts encourage prostitution and smooth the way to fornication?—I have.

4951. Would you kindly tell me, very shortly, in what way you think they encourage prostitution?—By rendering it comparatively harmless. I understand that the object is to render it comparatively harmless, so that those who practise the vice shall suffer as little as possible.

4952. Whether men or women?—Whether men or women; but, for the sake of men, the women are cured if they can be cured.

4953. And not for the sake of the women?—The women are not soldiers or sailors; and, as I understand it, it is for the sake of the soldiers and sailors that the Acts are introduced and supported (I may be mistaken, but that is my impression), and for the sake of the population at large they would not have been passed.

4954. I have already told you that the motive of many of the supporters of the Acts, amongst whom was myself, was in an equal degree to assist and relieve from suffering these unfortunate women?—That does not appear on the Acts, and I have no cognisance of it except by individual statement.

4955. But you have cognisance of the fact that great relief has been afforded to the women?—It is possible; I do not deny it.

4956. Do you think that soldiers in subjected districts, that is to say in districts subject to the operation of the Acts, indulge in prostitution more than those who are in unsubjected districts?—That is a question which I have no means whatever of answering; but it is a natural conclusion that men who are certified, as it were, of their safety, or of their comparative safety, should be more ready to do wrong than men who take their risk.

4957. I apprehend that you have not seen the Parliamentary Paper which was laid upon the table last year, and which is No. 13 in the Appendix of the Report of the Committee of last year. It is a copy of a letter from an officer in command of a regiment in Ireland, as to the expediency of extending the application of the Contagious Diseases Acts to Dublin; and first of all, if you do not know it already, I should inform you that Dublin is not a subjected district. In this Paper, Colonel Tucker, who was then commanding the 80th Regiment, says: "The regiment under my command has suffered severely from this very preventible cause of disease, thus entailing a considerable loss upon the Government, not only for cost of medicines, but more especially for loss of men's services. It must be within the knowledge of all commanding and staff officers that, while the men are practically kept in a condition of compulsory celibacy, it is impossible for them to return to the barracks off pass, or even to walk in the adjacent streets, without being accosted by troops of largely diseased women, with what result the military hospitals abundantly show. At this moment two boys of the 80th Regiment, one under 15, are in hospital suffering from venereal disease," in an unsubjected district, remember. And in paragraph 4, Colonel Tucker writes as follows: "Since the arrival of my regiment in Dublin there have been the enormous number of 166 admissions to hospital of men suffering from primary syphilis, and the admissions from gonorrhoea amount to 118, making a total of 284; thus, during a period of 10 months, considerably over 43 per cent. of the unmarried portion of my regiment have been incapacitated from duty. I submit, for the sake of economy, if not for the benefit of the soldiers, some steps should be taken to wipe out this easily preventible scourge?"—I find nothing new in that whatever.

4958. Except this, that the fact of the soldiers being in an unsubjected district, does not in any way restrain their indulgence?—That may be, but I am unable to see the bearing of it.

4960. I give you the means of forming an opinion. Do you not think that the fact that during a period of 10 months more than 43 per cent. of one regiment were incapacitated from duty by this terrible scourge is pretty clear proof that a soldier, before he resorts to this practice, does not much consider whether it is a subjected or an unsubjected district?—Possibly not. Sinners are constantly and everywhere befooled by their sins, and do not think of what they ought to think of.

4961. Your opinion is also that men ought to be examined as well as women. My Right honourable friend has put some questions to you upon that point, and I will not repeat them; but I would ask you whether you have ever applied your mind to how such an examination could be carried out?—I suppose soldiers and prostitutes are constantly seen together in the streets. If a woman is taken up, and subjected to examination because she is seen with men, why should not the man be taken up and subjected to examination because he is seen with women?

4962. Then you are of opinion that every soldier seen with a woman ought to be taken up?—If it is right to take up a woman and examine her, it is right to take up a man and examine him; that is my argument.

4963. But you do not take up a prostitute who is seen with a soldier?—Do you not? Is not a policeman at liberty to summon a woman to examination if he suspects that she is a prostitute; and why should he not have the same liberty to subject a man to examination, if he suspects that he is a fornicator?

4964. I thought you meant an examination in a hospital, in order to see whether they are diseased or not?—Very well, take him to a hospital, and see whether he is diseased or not.

4965. Whenever a policeman sees a soldier in conversation with a prostitute, is he to take the soldier up to the hospital, and have him examined?—Put the man and the woman upon the same footing. It is the footing that the Act puts the woman upon; why not put the man upon the same footing; they are partners in sin, and in the danger.

4966. The woman who is a prostitute is found to be a prostitute by a magistrate, or by a voluntary submission, and, at stated periods, she has to be examined; how in the world could you apply such a practice as that to men?—To military discipline there is nothing impossible.

4967. It is a very extraordinary proposition; could you give it some shape; what would you have the military authorities do?—Whatever is now done with regard to the women; I cannot answer the question more plainly. You give a certain power in regard to the examination of females, and I ask why that should be restricted to females, and not extended to their partners in sin?

4968. Then I ask you, how you propose to carry that out, because it is idle to make vague propositions without giving them any definite shape?—As it is carried out now. I understand that it is carried out now in regard to one sex; I do not suppose that I am called upon to devise means as to how it should be carried out in regard to the other; I see no more difficulty in the one case than in the other.

4969. But you cannot summon a soldier for being a prostitute?—You can summon him for using a prostitute.

4970. How are you to prove it?—You see him in the streets; that is the case I put.

4971. Do I rightly understand you to suggest that every time a soldier is seen talking to a prostitute in the street he is to be taken to hospital and examined?—I am not bound to devise means to carry into effect what I believe to be a bad system; but I would take the words of the Act with regard to women, and apply them to the men.

4972. This is such a curious point that I should like to have some light thrown upon it?—I am not sufficiently familiar with the words of the Act.

Chairman.

4973. Will you look at the 15th section of the Act of 1866?—That is repealed by the Act of 1869.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

4974. Will you read that section?—"Where an information on oath is laid before a justice by a superintendent of police, charging to the effect that the informant has good cause to believe that a woman therein named is a common prostitute, and either is resident within the limits of any place to which this Act applies, or, being resident within five miles of those limits has within fourteen days before the laying of the information been within those limits for the purpose of prostitution, the justice may, if he thinks fit, issue a notice thereof addressed to such woman." I understand that to be a provision applying to the female prostitute; I cannot understand why, if answerable words were put into this clause, it might not apply to the other party.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

4975. Then, mutatis mutandis, I understand that you would strike out the word "prostitute," or whatever it is, and that you would put in, "Where a soldier has been consorting with a prostitute"?—Where he has been a common companion of prostitutes.

4976. I understand that you would like to see a new section passed which should apply that particular Act to men; and that, when the inspector of the police under the Act had good cause to believe that a soldier has been consorting with a prostitute, then he should take him to the hospital and have him examined; is that your view?—I wish to see the whole thing swept away; but, assuming its continuance, I wish it to be equally applied to men and women.

4977. Is that the way in which you would have it applied?—I am not bound on the moment to prescribe a mode of applying it to men; but I have seen enough of soldiers to know that those associations are just as notorious as the associations of prostitutes.

4978. Without applying it particularly, but applying it generally, your idea, as I understand it, is that general powers should be given to the police to subject men whom they see consorting with prostitutes to examination in hospitals?—Why not? I ask all supporters of the Acts, why not?

4979. You are in favour of such a provision as that?—If the Acts are to continue I am in favour of their being equally applied.

4980. In that way?—Mutatis mutandis.

4981. Would you also wish them to be applied to

to civilians in subjected districts as well?—Why not?

4982. I understood you to say, very clearly, that you considered that prostitution was not a necessary evil?—I consider that no moral evil is necessary.

4983. Will you point out any period in the history of the world in which prostitution has not existed?—I do not hold that what has been is to be the rule for what ought to be, or is to be. I hold the world to be a fallen world, a sinful world, and yet to be capable of recovery, and certain to be recovered some day.

4984. But is it not the fact that from the time of the Patriarchs down to the present, prostitution has always existed?—What then; I want to know what the argument is intended to be. I deny the conclusion that, because it always has been, it always is to be. I must answer you as a minister of the Gospel, whose whole business is to turn sinners from their sins, and to tell them to fear God and keep His commandments; and I tell every man, who asks me that question, that fornication is a sin, and that he has no right to commit it, and it is his duty to abstain from it; and, therefore, it is not a necessary evil; that is my answer.

4985. I understood that perfectly well; but the question that I asked you was, whether it was not the fact that, from the time of the Patriarchs down to the present moment, prostitution has always existed?—My answer is that sin has always been in the world; but Jesus Christ came to save men from their sins.

4986. How do you propose to put down prostitution; would you put it down by more stringent enactments and by more stringent punishment for the practice, or would you simply apply moral means?—By the influence of Christ's teaching and example; that is how I propose to put it down.

4987. Have you had much success in your station in putting down prostitution?—I think so. I think that, if you will read the journals of John Wesley, you will find many an instance of prostitutes ceasing to be prostitutes and becoming religious women.

4988. But I understand you to say that you would not make any more severe enactments against prostitution?—I do not trust to legislative measures; I trust to moral influences and moral teaching.

4989. Then I am at liberty to conclude that your opinion is, that at the present moment more severe enactments ought not to be made against prostitution?—I see no need for them.

Mr. Hopwood.

4990. My Right honourable friend has been pressing upon you the danger of suddenly withdrawing State subventions to those particular hospitals; why should we assume that State aid should be suddenly withdrawn if mischief is to arise from it?—I do not know; but my answer was intended to convey the idea that if it were I should not shrink from it; I should trust to voluntary efforts to supply what was wanting.

4991. Is it, in your judgment, a cause rather restraining private benevolence that it should be known that the State is, from doubtful policy, 0.75.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

subsidizing these particular hospitals?—I am not aware that that matter has been considered by the benevolent public generally in that light; I am not aware that sufficient attention has been given to the subject to enable me to state, conclusively, that any such opinion prevails.

4992. As to Lock hospitals, do you know any reason why there should be special Lock hospitals, or why there should not be, by the care of the benevolent, hospitals that should treat every kind of destitute diseased persons?—Apart from medical reasons, which I am not competent to speak upon, I have already stated that, so far as I have had experience, such cases have been found in the ordinary hospitals.

4993. You were asked whether your denomination has provided especially for these cases; do you know that it has been a matter of course with any denomination to provide for them?—I am not aware that it has ever been treated as a denominational question. It seems to belong to the philanthropic public at large.

4994. Your argument, as I understand it, as regards the Acts encouraging prostitution is, that they do subsidize the cure of this particular disease, and the object is to make indulgence safer?—The only object, as I understand it; and it is upon that assumption that I have proceeded.

4995. And that object is at present declared in favour solely of soldiers and sailors?—Solely.

Chairman.

4996. Assuming that these Acts were repealed, would you object to the institution at the expense of the State of voluntary hospitals, at which prostitutes might voluntarily present themselves for cure?—I should object to its being done at the expense of the State. That is what I said before, I believe, in answer to the question.

4997. Would you object to the institution of such hospitals by private benevolence?—Does your question refer to hospitals specifically devoted to the cure of diseases which are the result of vice?

4998. That is what my question has reference to?—Provided it were done by private benevolence I should very much regret that parties exercise no sounder judgment, but, as they do not take my money I have no right to interfere; but the State takes my money, and therefore I have a right to speak.

4999. But you would so far disapprove of the institution of such voluntary hospitals by private benevolence that you would think it wrong yourself to subscribe to them?—Certainly I would, because they smooth the path to vice.

5000. Your objection then to the State instituting voluntary hospitals for the cure of the results of vice, arises from the belief that such hospitals must minister to facility for vice?—To the continuance and increase of vice.

5001. Do you object to the establishment by private individuals of general hospitals in which women carrying on the profession of prostitution can be treated for venereal disease?—I do not feel the same objection to that, firstly, because it is entirely voluntary on all sides, it does not take my

my money at all; and secondly, because it does not interfere with the general practice of hospitals to receive all comers.

5002. But do you not think that in so far as it receives prostitutes and cures them, and thus willingly or unwillingly enables them to carry on their profession, it offends against the principles which you have laid down?—That is an evil for which I am not responsible, an incidental evil; but it is an evil and a great evil.

5003. But would the existence of such an evil prevent you from subscribing to a general voluntary hospital in which prostitutes would be treated?—I think not; it is a question that has never been put to me before.

5004. There is one other topic upon which I should like to ask you one or two questions; prostitution is in itself and in its results a great evil, and an offence against the moral law; that is common ground to us all; you are aware that the State gives a certain amount of toleration to prostitution; is not that so?—I am hardly in a position to say what amount of toleration it gives.

5005. But it gives some amount, or else why are prostitutes plying their trade unprevented by the law?—It does not interfere to prevent them.

5006. You see the State, then, allowing a certain moral evil to exist within certain limits; do you not think that, whilst the State gives such tolerance to an evil, derogatory so far from the moral law, it is the duty of the State to try and minimise the bad results which come from that evil; I mean in this case of the disease which comes from prostitution?—I think not; I do not think that it is the duty of the State to minimise the evil.

5007. Do you think that the State having permitted prostitution to go on, can avail itself of the arguments which you use against remedying the evils resulting from prostitution?—I see no reason why it should not. The State is in the main composed of Christian men, and they cannot escape from the conclusion if they admit the premises.

5008. But admitting the premises that prostitution is a great evil, is it not the duty of the State to put down prostitution?—I have not turned my thoughts to that subject. I should not just now pronounce any definite opinion about it. I think the lines within which the State may safely act in regard to this matter are to repeal the Acts.

5009. Then, although prostitution is a very great evil, you are not prepared to say that it is the duty of the State to suppress it?—I am not prepared to say that it is the duty of the State to suppress theft, though it is a great evil. It punishes it, but what can it do more?

5010. It suppresses theft, so far as punishment can do it; but does it suppress prostitution, so far as punishment can do it?—I am not sufficiently cognisant of the existing law to answer that question. I am under the impression that the existing law is modified considerably, and I cannot go back two hundred years to trace the process.

Chairman—continued.

5011. But you are aware that a certain limited toleration, at least, is practically given to prostitution by the law?—I do not understand that there is any toleration. There is no direct prohibition, and there is no active suppression attempted; but that does not appear to me to amount to toleration.

5012. You know that the State does not take the same active steps against prostitution that it takes against theft?—It does not.

5013. But, although it abstains from using those precautions and preventatives against prostitution, you do not think that the State is, therefore, bound to try and prevent or mitigate the evils which result from prostitution?—For the best of all reasons; in my view, it tends to propagate and foster the vice.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5014. Your attention was drawn by the Judge Advocate General to the 60th paragraph of the Report of the Royal Commission, in which they draw a distinction between men and women in respect of the practice of prostitution, and you were asked, I think, whether you could not accept that as a reason for treating women differently from men, and for treating women as they are treated by the Contagious Diseases Acts; and you replied, that you saw no reason for so doing?—I think that was my reply.

5015. Is it not in your mind a positive and distinct specific objection to this legislation that it recognises this trade of prostitution on the part of the women?—Undoubtedly.

5016. Therefore, the fact that they practice prostitution as a trade, so far as they do so, is not in your mind a reason for the existence of these Acts, but precisely the reverse?—Certainly not.

5017. That is to say, so far from being a reason for the enactment of these statutes, it is an argument against them, because they necessarily recognise the pursuit of that trade?—I said so at the beginning; I think that one of my first statements was, that I objected to them because they lower the whole moral tone of the country.

5018. You seemed to assent to a proposition involved in a question put by the honourable Member for Portsmouth, to this effect: that in the Government Lock hospitals every opportunity was afforded to ministers of all denominations to visit patients; you have no knowledge upon that subject, have you?—Not the slightest.

5019. With regard to your objection to Government Lock hospitals, and even to voluntary Lock hospitals, I understand that you have no objection from the moral point of view to diseases which are the consequence of sexual vice being dealt with charitably, as other diseases are dealt with in the ordinary hospitals of the country?—By the public at large, by voluntary contribution; I commend all attempts to mitigate suffering everywhere as far as possible.

5020. But what I understand you to object to, even in the case of voluntary Lock hospitals, would be the singling out for special care, of those specific diseases which are the consequence of sexual vice?—To giving them a prominence, which of itself is an evil.

of

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

5021. Now, I will carry you to the existing law; I do not know whether you are familiar with the poor law?—I am not; my duties have lain in another direction.

5022. Will you take it from me, that in the administration of the poor law, provision is made in the great poor law infirmaries for the treatment of this disease as well as other diseases?—I should presume so, because paupers are subject to all sorts of diseases.

Mr. GEORGE GILLET, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5025. I BELIEVE you are a Banker in Lombard-street?—Yes.

5026. And you are a member of the Society of Friends?—Yes.

5027. Are you honorary secretary to the Friends' Association for the Abolition of the State Regulation of Vice?—Yes.

5028. I need hardly ask you whether you have given very considerable attention to the subject of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Yes.

5029. And you are familiar with the Acts themselves?—Yes.

5030. To shorten your examination, I will put to you this question: have you read the evidence of the Reverend Mr. Gledstone, given before this Committee at its last meeting?—Yes.

5031. Do you agree with the expression of opinion of Mr. Gledstone upon that occasion?—Yes.

5032. Do you wish to make any reservation upon it?—I do not recollect anything.

5033. Is there anything that you would like specifically to say to this Committee besides endorsing the evidence upon the ground of moral objections to these Acts given by Mr. Gledstone the other day?—I should like to say that I take opposition to these Acts entirely on moral grounds. I am not a medical man, and therefore do not understand the medical question, other than as an ordinary person out of the profession would understand it. My sole opposition is upon moral grounds; I consider the Acts are a compact between the State and prostitution, which I view as prejudicial in every sense to the interests of the country.

5034. And you have no further statement that you wish to make upon that subject; you endorse generally the evidence of the Rev. Mr. Gledstone, and you are satisfied to do that?—Yes; I could have followed the previous witnesses both in what was recorded and what was refused.

5035. I will carry you at once to the question of the action taken by your own body, the Society of Friends; will you inform the Committee of the views which they have entertained, and the part which they have taken, upon this subject?—The Society of Friends became aware of these Acts shortly after the passing of the last Act in 1869; and at their annual assembly, the yearly meeting in May of the following year, the 0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

5023. And, of course, poor law infirmaries are infirmaries supported by the poor rates?—They are.

5024. But as they exist for the benefit of all paupers, you have no objection to the application of the poor rate to the cure of paupers who are suffering from the diseases consequent upon sexual vice?—No; they are paupers, for whose maintenance the country has become responsible.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

matter was brought before the representative meeting of the society. I will put in the Minute which was recorded upon that occasion, which sums up, with instructions to all the subordinate meetings, to use every effort they can to secure the repeal of this legislation. The pith of it is this: "In view of the debate thereon which has taken place during the present week having been adjourned for a month, and believing that the operation of these Acts involves evils of a very grave character, the committee concludes to submit to the yearly meeting, even at this advanced stage of its proceedings, the desirability of urging upon friends in their various localities to use their influence, without loss of time, with their representatives in the House of Commons, to endeavour to obtain the repeal of these Acts." That was the report of the committee that gave it consideration, and the yearly meeting adopted it.

5036. In what year was that?—In 1870.

5037. Since that year what has happened?—Almost every year since then the meeting for sufferings, which is the representative body, sitting in the intervals from May to May, and which has the same authority as the yearly meeting itself, only that the yearly meeting only meets in May, has, on its own behalf, after the assembly at large have decided the question as a whole, sent up from year to year protests grounded on the contradiction of these Acts to the Divine law.

5038. What is the origin of that term, "meeting for sufferings"?—It arose in the early days of the society, when so many were imprisoned. It was a committee then for relieving their sufferings.

5039. Have you ever had a canvass of the recognised ministers of the body?—Yes; in 1874 we canvassed the whole of the recognised ministers of our society, and we received replies from about 90 out of every 100 of them, joining in the protest against these Acts on moral grounds.

5040. How many recognised ministers are there in the Society of Friends?—I should think about 500 or 600.

5041. Those ministers are laymen, of course?—They are laymen; and I should say that the other 10 in every 100, most of them, declined to take up the subject on the ground that it was a question

2 May 1882.]

MR. GILLETT.

question that they did not wish to handle. That was their chief reason for declining to express an opinion. You could count on your fingers the number of those who thought the Acts right and proper, and in harmony with Divine law.

5042. And I may say, may I not, that since this legislation was enacted, members of the Society of Friends have been amongst the most active and persistent of its opponents?—Yes; I may say that in every part of the country, in Ireland, Scotland, and England, Friends have worked personally, and given largely of their money to sustain the cause of repeal. I should say that it is practically an unanimous question with them. In fact, as it seemed to me, when I first heard of it, I should have thought there could be hardly two opinions upon it.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5043. You say that your objection to the Acts is founded entirely upon moral grounds?—Entirely upon moral grounds.

5044. And you have not entered at all into the question of the sanitary operation of the Acts?—I have read the reports of the police, and I have read the War Office Returns, and made myself as conversant with the subject as I could by reading the works of those who advocate the Acts, and so on.

5045. Then, as I understand it, your opinion is expressed entirely irrespectively of the efficient or non-efficient operation of the Acts in a sanitary point of view?—My main objection is apart from whether it is or is not a good means for relieving disease; but I have my own opinion upon that other point.

5046. Would you go so far as the last witness and say, that the more efficient the Acts were in a sanitary point of view, the more objectionable they would be to your mind in a moral point of view?—Yes, I think they would.

5047. Are you, yourself, personally acquainted with any of these subjected districts?—I think I may say that I am not. I have been in subjected districts, but not to pursue any special inquiry.

5048. You have not been there for the purpose of studying the operation of the Acts?—No.

5049. Out of these 500 or 600 ministers that you spoke of, could you give me any idea as to how many had lived or carried on their ministrations in subjected districts?—I do not know that I could.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

5050. Have you any statistics of the number of members of the religious body to which you belong?—About 14,000.

5051. In the whole of the United Kingdom?—Yes.

5052. The number is not increasing, is it?—Not much.

5053. Is it not one of their views that they object to the Army altogether?—Yes.

5054. And you think that there ought to be no Army?—Certainly.

5055. Do you object to the Navy also?—We think that in a right state of things there would be no Army and no Navy.

5056. It was once said to me, on a public occasion by a Dissenting minister, that his main objection to these Acts was, that they were an attempt on the part of man to abrogate and diminish the penalty which it had pleased God to inflict upon the commission of vice; would you hold that doctrine?—My principal objection is that it is a compact between the State and prostitution.

5057. With regard to the objection that I mentioned just now, do you go so far as to agree with that reverend gentleman?—I should not express my opinion in that way; it is capable of a wrong construction.

5058. You do not agree with that opinion?—I should not express it so.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5059. I suppose you would agree with the last witness, Dr. Osborn, in his objections to a hospital supported by State endowment, or State money, in which prostitutes as such were relieved from venereal diseases?—I should object to the State singling out this disease in preference to small-pox, typhus fever, and other forms of disease, which are far more deadly and destructive of the human frame.

5060. But, supposing that ordinary hospitals were established all over the country with a Lock ward attached to them, should you object to that?—I should have no objection to that; I have no objection to the cure of disease, as disease. But I think any ordinary medical practitioner, if a woman came to him and said, "I am leading the life of a common prostitute, and I want you to examine me to see if I am fit to have connection with men," would scout such an idea as carrying out that examination on that ground. But if she came to him and said, "I am diseased, and want to be cured," I think he would consider it quite within his province to attempt to cure her. But what these Acts do is to do the first on Government authority.

5061. I want to see how far you carry your objection to the assistance of the State in these cases. I will take the case of a State-supported hospital with a Lock ward; supposing that a woman known to be a prostitute came to that Lock ward and said, "I want to be examined at the public expense, in order that I may carry on the trade of prostitution after having been so examined; I want to see whether I am diseased or not;" for supposing that her intention to continue the trade of prostitution under these circumstances was communicated to the doctor, and he knew it, not from herself but alunde, should you not think that a system of that kind was obnoxious to the objections which you have raised to the system in force in the subjected districts?—If she introduced it as a part of the request on that ground, I imagine that there would be objections; but I should think the surgeon would have no occasion to go behind the fact that she was a diseased woman, and if she was diseased it would be his duty to cure her.

5062. You admit that in such a case as this given, a professional prostitute coming with disease to the hospital ward, and requesting to be cured, primâ facie for the purpose of enabling her to carry on the trade of prostitution, there ought to be no objection on the part of the surgeon, or on the part of the hospital, to give her relief,

2 May 1882.]

MR. GILLETT.

relief, though the surgeon knew to a certainty that the result of giving her relief would be that she would go back on the streets?—I do not think he ought to refuse to cure disease simply because she was a woman of bad character.

5063. But supposing that he knew perfectly well, and that she, in fact said, that her object in coming to the hospital to get cured of venereal disease was, because that venereal disease interfered with her calling, would you not say that a system which required that woman to be cured with the result, that she carried on her vicious calling, was amenable to the objection which you have stated against the Acts?—It would be very objectionable to have it stated in that kind of way; but I imagine that it would hardly arise in ordinary practice.

5064. But I am putting a hypothetical case; you would object to such a system upon the same grounds, as I understand, you object to the Acts, would you not?—No, not on the same grounds as I object to the Acts; that is an entirely different thing.

5066. In the case of a woman coming openly to these proposed State-supported hospitals, and saying, "I am suffering from this disease, which I have contracted in a course of prostitution; this disease interferes with my carrying on my trade; will you cure me?" I suppose the surgeon would be bound to cure her under those circumstances; should you not say that a system which required a surgeon to act in that way was amenable to some of the objections which you have stated?—I should think it would be better to give the surgeon a little discretion if the woman came over and over again from her life of prostitution.

5067. Does it not strike you that logically some of the objections which have been stated by former witnesses to the operation of the Acts would apply to such a system as that?—I think not, because if I look at these tables of the police I see that 500,000 examinations have taken place, and that 450,000 of those examinations have been examination of healthy people; I cannot understand what the object of the examination of healthy people is. The two things are entirely different.

5068. Your objection, if I have not very much mistaken your evidence, I take it, is to any system under which the State directly, or indirectly, assists women in carrying on a career of vice; is that a fair statement of your evidence?—It is an objection to the State entering into a compact with a woman to carry on the trade of prostitution.

5069. Is it, or is it not, your opinion that the State has no right, directly or indirectly, to give anything in the shape of a helping hand to any woman so as to enable her to carry on the trade of prostitution?—Primâ facie it has no right to do so. Of course in actual practice it is different.

0.75.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

5070. Putting the Acts out of sight for a moment, take the case of a State hospital supported by the State, with a Lock ward (or, if you like, take the case of a Lock hospital, but I understand you to prefer to take the case of a general hospital, supported by State aid), a woman avowedly carrying on the trade of a prostitute comes to that hospital, and says to the surgeon, "I am suffering from a certain disease, and I wish to be cured." He knows that it interferes with her trade, and he knows as well as possible that the very moment she is cured she will go back upon the streets?—How would he know that?

5071. Suppose she tells him, or suppose that he might assume it with absolute certainty, would you or would you not say that any system of State aid, which I will not say had that object, but which had the direct result that the woman cured with State money went back upon the streets, and carried on her trade of prostitution, which of course she could not have done if she had remained diseased, was a vicious system?—It is objectionable; but I imagine that it is done over and over again in the case of men in our present hospitals; they get cured in the hospitals, and go back again to the streets just the same as women.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

5072. Do you object to a woman being compulsorily detained in hospital until she is well?—Yes.

5073. Then would you allow her to go free to propagate disease?—Yes, and the men free to consort with her if they liked.

5074. In a diseased state?—Yes, it is their own choice contracting disease; I say that the State has no interest in whether the woman is free or not from venereal disease.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5075. You are aware, are you not, that under the poor law system existing in this country at this moment, a pauper prostitute has a right to the relief which her condition requires?—Yes.

5076. You are probably aware that all the workhouses have infirmaries attached to them, and that in the larger infirmaries there are wards which are set apart for contagious disorders?—I suppose so.

5077. You will take that from me, I am sure. Those workhouse infirmaries are paid for out of the poor rates, are they not?—Yes.

5078. I do not understand you as objecting to that?—Not at all.

E E 3

5080. And

2 May 1882.]

Mr. GILLETT.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

5080. And if there is nothing in the institution of this arrangement for her cure which implies sanction of prostitution, or which is likely to stimulate fornication and prostitution, you have no objection to those conditions?—I have no objection whatever to a hospital which will take a virtuous woman as well as a prostitute, and cure both alike; but those hospitals that we have will not admit virtuous women that are infected by their husbands.

5081. They prefer the prostitutes?—They prefer the prostitutes for a special design.

5082. That shows their design, and that also, I understand you to say, is conclusive evidence to you of what the moral effect upon the community of the existence of such institutions is certain to be?—It is part and parcel of the continually lessening permission of marriage in the Army; the two things are hand-and-glove together. I believe that the per-centage of marriage permitted in the Army has lessened since these Acts have been introduced.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5083. What is your reason for stating that the per-centage of married soldiers has decreased; have you seen any statistics?—I cannot recall to mind where I have seen it stated, but I have understood that it is so.

5084. You could not state the fact of your own knowledge, I suppose?—I could not, but I am speaking of the number permitted to be married, not of the number who are married.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5085. With reference to the question of the marriages of soldiers, you are aware that our modern system is one of short service, and that the soldiers enter the army younger and leave it younger?—Yes.

5086. And I suppose that the fact would, in your mind, be another reason against making special provision for the gratification of his sensual appetite?—Most decidedly.

The Rev. W. FLEMING STEVENSON, D.D., called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5087. You are a minister of Christ Church, in the neighbourhood of Dublin?—Yes.

5088. Are you the Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland for the year 1881-82?—I am.

5089. Are you member of the Senate of the Royal University of Ireland?—I am.

5090. For how many years have you been in the ministry of your church?—About 22 years.

5091. Have you read the evidence given against the Contagious Diseases Acts on moral and religious grounds by the Reverend Mr. Gledstone?—I have.

5092. Do you generally agree with that evidence?—I do.

5093. Is there any, and if so what, addition that you would like to make on your own part?—I am not aware of any.

5094. Then may I pass at once to the action which your denomination has taken?—I am quite prepared that you should do so.

5095. The Presbyterian Church in Ireland represents what proportion of the Protestant population of that country?—It represents nearly one-half of the Protestant population.

5096. What are your numbers?—Close on 500,000.

5097. How many congregations have you?—Five hundred and sixty.

5098. And how many ministers?—Six hundred and twenty-one.

5099. How many presbyteries?—Thirty-six in Ireland, and one mission presbytery in India.

5100. You have a yearly general assembly, have you not?—It meets every year in June.

5101. Has that assembly petitioned for the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—In various years, beginning with 1871 up to this last year, 1881.

5102. Has it always been unanimous upon the subject?—In 1871 there was an amendment moved, that it was inexpedient to petition. The amendment was supported by a very small number, and the petition was adopted by the assembly.

5103. On all other occasions you have been unanimous?—On all other occasions we have been unanimous.

5104. Will you give to the Committee, so far as you desire to do so, some quotations from your expressions of opinion, to show us the ground which your body has taken?—In 1871 the petition was adopted, on the ground "That the Acts are calculated to inflict much suffering upon a helpless class, outrage their feelings, deaden their sensibilities, and infringe upon their constitutional rights; also that the efficacy of the Acts is extremely doubtful; and also that the attempt of the Acts to deal with the evil stands in the way of other measures that might be tried." The petitioners also protested in that year in emphatic and solemn terms against a mode of dealing with the evil which appears contrary to sound morality, and inconsistent with the law of God. In 1872 they petitioned, "Because the Acts are based upon the unrighteous principle that prostitution is a social necessity, a view adverse to sound morality, and wholly contrary to the word of God." They repeated some of the previous grounds, and they stated that an additional ground was that the Acts confer an arbitrary and most dangerous power upon certain officials: they having, in 1872, expressed their dread lest the sphere of the operation of the Acts should be enlarged, and thereby the evil become increased; in 1873 they solemnly protested against the existence of these Acts in the Statute Book, as opposed to religion, morality, and justice; and said, "They have reason to believe that the operation of the Acts has greatly lowered the tone of public morals within their sphere, and that their general influence has been to deaden conscience, science, and they view with the greatest apprehension efforts made to extend their area." They also expressed their deep regret in that year that a motion made during that Session was opposed by Her Majesty's Government. In 1874 there was no petition; in 1875 there was an unanimous petition; in 1876 there was also an unanimous petition; in 1877 there was no petition, nor in 1878; in 1879 there was an unanimous petition, the same as in 1875, with merely a very slight difference, that under Clause 3 the Acts are called "these most objectionable Acts;" and it is added "That the petitioners are determined to resist to the utmost all such attempts at legislation." In 1880 the petition was unanimous; in 1881 it was unanimous also. I have here the petition adopted in 1879, 1880, and 1881. (The same was handed in.)

5105. In addition to the action of the General Assembly, have the presbyteries taken action?—They have at different times, in different years; and, as an illustration, I may mention that in this year, 18 of the 36 presbyteries at home have taken action, and have adopted petitions or resolutions for repeal, those 18 comprising 273 ministers.

5106. Is there anything else that you think it necessary to state?—I do not know that there is anything else, except to state from my own knowledge that the feeling against these Acts is increasing in intensity, and that with each year the determination to have them repealed is assuming a more decided form, and increasing also in the numbers that support it.

5107. You are speaking now of the north of Ireland?—I am speaking of the Presbyterian Church, which reaches from the north to the extreme south.

Dr. Farquharson.

5108. Do you concur, in the statement which you read just now, that the Acts inflict much suffering upon a helpless class?—I believe that they inflict moral suffering upon a helpless class.

5109. Not physical suffering?—Not physical suffering.

5110. What do you mean exactly by their being helpless; do not they voluntarily take up prostitution as a profession?—They are helpless in the sense, first of all, that they are women who, as a rule, may be called helpless as compared with men. They are helpless, also, inasmuch as the law takes very little cognisance of their protection.

5111. But they are not examined unless they voluntarily consent to be examined?—I understand, by the Acts, that if they do not voluntarily consent they are compelled to be examined.

5112. If they are diseased?—It is not if they are diseased, but if any one whose connection with the Acts affirms that they are diseased.

5113. If they are professional prostitutes?—Or if they are assumed to be professional prostitutes.

5114. Having voluntarily gone into the profession they can voluntarily leave it when they please, can they not?—One of the objections that

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

I have to the Acts is, that they throw every difficulty in the way of their voluntarily leaving.

5115. Would you not admit that the Acts diminish a good deal of suffering by facilitating the treatment of disease?—I have no doubt that they diminish suffering and increase sin.

5116. I do not ask about sin, but only about suffering; do they not diminish a good deal of suffering by affording facilities for the treatment of disease?—I should suppose that they diminish suffering.

5117. Even granting, according to your assumption, that they inflict suffering upon those people, they also diminish suffering, do they not?—The one suffering is physical and the other suffering is moral, and I hold that there is no analogy between them.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

5118. You told the Committee that you had read Mr. Gladstone's evidence; have you read all the evidence that has been given by clergymen who were favourable to the Acts?—Neither favourable nor unfavourable evidence have I read fully; I have glanced here and there at the evidence.

5119. You have not read the whole of the evidence?—No, not at all; I do not profess to have read the whole of the evidence on either side.

5120. Then you have not read the evidence which has been given to the effect that great moral advantages have been derived by the prostitute class in subjected districts?—It strikes me as so extremely unlikely that such moral advantage would take place that I should read that evidence with great interest.

5121. You have not read it?—I have not read it.

5122. Do you not think that it would have been better to have read that evidence?—I come before the Committee to give evidence as to the action of my Church.

5123. Without having studied the question thoroughly?—I have studied it as thoroughly as I can with such busy occupations as I have.

5124. Were you in the room when I read to Dr. Osborn a letter of the officer commanding the 80th regiment in Dublin?—I heard the letter read.

5125. Had you heard of it before?—I heard of it yesterday.

5126. Do you not think that such a state of things as that calls for some special remedy?—I thought it did call for the special remedy of increasing the number of marriages in the Army. I understood from that letter that the celibacy of soldiers was one of the causes of the disease.

5127. Do you think it possible, from your general knowledge of the world, that such a thing would be possible as to have a regiment entirely composed of married soldiers?—The question is one which I am not at all competent to decide; but I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that I believe the number of marriages could be increased mostly beyond what it is, and that I believe the increase of marriages is the only right remedy for the present state of disease.

E E 4

5128. What

2 May 1882.]

Rev. W. F. STEVENSON, D.D.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

5128. What grounds have you for arriving generally at that conclusion?—Marriage is the law of God, I believe.

5129. But I mean as regards the possibility of having married soldiers?—I believe that soldiers are not exempt from the law of God any more than civilians.

5130. There are difficulties in the way of soldiers marrying. First of all, you would not compel a soldier to marry, would you?—I would allow him to marry.

5131. Would you compel him to marry?—I would not compel him to marry, but I would allow him to have facilities; at present I understand that the facilities are so much abridged as to make the number of married soldiers comparatively small.

5132. You would think it possible to increase, very largely, the number of married soldiers?—I have no doubt that it would be possible.

5133. Have you any reason for arriving at that conclusion, except your own opinion?—None.

5134. Did I correctly understand you to say, in answer to the honourable Member, that you were in favour of allowing diseased women to voluntarily leave the hospitals?—The institution of a hospital under the Act is one that I object to altogether, as I object to everything connected with the Act.

5135. You object to compulsory detention until they are cured?—I do.

5136. Therefore, you would allow them to go free and propagate disease?—I would allow them to go free at whatever risk; there is always a risk in sin.

5137. Then even when a woman was in the last stage of disease you would allow her to go forth?—It is a question for private benevolence, not for the State.

5138. In whatever state of health she was you would allow her to go forth?—I have not assumed that it is right for her to be in; and I cannot allow her to go forth. The Act to my mind is objectionable from its inception.

5139. Assuming a woman to be in hospital for venereal disease, no matter whether she was in a Government hospital or a voluntary hospital, would you allow her to go forth in whatever state of disease she was?—The question, I think, is beset with this difficulty, that allowance implies on the other hand compulsion, that there must be some compulsion exercised which implies legislation on the question. I can understand the answer to be given in case it was a free hospital, which she entered of her own accord; it is a matter then for the hospital authorities to determine. I can conceive, also, that at any private benevolent institution it would be a question for those in charge whether to let her free or not; but in the case of a hospital under the State, she is there by compulsion and State legislation, to which I object in toto.

5140. My question applies to all hospitals. What I want to know is this, whether, in the case of a patient in a hospital for venereal disease, would you compulsorily detain her until she was well; or whether, if she chose to go forth, in however bad a state of disease, she might be at liberty to do so?—That is not a question that I can answer directly; it is a matter that I have never thought of in that particular aspect; but I should say that it was a question for physicians to deal with.

5141. Then you think there might be cases in which Lock Hospital, or voluntary hospital, authorities might be justified in detaining her until she was well?—I understand that the Lock Hospital is a Government institution. It completely alters the view which I take of the question, whether the compulsion may be a Government matter, or whether it is a matter entirely in the constitution of the hospital.

5142. In the case of a voluntary patient, do you think that the authorities of the hospital have a right to detain her till she might be well?—As I have already stated, I think that would be a question for the physicians to determine.

5143. You think there might be a case in which the physicians might detain her?—I think there might be such a case.

5144. Compulsorily?—I do not admit that it is compulsory on the part of any authority but the physician, whose compulsion is medical compulsion.

5145. I understand you to say that there might be cases in which the physicians or surgeons of the Lock Hospital would be justified in detaining a woman until she was well?—That is not what I stated. I stated that I drew a distinction between voluntary or free hospitals and Government hospitals. In a free hospital the physician has no legal authority to detain any patient against her will. The physician may exercise his judgment and say: "It is not right that that person should leave the hospital," and the authorities of that hospital may do what they can to prevent it; but there is no legal power to keep that man or woman in the hospital longer than the person is willing to remain.

5146. Then you think that in a voluntary Lock Hospital a woman might be allowed to go forth at any time she pleases, in whatever state of disease she may be?—I say that is entirely a matter for the physicians of the hospital.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5147. I think you said that your church was in Dublin?—Near Dublin.

5148. Do you know the subjected districts in Ireland?—The Curragh is a subjected district, I believe, and Cork and Queenstown.

5149. Are you acquainted with those districts?—I am not directly acquainted with them.

5150. Have you ever been there?—I have been in the Curragh once, and I have been in Cork several times, but only for a day or so at a time.

5151. You have never investigated the operation of the Acts in those places?—I have never investigated the operation of the Acts in those places, but I have indirect testimony. I cannot speak to the operation of the Acts from my personal knowledge.

5152. I think in Cork and in the south of Ireland, probably, the religious body to which you belong is much less numerous than in the north of Ireland?—Much less numerous; but in Cork it it happens that we have strong congregations, and the ministers there take a very decided view against the supposed beneficial tendencies of the Act.

5153. How many ministers have you in Cork?—We have two placed ministers, and one other.

5154. Have you any in the Curragh?—There is a chaplain in the Curragh, and we have congregations round the Curragh which are quite within the range and influences of the Curragh.

5155. Is the chaplain of whom you speak one of your ministers who had taken any part in the agitation, if we may so call it, against the Acts?—I cannot say of my own knowledge.

5156. And you have not communicated with him as to the operation of the Acts?—I have not.

Mr. Hopwood.

5157. I suppose he would have the same right as other ministers to appear, or to be present, at your annual assembly?—He is a member of the general assembly, and as such consenting to all its action.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5158. Was he present, to your knowledge, at any of those meetings?—I must assume that he was, because I had seen him a very short time before on two occasions.

Mr. Hopwood.

5159. You have no reason to suppose that he takes a different view from that which you represent here to-day?—No.

5160. And if he did take a different view, he

5161. As I understand you, taking the case of a free hospital where a woman came of her own free will, you would think that the authorities should use some sort of constraint to keep her there until she was cured, whether you call it compulsion, or whether you call it inducement?—I think it is a matter for them to decide.

5162. But in that case there would be this difference, would there not, that the woman who comes to a general hospital comes knowing and agreeing to the terms and conditions under which she is to be received?—Precisely.

5163. You will excuse my asking you such a question, because I understand you not to have discussed this question of hospitals with a view to setting them up or putting them down, but if it were found that the effect of keeping women against their will was to prevent their coming to ask for the medical aid that they ought to have, that might be a strong reason, might it not, why the authorities should cease to compel them to stay?—It might be.

5164. Therefore, when I understand you to say that you have not searched round the whole of this matter, that might be one of the considerations which might modify your judgment in regard to compelling them to remain?—Certainly it might.

5165. The matter is surrounded with various difficulties, which you are not prepared at this moment to encounter with a complete scheme?—I have not come prepared with a solution of a very grave problem.

The Rev. FREDERICK TRESTRAIL, D.D., called in ; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5166. You have been for many years in the Baptist ministry, have you not?—For a great many years.

5167. You were, I think, president of the Baptist Union in 1880?—I was.

5168. You have now retired from the ministry, have you not?—I have just retired from the pulpit ministry.

5169. When did you enter the Baptist College in Bristol?—In 1828.

5170. Was that your first connection as a young man with the Baptist denomination?—I was a member of a Baptist church years before that.

5171. Then you settled at Clipstone as a minister in 1832, and you removed to Newport in the Isle of Wight in 1835, and then did you go to the city of Cork in 1839?—I did.

5172. How long were you at Cork?—Three years and a half.

5173. Were you appointed Secretary of the Irish Mission in 1842?—I was.

5174. And were you appointed Secretary to the Baptist Foreign Mission in 1848?—Yes.

5175. You retired in 1870 from the Foreign Mission, did you not?—Yes, on account of broken health.

5176. And you settled in Newport a second time in 1871?—Yes.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

5177. Then you were elected President of the Baptist Union in the year 1880?—Yes.

5178. Have you read the Rev. Mr. Gledstone's evidence, given before this Committee at its last sitting?—Yes.

5179. Do you agree with the views which he then stated?—I think I may say, thoroughly.

5180. Is there any expression of opinion upon the morality of the Acts in Mr. Gledstone's evidence about which you would desire to express any modified view?—No, certainly not.

5181. Is there anything that you would like to add to his evidence in that respect?—I do not know that I need trouble the Committee with any opinions about the Acts, except that I think they are wrong altogether in principle; that they begin with the wrong persons; that they should leave the poor women alone and begin with the men, for they are by far the bigger sinners and by far the larger number, and the most active propagators of the disease.

5182. Would you inform the Committee, first of all, whether the Baptist Union shares the views to which Mr. Gledstone gave expression, and in which you have expressed your concurrence?—As far as their public acts are concerned certainly.

5183. And do their public acts represent the opinions of the great majority of the denomination?—Yes, certainly, among the most thoughtful and devote.
F F opinions

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

5184. What public action has the denomination taken with reference to this legislation?—The following resolution was passed at Northampton in December 1871: "That this Session of the Baptist Union is of opinion that the Contagious Diseases Acts relating to women are in principal unjust and criminal, an offence to the religious sentiment of the country, ineffectual to the arrest of the evil to which they are professedly opposed, and present a direct infraction of the first principles of British law. This Union, on these and other grounds, feels bound to call upon Her Majesty's Government to initiate and carry forward at the earliest possible period a measure for total repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts; and earnestly recommends that the Churches of Christ throughout the country will send petitions to Parliament for this object at the commencement of the Session." At London, in October 1875, it was resolved, on the motion of my late friend the Rev. C. M. Birrell, seconded by myself, "that a petition, signed by the President on behalf of the Assembly, be presented to Parliament, praying for the repeal of these Acts, as compromising the dignity of the State, degrading the persons subjected to their provisions, violating the spirit of English law, and tending to encourage immoral practices among the people." At Birmingham, in October 1876, I moved the following resolution, which was seconded by Rev. J. Lewitt, of Worcester, and carried: "That in the judgment of this Assembly the Contagious Diseases Acts are highly immoral, unconstitutional, and unjust, and ought to be repealed. And therefore this Assembly is of opinion that it behoves pastors, deacons, and members of churches heartily to co-operate in every constitutional effort to remove these laws from the Statute Book of the realm." I may say that these resolutions have been copied from the minutes of proceedings of the body, and signed by the present secretary.

5185. And these are meetings, as I understand, of the Union, which represents the whole denomination?—Just so, they assemble in large numbers, from 600 to 1,000. I may say that there was another resolution passed in London in May 1879: "Moved by Rev. J. Lewitt, seconded by myself, and resolved, That this assembly has heard with satisfaction of the promise of Her Majesty's Government to appoint a Committee of inquiry into the operations of the Contagious Diseases Acts, and trusts, in the interests of national morality, that the investigation will be impartial, searching, and complete." I hope I shall not be intruding upon your time if I offer an explanation, which is necessary, with regard to this resolution. It was put on the agenda on the motion of Mr. Lewitt, in the ordinary course of business. The hour for adjournment arrived, and I pressed the chairman at once to put it; but he said, "We will take it at dinner," and upon that understanding we left. We went to the Metropolitan Tabernacle to dine, but the chairman of that meeting was not the chairman of the Union, but the chairman of the London

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

Baptist Association. The resolution was brought forward and triumphantly carried. At the next meeting of the committee of the Baptist Union, the objection was taken, on purely technical grounds, that when the president had pronounced the benediction, the session was at an end; and therefore they thought proper to expunge that resolution from the minute. I attended the following committee, and called upon the chairman to explain to the committee that the whole error lay with him, and not either with myself or my friend, Mr. Lewitt.

5186. That expunging implied, I take it, simply a technical act, and did not imply the slightest modification in the opinions of your body?—Certainly not.

Dr. Farquharson.

5187. Do you share the opinion of the last witness about the desirability of increasing the amount of marriages amongst soldiers?—Certainly.

5188. But you admit that there are great difficulties with regard to that?—Of course I do; but, if you will allow me to give you my opinion about the matter, it is shortly this: I would make marriage in the Army dependent upon the good conduct of the men; and I do not see any reason why married men should not live out of barracks, so as to avoid the question of expense. Another reason that I have for holding that opinion is this: I saw some information that came from India, which stated positively that the difference of efficiency between married men and men who were not married, and who indulged in vicious habits, was most extraordinary, so that I think even the question of expense is of very little moment indeed.

5189. Do you think that the greatly increased expense resulting from their marriage, and the increased pay which you would have to give them, would be met by their increased efficiency?—I think so, to a great extent.

5190. Do you think that marriage would necessarily prevent evil practices among soldiers?—I do not see why it should not, as well as amongst other classes.

5191. Does it have that effect amongst other classes?—If I am to enter into that question, remembering how far in point of numbers licentious men exceed licentious women, I should feel some difficulty in answering your question.

5192. Do you think that, if matrimony were universal, prostitution would cease?—I think so.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

5194. I understood you to say that, in passing any Acts similar to these Contagious Diseases Acts,

2 May 1882.]

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

Acts, you thought they ought to begin with men?—So I do.

5195. What do you think ought to be done to the men?—I do not think you ought to ask me to go into details as to how the Acts should be framed and managed; but I do not see why, if you deal with women and enlarge the agency, you could not deal with men too, not that I should approve of that.

5196. Therefore, acting upon your own responsibility only, you would not attempt to punish even a man for communicating disease?—I would put the women and the men upon the same footing, as my friend Dr. Osborn said over and over again in his evidence. If prostitution is legally to be defined to be a crime, and there is a penalty attached to it, deal with it accordingly; but I have not yet met with any definition of prostitution.

5197. But you cannot offer any suggestion as to how that is to be done?—I have not come prepared with anything of that kind, because I did not anticipate that the question would be put. I have great reliance upon moral means and raising public opinion, and, above all, raising public opinion to this pitch: that it is as bad and as immoral for a man to commit fornication as it is for a woman; and until we get to that point I think we shall have great difficulties still.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5198. You have spoken of the effect of marriage upon soldiers; may I ask you whether you are well acquainted with any garrison town?—Newport is a garrison town.

5199. Are you resident at Newport?—Yes, I am up to the present time, and I have been there for 11 years.

5200. Is Newport a subjected district?—No.

5201. Have you any acquaintance with subjected districts; do you know Southampton, for instance?—I do not, except by report.

5202. Then may I take it that you do not know the subjected districts personally?—I do not.

5203. Therefore, when you speak of the ineffective operation of the Acts, I take it that you go by hearsay?—I go by what I should call authentic reports in different publications.

5204. You do not judge from your own personal observation?—I do not. My first impression with regard to the Acts, and their nature and tendency, arose from a very careful perusal of the Report of the Royal Commission, which I read through from beginning to end.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5205. Is there any other point which you desire to bring before the Committee?—I should be sorry if I said anything that conveyed the idea that our body were perfectly unanimous throughout upon this question. There is some difference of opinion upon it unquestionably, but not to any great extent.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

5206. Is not Mr. Bompas, the Queen's Counsel, a member of your religious body?—He is.

5207. He made a speech, I think, the other day at a May meeting in favour of the Acts, did he not?—Yes, much to the discomfort of his father-in-law.

The Rev. RICHARD CHEW, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5208. ARE you the President of the United Methodist Free Church Conference?—I am.

5209. You have charge, I think, of Silver-street Chapel, in the city of Lincoln?—I have.

5210. How long have you been in the ministry?—Nearly 35 years; since 1847.

5211. I will put the same question to you as I have put to other witnesses: have you read the evidence of the Rev. Mr. Gledstone before this Committee?—I have.

5212. Do you agree with that evidence?—In general I do.

5213. Would you wish to make any reservation or any specific addition of your own?—No, I have simply to say that I come to object to the Contagious Diseases Acts on moral and religious grounds, and in doing so to represent what I believe to be the prevailing opinion of the churches with which I am connected.

5214. The objections expressed by Mr. Gledstone, in which you concur, are the opinions also of the churches in your connection?—They are the opinions of the churches in our connection as far as I have had an opportunity of ascertaining those opinions; and we have from time to time taken action in our general assembly in relation to this matter, beginning in the year 1871, and going down to the year 1879; but not every year.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

5215. Had you not a petition in 1870?—We presented a petition in 1870 against the Contagious Diseases Acts, signed by the president and secretary of the annual assembly on behalf of the assembly.

5216. Have you ever had a deputation to any Member of the Government?—Yes, we sent a deputation to the Home Secretary.

5217. That would be, I suppose, in the time of Mr. Bruce, now Lord Aberdare?—It was between the annual assemblies of 1873 and 1874.

5218. And you have petitioned every year for the repeal of these Acts?—Not every year, but we have occasionally.

5219. Did you petition in the years 1871 and 1879?—We passed resolutions in the years 1871 and 1879.

5220. Have you those resolutions in your hand?—I have.

5221. Would you read them?—The resolution in 1871 was this:—"Resolved, That in the judgment of this Assembly the Contagious Diseases Acts are immoral in their tendency, contrary to the law of God, dangerous to the liberties liberties of the subject, and do not secure the sanitary and restraining effect for which they were professedly enacted, and therefore recommends all our ministers and members to seek their repeal by every proper and Christian method." That was the resolution passed unanimously in our annual assembly in that year.

5222. Have you the resolution passed in 1879?—In 1879, at the annual assembly at Sunderland, the following resolution was passed: "Resolved, That former annual assemblies having recorded their condemnation of these immoral and infamous Acts, this assembly desires to express its deep and deepening conviction, that these Acts are opposed to the principles of religion, constitutional liberty, and justice, and urges all the officials and private members of our churches to use all constitutional means to obtain their early repeal."

5223. You have considered these Acts in more than those three years, have you not?—We have passed resolutions in other years, which, if necessary, I could give.

5224. Have your resolutions been unanimous?—They have been unanimous on each occasion.

5225. And you have no hesitation, I suppose, in telling the Committee that you represent here the opinion of the largely preponderant proportion of your body?—I represent here the largely preponderant opinion of our body.

5226. Is there any other statement that you would like to make?—I do not know that I have anything further to say in relation to it.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5227. Do you know personally any of these subjected districts?—I have no personal acquaintance with them.

5228. Have you ever been in any of them?—I have not.

Dr. Farquharson.

5229. Do you concur in this answer given by the Rev. J. P. Gledstone to Question 4664: "I know that the number of doctors who are opposed to these laws is very much greater than it was, and that many leading doctors are opposed to these laws"?—I concur generally in relation to the moral aspects of the question.

5230. But you are not prepared to give any opinion upon this point?—Not upon the medical question.

5231. This is an answer given during Mr. Gledstone's examination on the moral and religious aspects of the case; you have no evidence or knowledge of your own in any way to support or contradict that?—Not to support or contradict that as a medical question.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

5232. Have you read the evidence given by clergymen of various denominations in support of the Acts?—I have not.

The Rev. WILLIAM BLAKE LARK, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5233. You, I think, are the Chairman of the Portsmouth District, and Secretary of the Bible Christian Conference?—Yes.

5234. How long have you been resident in Portsmouth?—Only a few months.

5235. Therefore you would probably prefer that I should not put to you any questions founded upon your knowledge of Portsmouth?—I am not very intimately acquainted with Portsmouth, not having been there very long.

5236. How long have you been in the ministry of the Bible Christian body?—Twenty-three years.

5237. Have you read the evidence of the Rev. Mr. Gledstone upon the moral aspect of this legislation?—Yes.

5238. Do you agree with his evidence?—I do.

5239. Without reserve?—I have no reserve to make that I know of.

5240. Is there any addition that you would like to make?—I do not think it is necessary; I have nothing to add.

5241. Are the views in which you have expressed concurrence, also the views of the body with which you are connected?—I have been sent by the connexional committee to represent them and their views.

5242. Can you tell the Committee what action has been taken by that body with regard to the existence of these Acts?—In 1878 the Conference was held at Portsmouth, when it passed this resolution unanimously: "This Conference considers that the Contagious Diseases Acts tend to perpetuate immorality, and are repugnant to the best feelings of every good citizen, and we heartily approve of the use of all legitimate means for the abolition of the said Acts."

5243. That is not the only occasion probably upon which your body has come to a conclusion upon this subject?—That is the only resolution that has been passed formally by the Conference. That was in 1878.

5244. The opinion there expressed remains the opinion of your body?—So far as I know it does.

5245. In fact you are sent here to express that opinion?—I am.

The Rev. ROBINSON CHEESEMAN, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5246. You are, I think, Secretary of the Primitive Methodist Connection?—Yes.

5247. Have you been so long?—Yes, for three years.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

5248. You have read the evidence of the Rev. Mr. Gledstone?—I have.

5249. Do you agree with that evidence?—Yes, quite so.

5250. Without

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

5250. Without reserve?—Yes.

5251. Is there any addition that you desire to make to his evidence?—I do not desire to make any addition.

5252. Your body, I take it, shares the opinion in which you have expressed concurrence?—They do.

5253. Will you give to the Committee a statement of the action which they have taken with regard to this legislation?—On several occasions our Conference has passed resolutions condemnatory of these Acts, and we have petitioned Parliament also on many occasions for their repeal. In 1875 we sent 635 petitions, containing 24,801 signatures. In 1876 we sent 493 petitions, with 18,691 signatures. Also in 1878 we sent 197 petitions, with 3,489 signatures. The last Conference re-affirmed the previous resolutions that had been passed. The following is the resolution passed last year: "That this Conference records once more, and in the most emphatic manner, its condemnation of the Contagious Diseases Acts as a violation of moral principle, as an encouragement to vice, as an injustice to women, as a danger to constitutional liberty, and as a useless sanitary measure, and hopes that a Bill for their repeal may soon be passed by the House of Commons, and the country freed from the guilt it has incurred."

5254. Your petitions appear to have been practically suspended since 1878, I take it, in consequence of the appointment of this Committee?—Yes, quite so.

5255. And your body await anxiously the result of this inquiry?—Yes.

5256. Is there any other statement that you would wish to make?—I do not know that there is.

Dr. Farquharson.

5257. Are there any signatures of the medical profession in your district attached to your petitions?—I daresay there would be. We have several medical gentlemen belonging to our church, and I have no doubt they would sign some of them, but I do not know for a fact that they did.

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5258. Do you know any of the subjected districts yourself?—No, not personally; I have never visited them.

5259. Could you tell me what proportion of the gentlemen who have signed these petitions are acquainted with these subjected districts?—We had petitions from those districts; from Portsmouth, for example, there was one.

5260. You could not, I suppose, give me the number of signatures to that petition?—I might have done so had I known that such questions would have been asked; but I am not prepared to do so now.

5261. Then I gather from you that the view which you take against the Acts is derived from what you have read, and not from what you have seen; would that be so?—Quite so; I come merely to express the views of our denomination.

5262. But you yourself have no personal experience of the working of the Acts?—I have no personal experience.

Mr. Hopwood.

5263. In that respect you would be on a level with most of the members of this Committee, and with most of your fellow subjects, I presume?—Quite so.

5264. We do not live in the subjected districts, and yet we are assembled here to judge of these Acts?—Quite so.

5265. Have you congregations of your religious body (or whatever may be the proper term to use) in all the subjected districts?—I believe we have.

5266. I suppose you are represented in all of them?—I think so.

5267. Have you any reason to think that the members of your body who do reside in those districts differ from the bulk of the churches in their opinion upon this matter?—I believe they do not differ in the least.

Friday, 5th May 1882.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, IN THE CHAIR.

Mrs. JOSEPHINE BUTLER, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Hopwood.

5268. YOU are the wife of the Rev. George Butler, M.A., Principal of the Liverpool College?—Yes.

5269. I believe that for many years past you have been much occupied in endeavouring to reclaim the unfortunate women who have fallen, either from viciousness or from necessity, into that state of life?—I have, more or less, since 1851.

5270. From within a few years after your marriage, I believe?—Yes.

5271. And have those efforts been made, not only in Liverpool, where I believe you have resided for 16 years past, but also in Oxford, for five years, and in Cheltenham, for nine years?—Yes; and I may add also on the Continent of Europe.

5272. You remember the fact of the passing of these Acts being made public after they had passed?—I do.

5273. When was your attention first called to them?—In 1865. I read all that was suggested then.

5274. Did you take any steps on the passing of the Acts to make known their purpose, and to secure the assistance of others to protest against their extension, or even their existence?—I first heard of the passing of the Act of 1869, in September, on returning from the Continent. In November of that year we formed what is called the Ladies' National Association, to work for its repeal.

5275. What was the motive of your action against these Acts; what was it that impelled you in the first instance to take up a subject, apparently so painful to a lady to take up?—Having some experience of the Continent, I had seen the disastrous effects on morality in general of such a system, and I saw at once that this system was identical. The motives which induced us women to oppose these Acts it would perhaps take me too long to describe; I will only say that they are very sacred motives, and that our convictions are very deep.

5276. Are your motives founded upon moral and religious considerations?—Upon moral and religious considerations, and also very strongly upon constitutional and legal considerations.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

5277. What is your feeling as to these laws being, or not being, an outrage upon womanhood?—If I am permitted to speak upon that subject, I will say briefly what the women of England, of the world, I may say, feel on the subject.

5278. Let me take you through the formation of the first woman's association. You were about to tell us what people whom you know and whom you have met think about it; who were amongst those who first formed part of this association?—We had in the winter of that year which I have mentioned, 1869, Mrs. Harriet Martineau, Miss Florence Nightingale, Miss Mary Carpenter, and a number of ladies known in the literary world; all the ladies, I may say, of any note in the Society of Friends; and we collected very soon about 2,000 adherents of our association.

5279. Besides those who gave you their names and who overcame their dislike to public action in such matters, did you meet with many others who sympathised with you, but who were not capable of the same public action?—In every city and town in the United Kingdom that we visited (and they were many at that time) we met with universal sympathy from women.

5280. I will now pass on, if you please, to your action in this association. Did the association form a large number of local societies?—We have now 92 local committees and secretaries. These were gradually formed through the United Kingdom.

5281. I believe that you gave evidence upon this subject before the Royal Commission?—I did.

5282. I need hardly ask you whether it must not have cost you some effort to make a public demonstration upon this matter?—In the country do you mean?

5283. Yes, in the country generally, and before the Royal Commission?—The pain and the effort were such as can never be known except to God.

5284. Then the matter passed on in its history from the Royal Commission to the bringing in of Mr. Bruce's Bill, and, in 1873, I think Mr. Fowler's Repeal Bill. During all that time did you

5 May 1882.]

Mrs. BUTLER.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

you find the opposition in the country to these Acts increase or decrease?—It gradually increased; but during the 13 years that I have been connected with it there have been fluctuations in the outward manifestations, for this reason, that when the Government takes up the question, as by a Royal Commission, and when a Bill such as that of Mr. Bruce's is proposed, the feeling in the country is one of some degree of trust in the Government, and the agitation, therefore, is not carried on with the same vigour. But the moment that that trust in the Government is felt to have been deceived, the agitation is increased; so that through the whole of those 13 years the agitation has increased in the sense that the flow of the tide increases, with the ebb and flow of the waves.

5285. Is there at this moment such an attitude of expectation, or suspension, waiting for the result of this Committee?—I understand that in London the fact of the sitting of this Committee has necessarily diverted the energies of the workers. In the country it has had less effect than any other thing of the kind before, because we have learned not to trust to the verdict of such Committees; we therefore continue our agitation with the same patience and zeal throughout.

5286. You alluded to your knowledge of foreign matters; have you in connection with this society, or rather working with it, formed repeal societies, or a confederation in regard to foreign countries?—We have a very large and world-wide Federation, an abolitionist society we call ourselves, for the abolition of this modern form of slavery.

5287. And are you working the two together, and do you receive a very large amount of support, both at home and abroad?—We work the two closely together; and the influence of what is now constantly occurring on the Continent is felt very strongly in support of our agitation at home.

5288. Perhaps, in the history of this matter, I may refer to the year 1874, when there was some suggestion made by the Secretary of the Marine Department of the Board of Trade, to extend this system to the ordinary sailors?—I should like to be permitted to mention that, in 1873, a great International Medical Congress was held at Vienna, and a strong resolution was passed at that congress calling upon all the nations of the earth to enter into consular conventions and international agreements to impose this system upon women in all the great seaports and cities of the world. A knowledge of the report of this congress came to us in 1874. At the same time we got the impression that the resolution of the congress of Vienna was becoming fruitful in the minds of some persons connected with our Government at home, by the fact that a delegate of the Government came to Liverpool and spoke in exactly the terms used in the resolution of the congress of Vienna of the necessity of entering into consular conventions to impose the Contagious Diseases Acts upon all parts of the world. We were further confirmed in this by other things, which I will not allude to, unless I am asked to do so.

0.75.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5289. Could you give us the date of this resolution?—It was passed at the International Medical Congress of Vienna, in 1873.

Mr. Hopwood.

5290. What was the resolution that you referred to?—Toutes les nations réunies doivent prendre des mesures générales et uniformes pour agir d'un commun accord. Si l'on veut obtenir un résultat satisfaisant, il faut promulguer une loi internationale sur le règlement de la prostitution.

5291. I see that that refers to prostitution; but was the reasoning of the conference in the direction of rules and regulations with a view to the suppression of disease?—Entirely with a view to the suppression of disease; I should say for nothing else. It was a medical congress.

5292. Then I think you said that in September 1874 the effect of that you conceive was shown by a delegate of the Government coming down and proposing to the shipowners and merchants of Liverpool the extension of the system to the seaports and to the seamen?—The Secretary to the Marine Department of the Board of Trade came to Liverpool in September 1874, and addressed a very large meeting of shipowners there. He there proposed what I have stated; I have the exact words here, if they should be required, in the "Liverpool Daily Post," of 7th of September 1874, which reported it.

5293. This is his speech, I suppose?—Yes; the proposal that the Contagious Diseases Acts should be applied to Liverpool and to the other ports, was rejected by the meeting of shipowners. One or two of the most prominent shipowners of Liverpool protested in the meeting with a loud voice, interrupting Mr. Gray in his discourse.

5294. Were similar meetings held at Glasgow and at Bristol, about, or shortly after, the same time?—Yes, on hearing of the speech of the Secretary to the Marine Department to the Board of Trade, a large meeting was called in Glasgow, and another in Bristol. At the Glasgow meeting in the City Hall, which was very crowded, Mr. Allan, perhaps the most influential shipowner in Glasgow, spoke in very strong terms indeed against the possibility of the Government extending this system to Glasgow.

5295. Then, that meeting was called by gentlemen who opposed the extension of the Acts?—It was.

5296. At Bristol, did a similar thing happen?—Yes.

5297. That meeting was called to denounce the proposition and to oppose it?—Yes, there was a general fear that the Government was about to adopt the proposals made at Vienna. I should like to mention that in that autumn I was in Naples, and an abolitionist meeting was held in Naples, and I asked the English Consul, Mr. Calvert, to be so kind as to preside at our meeting. He replied: "I am entirely with you in sympathy, but I am in difficulty about doing as you request, because I have received a circular from the Government at home, which I believe has been received by all British consuls in seaports abroad, asking what is the amount of protection given to English sailors by the system in Naples, and desiring that I would use my personal personal influence as much as possible to strengthen the system of the Contagious Diseases Acts in that port." Consequently Mr. Calvert came to our meeting and expressed sympathy, but did not preside. This, we thought, was an additional indication of the temper of the English Government at that time.

5298. As regards the international character of your movement, both here and abroad, have you this confirmation: that a number of eminent foreigners have spoken at your public meetings in England in denunciation of the system?—A number of eminent foreigners have come over here, wishing to warn the English people against continuing a system which has proved so destructive to morality abroad. I may mention amongst those who have spoken on our platforms in Manchester, in Derby, and in London, M. de Pressensé of Paris, and M. Emile de Laveleye. The latter is perhaps the greatest living political economist. Several of the town councillors of Paris have been in England and spoken on the question, one of them being the Secretary of a Commission appointed in Paris similar to this, to inquire into the success or failure of the system in Paris. I might mention many others, but perhaps it would be tedious. I could give some considerable names of persons from the Continent, town councillors, and magistrates of large Continental cities.

5299. You have supervised the presentation of a number of petitions from women, especially against these Acts, have you not?—Yes.

5300. Can you first give me any statistical idea of the number that you have presented?—We have not got those for 1881 arranged yet. This list is officially made out by us. From 1870 to 1880 there were 270 petitions presented from women exclusively, the signatures amounting to 123,460; but this list, as you see, does not include all.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5301. It does not include the year 1881?—It does not include 1881, not yet a monster petition from women.

Mr. Hopwood.

5302. Of these petitions were 35 from subjected districts, with 12,552 signatures?—Yes, that is correct.

5303. Have you besides held a very large number of meetings?—We have had a very large number of meetings.

5304. Some of women exclusively?—Very many of women exclusively.

5305. And others of men and women?—Yes.

5306. You have presented petitions from 316 women's meetings, have you not?—We have.

5307. Those would be in addition, of course, to the 270 that I have already asked you about?—Yes. Besides those which have been given, a monster petition from women alone was presented in support of Mr. Fowler's Bill, I think, containing a quarter of a million signatures.

5308. Was that presented to the House of Commons?—It was presented to the House of Commons. It required two gentlemen to carry it in; it was so large.

Mr. William Fowler.

5309. In what year was that?—I find that my secretary has not put it down; but I understand that it was in support of your Bill in the early part of the agitation.

5310. I brought in no Bill, I think, except in 1873?—Then I suppose it was in 1871.

Mr. Hopwood.

5311. And that petition was from women exclusively?—From women exclusively; I should like to say that that petition was obtained without any paid agency whatsoever, and without any centralised effort. It was the spontaneous expression of the women of the country.

5312. We have had some testimony here as to the feeling of the Nonconformist bodies upon this subject; are you also aware of the feeling of a large number of the clergy of the Church of England as to these Acts, and can you give us some evidence as to that?—We have some evidence as to that. A very large memorial was presented to Mr. Gladstone as the head of the Government, in 1873, signed by 2,000 clergymen of the Church of England.

5313. Was that presented to him by the late Canon Fowle of Salisbury?—It was personally presented by the late Canon Fowle.

5314. Could you give us the names of some of the prominent signatories of that petition?—The names of Dr. Moberly, Bishop of Salisbury, and of Dr. Seiwyn, Bishop of Lichfield, were not on that petition; but they were in sympathy with us long before that petition, from the very beginning.

5315. Was it signed by Dr. Ewing, Bishop of Argyle; Dr. Alford, Bishop of Victoria, Hong Kong; Dr. Ryan, Bishop of the Mauritius; the present Bishop of Liverpool, Dr. Ryle; the Deans of Ripon and Carlisle; Archdeacons Sandford and Garbett, and others; prebendaries and canons?—Yes, and I may mention that the present Bishop of Durham, Dr. Lightfoot, and the Primus of Scotland are firm supporters of our cause.

5316. And were the remainder principally beneficed clergy of the Church of England?—They were almost all beneficed clergy, for no endeavour was made to test curates and others. Masters of public schools figure largely in the list.

5317. Amongst the masters of public schools I see the name of the head master of Harrow; is that the present head master, Dr. Butler?—Yes.

5318. The head master of Eton, Dr. Hornby; the head master of the City of London School, Dr. Abbott; the head masters of Winchester, and of Liverpool College, Canon Stanley Leathes, Canon Ellison, Canon Conway, and Canon Rawlinson, and many others?—We have a very long list of clergy of some distinction; they are in print.

5319. I believe that in 1879 there was a petition prepared in support of Sir Harcourt Johnstone's Bill signed by the clergy of London?—Yes.

5320. Were there as many as 310 signatures to that petition?—Yes, that is the number; I have here the petition.

5321. I believe that, as a fact, that petition was not presented for this reason, that the signatures natures were obtained on separate pieces of paper, and they are pasted upon it, and the petition was rejected as informal?—That was the reason. The person who did it had not sufficient knowledge of the method of collecting signatures.

5322. But, as a matter of fact, are these signatures the attestation of the agreement of 310 clergymen of London with the movements with which you are identified?—They are; and those clergymen have signified their desire that it should be gone over again, and presented.

5323. I believe you have some note of the analysis of that petition, have you not?—Yes, I have an analysis of it.

5324. I find here Dr. Abbott, whom you have already mentioned, head master of the City of London School; Mr. Oriel, prebendary of St. Paul's, and rector of St. Dunstan's (I do not propose to go through them all, but I will take two or three that strike me); Mr. F. S. Clarke, vicar of St. Peter's, Greenwich; Mr. Baker, vicar of St. Michael and All Angel's, Woolwich; Mr. Berry, chaplain of the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich; Mr. Sydney Clark, chaplain of the Royal Hospital, Chelsea, who has served at Corfu, Parkhurst, Gibraltar, and Malta. Several of these places are under some system similar to these Acts, are they not?—Corfu and Malta are.

5325. I see also the name of Mr. Houchin, chaplain to the Duke of Cambridge, and Chaplain to the Forces in London, and so on; Dr. Stanley Leathes, prebendary of St. Paul's, and rector of Cliffe, near Rochester; Mr. McAllister, surrogate, vicar of Plumstead; Mr. North, vicar of Holy Trinity, Greenwich; Mr. Quartermain, chaplain to Her Majesty's Ship Warspite, and chaplain to the Woolwich, Plumstead, and Charlton Union?—Might I be permitted to mention that Canon Wilberforce, of Southampton, is one of our strong adherents; I had neglected to mention his name.

5326. I see also the name of Mr. Servite, vicar of Christ Church, Stratford, formerly of Woolwich; and Dr. John Thoms, canon of Canterbury, and vicar of Allhallows, Barking. There are a good many more, but those seem to be such as you would desire to mention?—Yes.

5327. Now I will take you, if you please, a little more specifically to the grounds upon which you oppose these Acts. Let us take the constitutional ground: I believe you have, yourself, written one or two works upon this subject, having been stirred to do so by the passing of these laws?—Yes, I wrote a book called the "Constitution Violated," which is legal in its arguments from beginning to end.

5328. You have, in that work, entered into your views of the law, and shown how far these Acts are, in your judgment, a violation of the principles of English Constitution law?—I have.

5329. In the first place, with regard to the legal requirement of placing women upon a register for this purpose, would you tell us what is the effect upon the women themselves first, with a view to reclamation?—You are speaking from the moral point of view, and not from a legal point of view just now?

0.75.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

5330. Yes; I thought your views on the legal point would be sufficiently made known to the Committee in that work of yours; but if you please it is quite with you to state any points that you may desire to put before the Committee?—I should like to state that we are deeply concerned that the first principles of jurisprudence, which hold not only in England but all over the world, should not be seriously and habitually violated in our country. One of the first principles of all just law is, that a suspected and accused person is protected against all danger of incriminating himself. Under the Contagious Diseases Acts the voluntary submission is a self-crimination. Another principle of all just constitutional law is that the accused person is held innocent until proved to be guilty. Under the Contagious Diseases Acts, the woman is held to be guilty, unless she can prove her own innocence. All just constitutional law forbids an indecent assault upon the person, and punishes, with imprisonment, such assaults. The Contagious Diseases Acts decree an indecent assault upon the person. These are some of our views.

5331. What do you say as to the like violation of constitutional principle in the setting of men in plain clothes as spies to watch the movements of women exclusively?—We think that that action is arbitrary; that the women when placed under police control, under the discretionary power of the police, are under an arbitrary Government, and not under the protection of the law,—I do not mean this law, but the constitutional law of the country.

5332. Is it felt as an objection to this spy system by women of a superior class, that a man should have a right to watch their actions to see whether they are, or are not, of the class that he is in search of?—It is deeply felt; I was surprised at the beginning of the agitation to find how much there was amongst educated women of the spirit of the Puritan times, and of the times of the Reformation. Many of us would be glad to die, not only for our religious convictions, but for the purity of our laws. Women feel exceedingly strongly on the legal point.

5333. Do you also feel it to be objectionable that this exception to ordinary law should be created by men for the benefit of men?—In that aspect it cannot but seem to us selfish, and I must say, cowardly.

5335. Hitherto I have been limiting my questions to what women feel; have you also found a very large number of men everywhere, who have felt with the women upon all these points?—I have attended hundreds of meetings of working-men electors, and of working women; and it would be difficult to overstate the strength of the feeling that exists amongst those men as to

Mrs. BUTLER.

to the injustice and unfairness of these Acts as between men and women.

5336. When you speak of the strength of the feeling, does it rise to indignation at these meetings?—It does. I may mention that very great indignation was expressed by the working people, including some soldiers, at the Colchester election, when Sir Henry Storks was defeated by our party; at the Pontefract election; and at the election at Oxford, when Mr. Lewis was defeated, for the second time, by our party. It was the indignation chiefly of the working-men electors which carried our cause there. We did not defeat Mr. Childers at his election; but I know, personally from him, that the amount of the opposition impressed him considerably.

5337. You mean to say that it impressed him with the depth of the public feeling on the subject?—With the depth of the public feeling on the unfairness of this legislation.

5338. You have spoken of the defeats of Mr. Lewis and Sir Henry Storks as being due to this feeling; I do not know whether you have any proof of that; but do you say that, at all events, it largely contributed to their defeat?—I was in Colchester myself a fortnight before the election with a party of friends, perhaps 15 to 20 persons. By appealing to the conscience of all the electors of the town, who we believed had some fear of God and some respect for the purity of English law, we reckoned, by a careful calculation, that 400 abstained from voting; and it was their abstention from voting which caused Sir Henry Storks to be defeated by a majority of either 500 or 700, I am not quite sure which. He himself felt it so, and sent his agent to me at the last moment, to beseech me to leave the town, and to make some sort of overtures; but these overtures did not satisfy me.

5339. Was the feeling very strong at Colchester, as shown by the language at the public meetings?—The meetings were so crowded that we could scarcely find place for the people; on the other hand, there was very violent opposition, as you may believe, and personal violence offered.

5340. Then, perhaps we may test the effect of the opposition by the fact that Sir Henry Storks' supporters were very angry?—They were very angry indeed.

5341. So much so that it led to threats, and some exhibition of personal violence?—I do not attribute those acts of personal violence to any one connected with the Government, but to the supporters of Sir Henry Storks.

5342. A feeling of exasperation was produced by the movement to which you have referred?—Certainly. If I may be permitted to mention it, the persons who were guilty of the greatest violence upon that occasion, which endangered, I may say, our lives, were keepers of the houses of ill fame, a fact which I considered significant, as showing how much in favour of this system they are.

5343. I do not know whether there is anything more that you desire to tell us about Colchester, and your reason for thinking that your opposition had a large effect upon the result produced?—Nothing more, I think.

5344. At Oxford, was your opposition on more than one occasion?—Only on one occasion.

5345. That was the second occasion, I think, that Mr. D. Lewis stood for Oxford?—It was a bye election, I think, when Lord Cardwell was raised to the peerage.

5346. I believe he had been prominent in the defence of this system in the House of Commons, had he not?—He had.

5347. Did you and those acting with you do your best at Oxford to arouse opposition to him in consequence of his support of this system?—Solely on that ground; we had nothing whatever against him besides his support of this system.

5348. Have you good reason to believe that your opposition did him great harm in his canvass?—I have good reason to know that. We gathered together, for example, the temperance people in that city, Good Templars, and others; and the Dissenting ministers and persons engaged in any kind of religious work; and it was their abstaining from voting, especially the temperance vote, I think, which turned the election; and that was the more remarkable because I think the person who was elected in place of Mr. Lewis was Mr. Hall, who was a brewer. The expression of feeling in the city was very strong against Mr. Lewis on account of his advocacy of these Acts.

5349. Is there anything further that you would like to say as regards the Pontefract election?—Perhaps it is not worth while to say more than that an impression was made upon Mr. Childers at the time. We have proof of it since in his expressions.

5350. We have spoken of the constitutional aspect of this question with regard to individual liberty; would you turn now, if you please, to your view of it in a moral aspect, and its effect as an example, and its effect upon one object of your life, viz., the reclamation of women?—This is a large subject. The effect generally on society at large is one question; the effect on women who are fallen is the point which I understand you wish to bring to me. A large experience of the Continent and of England together convinces me that that registration, and all that registration involves, hardens the women to the last degree. It deprives them of the sense of right over themselves, the most sacred right of a woman, and of control over themselves; it is constantly expressed in this way on the Continent, that she is no longer a person, but "la chose de l'administration," the thing of the Government. A woman may be very degraded outside the Acts; I do not wish to palliate the depth of degradation to which some fall; but so long as she is a free agent she can at any moment return into the path of virtue if she will; she can, if she feels a sentiment of disgust, at any moment withdraw from her profession. She does not always do it, because the will becomes enervated and habit is strong; but she has the inner consciousness that she can do it.

5351. But under a system like this she has to ask the leave of the men to allow her to reform, and to leave her path of vice?—She has to go through a certain process, I understand, to have her name taken off the register.

5352. She has to obtain the leave of men?—She has; but that is not all. That is a hindrance, drance, a practical hindrance to her immediate return to a life of virtue, enough to deter a poor weak-minded woman from returning; but the degradation is in the fact that she is a chattel, a thing, not a person. As the registered women tell me themselves, she is a vessel periodically cleansed for public use; she is a mere instrument. "I am not a woman," they say to me.

Mrs. BUTLER.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

Chairman.

5353. Do you mean English women?—English women say that. "I am not a woman; I am simply a tool; a vessel soiled, and cleansed at the Government expense for public use." This is the secret of the immense degradation of the person. I hold that to be much more important even than the difficulty of getting off the register.

Mr. Hopwood.

5354. When I spoke of the difficulty I did not mean that it was necessarily, because it was of man that she had to ask, but because she had to ask of anyone at all, leave to return and to be left alone in a life of purity, or improved behaviour?—That is certainly a great hindrance.

5355. Then, as I understand, you lay very great stress upon the fact that the woman is not mistress of her own life from the moment she is registered under this law?—I quite endorse what you say, and there is one point which makes it a great hardship. It is not difficult, I know by my experience, for a prostitute not under these Acts to obtain at once, even without passing through any home or refuge, some poor but honest labour, some situation. Thus she at once leaves her past behind her. Under the Acts it is much more difficult. A woman who is on the register, if she seeks and obtains a situation, is liable to have a policeman constantly looking her up; and that is death to her hopes; no respectable person will have a servant who is being looked up by the police to come up for examination. That is a very decided hindrance to their leaving a life of vice.

5356. From what you have seen, do you believe that the most fallen woman loses all sense of shame, or do you believe that there are very rare instances of that?—I have never met with one who had lost all sense of shame in her sober moments. In a state of intoxication you cannot answer for her.

5357. I speak particularly with regard to the submission to inspection and examination?—Amongst those women whom I have known not under the Acts, I have never met with one so hardened that I could not entertain hope for her.

5358. Do you believe that the effect of the operation of the Acts and their concomitant examinations is to overcome to a certain degree, the repugnance, and abhorrence, and sense of shame which you would rather see continued?—It must inevitably be so.

5359. And the absence of those feelings would lead you almost to despair of reclaiming the person who had lost them?—The only fallen women I have seen who are, I should say, humanly speaking, hopeless, are those subjected to these regulations. They seem to me utterly hard-

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

There is at the depth of their hardness a certain desperate despondency. They assume, in outward conversation with me, a manner which I have not seen in any others, a cold official manner, not unlike the manner that I have met with in men, when I have been on deputations to heads of the police, and so on,—the kind of manner that gives you the impression of saying "I belong to the Government; I am under the Government; you are not; I have nothing to say to you." They assume a sort of pride (I believe it is to cover the shame and misery within) in belonging to the Government, in being Queen's women. Their manner is quite official; I never met with such a manner amongst any other fallen women. The coldness with which they treat me reminds me, as I tell you, very much of that of male official persons: "stand off, we belong to the Government; you have nothing to say to us"; and, therefore, it is in vain to try to influence them for their good.

5360. I do not know whether, amongst other matters, you have read in the proceedings before this Committee, a description of these women given by Dr. Cook, of the London Lock Hospital, in answer to Question 2684, of the 31st March last?—I have read that description.

5361. He is asked, "What distinction is there between the two classes?" (He is comparing the women outside the Acts with those under the Acts.) And his answer is, "The distinction is this, and I think it is obvious to almost any one at first sight that the Government patients are horribly alike, at one dull dead level. The ordinary patients are very mixed, some of more and some of less education, some of more and some of less refinement of appearance; but the Government patients are brutalised beyond description in appearance and in manner. As I speak to them it is painful." Is that your view?—As I read that description it seemed to me the exact picture of the women I met with in Brussels, in Paris, and in Naples, who are registered women.

5362. May I ask you, without odiously distinguishing nationality, whether you have found the women who have been under the system, as it is abroad, even more indurated than some of those you are speaking of under the system here?—I can scarcely say that they are worse.

5363. They are much the same?—They are much the same.

5364. And you think that the effect of the system is to bring them to the same level?—It is.

5365. Is the effect of the debasement of those women confined to themselves, or does it, in your judgment, spread itself in some degree to the community in which they dwell?—It spreads itself very largely. The poorer class of working women of the towns where these Acts are in force are demoralised in the sense that their conscience becomes confused as to the distinction between right and wrong. The same is the case with the male youth of those towns. I should like to state that the conscience becomes confused in this way, because the State action, elevating this profession into a sort of recognised, legalised industry, removes the essential element of guilt from the act of prostitution itself, to the infringement ment of the police regulations under the Act. Now I have met with women in the subjected districts who have said to me: "I am all right; the police do not touch me; I have a clear conscience, because I go regularly up to the examination; I obey every rule." Can anything be more awful than that: that the State should have taught a woman that the essential element of guilt is not her vicious life, but the infringement of police rules, while carrying on her vicious life?

5366. With regard to women leaving a life of prostitution, from the experience which you have had of endeavouring to reclaim them, is it your experience that the majority of women leave their immoral life early?—It is my experience that the majority of women do not remain in that life more than, I should say, on the average, three or four years.

5367. What, in your observation, is the effect of this system; is it, or is it not, to retain women longer in this sad calling?—On this, I fear, that I cannot give direct evidence; I can only quote Captain Harris's report. In Captain Harris's report I think you will see that there are more women now remaining in that course of life to the age of 26, and over, than there were before the Acts.

5368. I think that Captain Harris's report for 1881 speaks for itself; I believe you are of opinion that these Acts have an effect upon the soldiers, as stimulating them to immorality, and you have some experience of that?—Yes, I have had some experience of that in my visits to the subjected districts; if you desire it I can give you an illustration of it. I have visited all the subjected districts, with the exception of Aldershot; I have spent some time in many of those towns. In Chatham I spent one whole night in going into the brothels of the town. My motive was the love of God and of my poor fallen sister women. I went into several brothels; I was accompanied by two gentlemen of the Rescue Society, and by Professor Stuart, of Cambridge, who remained outside in the street, for I would not have anyone enter with me. I was introduced to low dancing saloons, drinking saloons, and wretched theatres in connection with the brothels, and with doors leading into them. I passed some time there, and I saw there evidence of the degradation of the young soldiers who first join the army. I am a mother of sons, and my heart was well nigh broken when I returned to my room in the early morning of the following day. There were boys there who appeared to me to be not more than 13 years of age, very boyish; some may have been 17, 18, or 20, but they were extremely youthful in appearance. Some of them had just joined; some of them had a look of perfect innocence, like boys brought from the country. My heart was moved to speak to them, and there, in that brothel, I gathered them round me, or rather they gathered themselves round me, and I spoke to them as a mother to sons. I did not speak to them altogether in a directly religious manner; I spoke to them lovingly, with sympathy; I asked them if they had no better amusement than this wretched amusement. They said they did not know of any.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

I said, "Who has provided this for you; why do you come here?" "Oh," they said, "the soldiers all come here, and these are the Government women;" there were perhaps a couple of hundred sitting round the room. Then these boys began to speak to me themselves. One burst into tears, and leaning his head on my shoulder, he said, "Oh, madam, you will not go away; you will stay amongst us and try and do us good." Another, who was spokesman for a group of young soldiers, said to me, "Here is a lad" (pushing one forward), "very young; he has just joined; couldn't you get him out of this? He doesn't understand what it means."

5369. This was at Chatham?—This was at Chatham.

5370. Was it some years ago, or recently?—This was in April 1870. It was the first year of our agitation.

Chairman.

5371. Was this in a brothel, or in a singing saloon?—This was in a low dancing and singing saloon, connected with a brothel, entering by the same door.

Mr. Hopwood.

5372. Were these young Marines and young soldiers?—Yes; young Marines and young soldiers.

5373. And were there girls present?—There were a couple of hundred, I should think, in that particular room; they were sitting amongst the soldiers and the boys. I was struck by the want of anything like gaiety or mirth; it was solemn as hell itself, with no look of pleasure in any face; a business-like exhibition of superintended vice. The girls had their tickets (for they had them at that time) pinned upon their dresses; and many of the boys and soldiers had these same tickets pinned or fastened into their hats, passing them from one to the other with remarks as to the date of the last examination. I talked to the women as well as to the men. One of these young soldiers said to me, "It is a shame that they don't give us some proper amusement." I saw in a moment that those youths would have been delighted with anything like a lecture, or a penny reading with singing and music, or anything decent, and they could have been withdrawn from that scene. Then the spokesman concluded by saying: "They" (that is to say, the military authorities) "expect us to be bad, and of course we are bad."

5374. I believe that happily a good deal of that has been altered since?—The Acts had then been four years in operation in Chatham.

5375. Wherever you have been where the Acts have been in force, or where they have not been in force, you have made it your business during a large part of your life to study this matter, with a view to reclaiming the women?—And with a view to reclaiming men quite as much.

5376. In that respect you differ from the law, which only seeks to cure the women; and you seek, in your moral efforts, to cure the men as well?—Certainly.

5377. Feeling that, without attacking the mischief there, you are not likely to obtain success?—It

5 May 1882.]

Mrs. BUTLER.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

—It appears to me a simple want of common sense to apply a law to one sex only.

5379. And to those which are in existence you offer your undying opposition?—We do. I speak in the name of a very vast association of women in England and throughout the world, and I should not be true to that association, representing, as I do, that large body of women here to-day, did I not say what I feel concerning the personal insult offered to women. This is the deepest insult that can be offered to womanhood, an act of tyranny and shame, degrading alike to those who impose it and those who endure it. Permit me to remind you that there is nothing in the physical being of a man answering to the sacredness of the maternal functions in a woman, and that these functions, and every organ connected with them, ought to be held in reverence by man. Where this reverence ceases to be felt, through the habitual outrage of any class of women, however degraded that class may already be, the demoralisation of society at large is sure to follow. I am not here to represent virtuous women alone; I plead for the rights of the most virtuous and the most vicious equally, and I speak for the womanhood of the world. We are solidaire, and you will find us so. You have the proof of it in the fact that such a vast association of the best and purest women in the world has laboured unceasingly for 13 years past to redress this wrong inflicted upon the poor and degraded of their own sex. The moral character of a woman, though it be of the lowest, does not alter the sacrilegious character of an indecent assault upon her person; and no enactment or law in any land can ever make such an assault other than morally criminal. The part assigned to woman in the physiology of the race is higher, much more delicate, and more to be respected than that of man. The line of human descent is continued corporeally on the woman's side. The fact of the greater physical weakness of women results from their forces being diverted to the maternal functions, and this very weakness gives them a stronger title to the respect of their persons than men can have, who are able, by their superior physical strength, to protect themselves. This respect has always been accorded to women except at periods of history when society has become licentious and men have become unmanly. Every woman has a right, a Divine right, to protect the secrets of her own person; it is her inalienable right. The forcible inspection of a man bears no comparison in cruelty and indecency to the forcible examination of a woman. We care not how sinful, how criminal the poor victim may be, so long as she bears the outward semblance, though in the most blighted form, of womanhood; and we all feel that, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto Me." It may be said that this is sentiment; I grant that it is sentiment, but it is a sentiment which governs the world; it is a sentiment as deep as our faith in God; it is the deepest of human sentiments. Parliament cannot afford, on this question, to set aside the sentiment of the motherhood of England. There will be no peace for the advocates of these Acts, no peace for the nation, while the Acts remain. Pardon me if I have transgressed in making too long a statement.

0.75.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5380. You gave us two dates; you said that you first became aware of the passing of the Act of 1864 in the year 1865, and you told us that you became aware of the passing of the Act of 1869 in the month of November in that year?—Rather earlier. It was the moment I came home from the continent, after Parliament had risen.

5381. Of course you are aware that the Act of 1866 was passed in the interval between 1864 and 1869?—Yes.

5382. Were you on the continent during the whole of that interval?—No, by no means; but I constantly read the newspapers, and I sometimes saw allusions to this legislation, and, from my acquaintance with the subject on the continent, I drew my own conclusions.

5383. I did not quite understand how it was that you did not take any steps upon the subject of these Acts, although in the year 1866, which was more than three years before the second date that you gave us, the Act of 1866, which was the principal Act upon this subject, was passed; did it escape your observation?—No, it did not; but I was very much out of health for some years; I was inwardly preparing for future action.

5384. I think you said that you went to Chatham in April 1870?—Yes.

5385. That is a good many years ago; are you aware that evidence has been tendered (I say nothing as to the weight or value of that evidence) to show that the state of Chatham has improved very much since that time?—I have read that evidence.

5386. You detailed a very shocking scene there; do I correctly understand you to think that such a scene as that could not have occurred in any town in which the Acts were not in operation; that it could not have occurred, say, in Manchester or Hull?—Such a scene as that could have occurred anywhere, but with this difference, that the persons taking part in that scene would not have felt that the whole thing was under Government superintendence.

5387. Of course I do not like to probe your experiences; but I suppose that, as regards the actual vicious spectacle exhibited there, it might have taken place in a town like Manchester or Bradford, perhaps, which we may assume to be exceedingly bad in these respects?—No doubt it might.

5388. Forgive me for asking you whether you could tell me when you were last in these subjected districts. Might I call your attention to an answer that you gave before the Royal Commission in March 1871, when you said, "It is many months since I visited any of the garrison towns, and I cannot bring before you facts as to England"?—In 1870, at the time that I visited Chatham, I visited all the garrison towns of Kent.

G G 3

5389. That

5 May 1882.]

Mrs. BUTLER.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

5389. That was less than a year before you gave that answer to the Royal Commission?—Yes, quite so.

5390. May I ask how you reconcile that with your answer given before the Royal Commission, "It is many months since I visited any of the garrison towns, and I cannot bring before you facts as to England"?—In this way: that at the Royal Commission I was summoned without the smallest preparation; there was no intimation given of the subjects of examination; there was no preparation made such as there is before this Committee, and I could not venture to speak from my own memory of what had occurred even a year ago without some little preparation. I was not aware of what questions the Royal Commission would ask. If I had had access then to my own journals, I could have at once done so.

5391. I think you said that you visited all the garrison towns in 1870?—All the garrison towns of Kent.

5392. That county contains several garrison towns; Dover, Canterbury, Maidstone, Woolwich, Chatham, Greenwich, and Gravesend?—Yes.

5393. Have you visited any of those towns since?—I have been three times in Plymouth and Devonport, also I have visited Portsmouth and Southampton.

5394. But I refer to Kent; have you been to any of the Kent towns since then?—I have been only to Canterbury.

5395. When were you at Canterbury?—I am sorry to say that I have not the date here, but it was some time before 1874, because since 1874 I have been engaged almost entirely upon the continental work.

5396. That is as regards the Kent towns; I think you mentioned Plymouth, did you not?—I have been three times at Plymouth; my first visit was in 1870; the second time was the year when the Social Science Congress met there; and a third time later. I did not bring the dates, but it is easy to get them; the last time that I went there was previous to 1874.

5397. Then I understand that, with one exception, you have not been to the Kent towns since 1870, or to Plymouth since 1873?—No.

5398. You have never been to Aldershot at all, have you?—I have never been to Aldershot.

5399. Do you say that you have not visited any of the other subjected districts since 1873?—Since 1873 I think I have not visited any except Canterbury.

5400. Therefore, of course you could not from your personal knowledge speak as to the operation of the Acts in those places since that date?—No, I cannot at all from personal knowledge.

5401. I am anxious to test, as far as I can, the feeling of the population in these subjected districts upon the subject of the Acts, and perhaps I may get a little assistance from you; what was the date of Sir Henry Stork's election?—It was in 1870.

5402. Do you know what the opinions of the present Members for Colchester are upon the subject of these Acts?—I am not sure. The Ladies' National Association have held meetings in Colchester this last year, 1881.

5403. You spoke of 123,000 signatures, I think, being attached to the general petition, and 12,000 signatures being attached to the women's petition from the subjected districts?—Those, I think, were the figures.

5404. By that I suppose you mean the signatures attached to all the petitions that were presented?—There were, I think, in one or two cases separate petitions, but I think they were generally mixed up.

5405. I suppose they were petitions presented in different years?—In different years.

5406. Therefore, of course the signature of the same lady or woman might be attached to a good many petitions, might it not?—It might be.

5407. I suppose you could not give me the least idea of the number of the female adult population in these subjected districts?—I am sorry to say that I cannot.

5408. You said, I think, that even women who were taken off the register were liable to be looked after by the police, and that that was a reason why respectable people would not like to engage their services: but surely that looking after would be quite illegal, would it not, after their names were taken from the register?—That was not what I wished to explain. I wished to explain the difficulty of a girl who is on the register turning, immediately when the impulse is on her, to a virtuous life.

5409. I understood you to say that when a woman had once been on the register, even if she got off the register, there would be a difficulty in her obtaining a respectable situation, because the police would be apt to look after her; was I wrong?—I would not venture to assert that of the police. It would be illegal if they did. If a woman on the register suddenly desires, from a feeling of disgust, to leave that life and become virtuous, she goes and finds a little work and ceases to be a prostitute; but her name being still on the register, the police come to call her up for examination.

5410. Then that would not in fact apply to a woman who had once got her name off the register?—Certainly not.

5411. You are aware, I suppose, are you not, that the Act of Parliament requires that certain religious and moral agencies should be brought to bear upon those women when they are in hospital?—I am quite aware of that.

5412. And you are aware also, are you not, that it is stated in evidence that a great many women have been reclaimed and restored to a virtuous life by means of those agencies?—I have read those statements.

5413. Do you know these Lock hospitals at all?—The only one that I have had admission to is the one at Devonport, the Albert Hospital. I was refused admission to the Chatham Hospital.

5414. With regard to the Devonport Hospital, did you hear the religious ministrations of the chaplain there?—I did not. I spoke with the matron a great deal; her name was Miss Bull; she was afterwards, I think, dismissed. There are few things which shock the sense of the country, so far as I know it, more than the fact that religious teaching is allied with the State regulation of vice. I have received letters from registered women in that hospital, in which they say that the thing they cannot "swallow" (to use their their own expression) is that the “parson” should be there, knowing for what purpose they are cleansed in that hospital.

MRS. BUTLER.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

5415. Would you go so far as to say that it would be better that there should be no religious ministrations provided for these women in these hospitals?—Decidedly; I think it is a mockery of God.

5416. And the fact that some of these poor women have been reclaimed through the instrumentality of the chaplains of the hospitals would weigh as nothing in your mind as against what you have described as the demoralising effect of the Acts?—I should value any individual reclamation exceedingly, but it does count to me as nothing in comparison with the evil done.

5417. And I suppose I may assume that you would answer, as some of the witnesses have answered, that the more efficient these Acts were in a sanitary point of view, the more objectionable they would be in a moral point of view?—I am not quite sure that I should answer as other witnesses have done upon that point.

5418. Perhaps you would rather not give an answer upon that point?—I have no objection to give an answer. I am not one of those who think that it is objectionable, or wrong, to separate the penalty of vice from the vice; I believe that, as Christians, we are called upon as much as possible to relieve persons, however sinful, from whatever penalty falls upon them through Nature’s vengeance for the violation of her laws. But I do not quite see what you mean; perhaps you will be kind enough to repeat your question.

5419. You are aware that one of the arguments against the Acts is that, to put it forcibly, they make vice safe; and several of the witnesses who have been examined on the subject of the Acts, and in opposition to the Acts, have said that, bearing that in mind, they consider that the more efficient the Acts are in a sanitary point of view, the more objectionable they become in a moral point of view; would you agree in that?—I should say that, if the Acts were exceedingly efficient in their operation, if every man could believe that they were absolutely efficient in every case, that would probably increase the amount of indulgence.

5420. And to that extent of course they would, from a moral point of view, be objectionable?—It would increase immorality.

Mr. William Fowler.

5421. I think you spoke strongly as to your feeling of the demoralising effects of legislation of this sort upon society at large; and you also gave us evidence with regard to the petitions and meetings; have you not found very considerable difficulty in spreading information upon this subject?—We have found an exceptional amount of difficulty, owing to the nature of the subject.

5422. That is to say, that even those who sympathised with you would very much hesitate to take any public part in the matter?—It is to some extent a matter of class. Amongst the higher classes of the people there was positive refusal to have anything to do with our agitation, even when there was sympathy felt with it; and to some extent that remains (I speak of the wives of peers, and so on); but it is giving way amongst the humbler classes; the repugnance is less keenly felt. Amongst refined and educated women of every class repugnance is strongly felt, but it has been overcome by a sense of duty.

Mr. William Fowler—continued.

5423. But you have been aware sometimes, have you not, that even persons in a public position like Members of Parliament and others, sympathising with your views, have yet felt great objection to taking any public part in the matter?—Certainly, that is very usual.

5424. And that has been a very great obstacle in the way of disseminating information?—A very great obstacle.

5425. In connection with that I think you said something about the effect of law as educating the minds of men as well as of women?—We consider that that is a very important part of the subject; the law is undoubtedly a great educator. What the law expresses to be right people generally consider to be right.

5426. You said something about the effect of these Acts upon the women, and that they even became so entirely a class that, in some cases, they went so far as to call themselves “Queen’s women”?—That is so.

5427. That is not, I suppose, a fact that has come under your own observation?—It has come under my own observation several times.

5428. Those women have actually spoken to you of themselves as “Queen’s women”?—As “Government women.”

5429. Is it not a fact that, for instance, in India, there is a regular caste of prostitutes?—I believe there is; we have correspondents in India who assert that it is so.

5430. If I understood you rightly, you thought that the effect of these Acts was to make the women feel themselves to be a kind of class apart from the rest of the community?—Undoubtedly. It consolidates that class, and makes it more concrete.

5431. We have had it suggested to several witnesses, and it has been in fact, I suppose, intended to be implied, that those who had not personal experience on this question were not such good witnesses with regard to the principles involved as those who actually live in the very midst of it; that would not be your view, I apprehend?—My view of the matter is that those who have not been in the subjected districts are not such good witnesses, certainly, with regard to the working of the Acts; but, with regard to the principles themselves (principles being world wide), it does not require us to be in the subjected districts in order to judge of a principle; we are quite as good judges of the principle away from the districts as we are in them.

5432. Could you give any illustration of that?—Negro slavery was abolished in our British possessions by a body of persons in England who had never seen a negro slave, who had never visited a slave plantation, and had never seen the working of slavery there. They took their stand upon the principle that slavery was wrong; we take our stand entirely and purely upon the principle that the State must not regulate prostitution; and no results given to us from year to year, as they are, no reports of this present Committee will in any respect or in the smallest degree alter our position, because we take our stand upon principles, which are eternal.

5433. Is it not the fact that the first consideration put before the world in these Acts is, that of bodily health?—Certainly.

5434. And you would prefer before that the moral and constitutional questions involved in such laws?—Certainly, and the moral principle involved in it is enough, because health will follow upon morality, and only upon morality.

5435. That is to say, you can cure the bodies of men if you once cure their minds; and you would not permanently cure their bodies as a whole, unless you got their minds cured?—We are convinced that vice will always be attended with certain penalties; and that it is in vain to try to lessen these diseases, unless you try to make men and women more moral.

Mr. Hopwood.

5436. You have been asked about your knowledge of the earlier stages of this legislation; I believe the Act of 1866 was only in operation at a few stations?—Yes.

5437. And the public knew very little of the subject before the passing of the Act of 1869?—I should say that the public was entirely in ignorance. I had sources of knowledge which perhaps were not open to many; one was through Mrs. Harriet Martineau, who had been consulted by some members of the Government at the very beginning of this legislation.

5438. You were asked about your visits to the subjected districts; I think I understood you to say that you had been in all of them except Aldershot?—Yes; and Cork.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5439. Have you been to the Curragh?—I have never been to any of the stations in Ireland, though I have visited Ireland to hold meetings.

Mr. Hopwood.

5440. And you visited all those places, either with a view to studying the effect of the Acts, or with a view of being present at some manifestation against their operation or their continuance?—With both objects.

5441. When were you last at Woolwich in connection with this subject; was it about two years ago; were you at a meeting when the chair was taken by Mr. Stephenson Blackwood?—Yes, in November 1879; I was at Woolwich.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5442. I understood you to say that with one exception you had not been in Kent since 1870?—I beg your pardon, my memory failed me. I have had to take so many journeys.

Mr. Hopwood.

5443. As to Colchester, do you know that Mr. Causton, the Member for Colchester, has expressed his favourable opinion towards the repeal of the Acts?—I find that expressed in the last Report of the Ladies' National Association.

5444. And as to Mr. Willis, you do not know what action he may have taken in the matter?—We do not know.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

5445. You have been asked about women being on the register, and about the difficulty of their getting work while they are so; do you think that it would conduce to a poor woman's chance of getting employment if it were known that she had been on the register and had got off?—Certainly not, if it were known.

5446. It seems to be assumed that there would be nothing against her if she had been on the register and had got her name off; do you conceive that the infamy attached to having been on would subside from the moment of her name being taken off?—We have endeavoured occasionally to get situations for girls who have been registered, and I can speak from a very considerable experience on that head, because, in Liverpool, I have virtually a kind of register office for women, who have been unfortunate, and who desire to take work. I have constant applications, therefore, from fallen women in the unsubjected districts, and from women who have been in subjected districts, and who have been under the Acts, and from others, to find places for them. The difficulty is extreme in finding anything for a girl who has ever been on the register, and the difficulty is, to some extent, in her own character having been lowered by the Acts.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

5447. How is it known that she has been on the register; the register is not public, is it?—No, but when I get situations for girls I endeavour to find devotedly Christian women who will take them with a knowledge of the past, because it is better not to conceal it when it is possible, from the lady who engages the girl.

Mr. Hopwood.

5448. You are asked whether you do not think that the religious and moral agencies which are brought to bear upon these people in the hospital, compensate for the ill that the Acts do; in your judgment, do the religious and moral agencies in the hospital at all compensate for the positive mischief done to public morals by these Acts?—I think I have replied, that I do not think so.

5449. You were asked whether it is not an extraordinary advantage to the women in hospital that there should be a religious and moral agency when they were there?—It can be no advantage in cases (and those I think are many) in which the bitterness of soul and the hatred in the heart of the women against all officials connected with the system, prevents them from receiving from an official the living truth of the love of God and of the Saviour. There is too much hatred and bitterness in the heart of the registered women to receive the message of salvation from an officer of the Government.

5450. From your knowledge of hospitals generally, do you know of any hospital that is without this religious instruction?—I do not think I know any.

5451. It is not the distinguishing advantage of the Government Lock hospitals over the other Lock hospitals, that they have religious instruction?

5 May 1882.]

Mrs. BUTLER.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

tion?—I never entered any hospital (and I have visited many) in which there were not two things; regular ministerial instruction, and free entrance for women to minister.

5452. Perhaps you may be also aware that this clause, with regard to religious instruction, was an afterthought in one of the latest Acts, and did not exist in the previous one?—So Mr. Henley informed me.

5453. And perhaps you may be aware that it was due to the suggestion of Mr. Ayrton, who was himself a strong opponent of the Acts?—I recollect that being the case.

Chairman.

5454. You said, did you not, that you were refused admission into one of the Government Lock hospitals?—Yes.

5455. What Lock hospital was that?—That was in Chatham, in 1870.

5456. By whom were you refused admission?

The Reverend JAMES PATERSON GLEDSTONE, re-called; and further Examined.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

5460. At Question 4431 the following question is addressed to you by the Right honourable Gentleman the Member for Halifax: "Is that impression of legal and Government sanction to prostitution entertained by the prostitute class itself?" And you reply: "Quite so, and also by those who consort with them." Will you be good enough to tell the Committee upon what evidence that answer of yours rests?—I rest that upon evidence that was brought before the Royal Commission. I have always been accustomed to refer to that in substantiation of this statement.

5461. Since the Royal Commission, have you obtained any evidence from any prostitutes, that that is their impression of the Acts?—No; I have not obtained any evidence from prostitutes that that is their impression.

5462. Since the date of the Royal Commission, have you obtained evidence from any persons who consort with prostitutes, that that is their opinion?—I have obtained evidence from a Wesleyan minister, that young soldiers have come to him to inquire whether fornication is now a sin, inasmuch as arrangements are made by the Government for the keeping of women in those places healthy and safe.

5463. But no young soldiers have come to you?—No young soldiers have come to me.

5464. Then, at Question 4439, you are asked about another subject, and the same subject is again brought up in Questions 4526-28, as to the difficulty of leaving their mode of life on the part of these women. In reply to Question 4439 you say: "I think it is one of the greatest blots of the Acts that it is made so difficult for a woman to leave this life when she wishes to do so;" and subsequently in answer to Question 4528, you say: "The Acts are objectionable to my mind on that very score: that if they are to be carried out thoroughly, it makes it very difficult for a woman who has come under their operation to get —A regular application was made to the hospital authorities, and they declined to admit me.

Chairman—continued.

Mr. Hopwood.

5457. Is it not notorious that there was a general order that no one was to be admitted to the Lock hospitals, unless with the sanction of the authorities?—I have seen that order in print on the wall of a hospital.

5458. It is amongst the regulations for the Government and management of the Lock wards: "19th January 1878. No visitor shall be permitted within the Lock wards, unless by leave of the chairman of the managing committee, the resident medical officer, the chaplain, or the matron;" that is the order to which you refer?—Yes, that is the order which I saw; it was shown to me.

Chairman.

5459. And they refused to sanction your admission?—They did.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

back to a better life if she wants to do so." Then at Question 4529 the Right honourable Gentleman asked you: "Is it not the fact that many of these women cannot write?" And your answer is: "I understand so." Then he asks: "And, therefore, they have to appeal to some one else to assist them in addressing that written request." And your answer is: "Yes." Have you made personal and special inquiries as to the course pursued in the certified hospitals when any woman desires to leave her vicious course of life?—No, I have not made any inquiry in the hospitals. I base this upon the difficulties interposed by the Acts themselves. If a woman desires to be liberated from the operation of the Acts she must write her request, or she must get some one to write it for her; and the doing of that in the case of women who are unable to write, interposes a very great difficulty.

5465. What additional facility could you suggest as proper to be afforded to a woman who desired to leave this life?—I think that they ought never to be put upon the register; that as soon as a woman desires to leave the life she ought to be free to do so.

5466. That is another point. Assuming that women are to be compulsorily detained until they are cured, can you suggest to the Committee any other mode by which greater facilities could be afforded to women?—I have no alternative to suggest.

5467. Has your attention been called to the confidential instructions to visiting surgeons which are printed in the Appendix to the Report of this Committee to the House of Commons for the year 1879?—It has not.

5468. I hear your answer with great surprise. I shall now have to read the first article to you?—May I ask what is the title of that volume?

5469. This is from the Report of the Committee upon the Contagious Diseases Acts, ordered by the House of Commons to be printed in 1879.

H H

I will

5 May 1882.]

Rev. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

I will read to you the first Article: "The successful working of the Contagious Diseases Acts will materially depend on the care, tact, and judgment with which the duties of the visiting surgeon are performed, and the extent to which he may succeed in obtaining the goodwill and confidence of the women coming before him for examination; he will impress upon them all that his sole desire is to benefit them, and his firm determination to protect them from oppression and aid them, if desirous to reform; and he will, on all suitable occasions, specially call their attention to the 9th section of the Act of 1869, which enables him to relieve them from periodical examination, on satisfactory evidence of their having ceased to be prostitutes." Is it not your opinion that if the visiting surgeon carries out his duties properly, according to the instructions which have been given him, no case can arise of difficulty for a woman to leave this life if she wishes to do so?—He would help her in such a case; but there is no one to see that he would carry out those instructions fairly with regard to that woman. Do the women themselves know that the surgeon is obliged, or expected, to give them help like that; because if the women do not know of such an arrangement they are left entirely at the mercy of the surgeon.

5470. I do not want to read all this long memorandum of instructions to you, but you will find that every possible precaution was taken that the women should be informed?—I am glad to have my attention called to the instructions.

5471. Assuming this article, which I have read, which was dated 1870, to be properly carried out, is that sufficient to remove your objection as to the difficulty of a woman's leaving this life?—No, it is not.

5472. What amendment should you require?—I have said already that I have no alternative to offer. My objection lies altogether to this registration and keeping women under Government inspection. Therefore I can offer no alternative.

5473. Without going into the question as to whether the Acts are right or wrong, assuming the Acts to be in force, do you think there is any difficulty interposed by the visiting surgeon in the way of the women leaving this way of life?—Not interposed by him, personally.

5474. You make no possible imputation against the manner in which the visiting surgeon carries out his duties?—No, if he carries out the Acts the difficulty still abides; and if he carries out that confidential instruction the difficulty still abides.

5475. Supposing the Acts to remain in force, if the visiting surgeon carries out that instruction properly, you think there would be no imputation against him?—No imputation against him, personally.

5476. And you have never heard of any cases of anything approaching misconduct on the part of the visiting surgeon?—If you mean by that to ask whether I have heard of any case on this branch in which he has refused to write a letter, I know of no such case.

5477. Nor where he has interposed any difficulty?—No, I do not know of any case in which he has himself interposed a difficulty. My objection goes to the requirements of the Acts.

5478. At Question No. 4489 the Right honourable Gentlemen asked you this: "You have no doubt, have you, that in many cases the prospect of immunity from disease, however fallacious, leads to vicious courses on the part of young men?" And your answer was: "I cannot doubt that." Are the young men referred to in your reply limited to soldiers, or do you include civilians?—I have heard of it with regard to civilians, but I ought to say, apart from the evidence before the Royal Commission, which I fall back upon in cases of this kind, that the cases of civilians have not been in this country. I heard of many such cases when I was in America of young Americans coming over to Europe, and I cannot doubt that it is so.

5479. But you do not know of any cases?—I do not know of any English cases, save the cases of the soldiers to which I have referred.

5480. Do you know of cases of soldiers?—Not personally: only through the Wesleyan minister of whom I spoke.

5481. Has your attention been called to a letter published as a Parliamentary Paper last year from the General Commanding the forces in Ireland, as to the expediency of extending the application of the Contagious Diseases Acts to Dublin?—No, I have not seen that.

5482. By one of the enclosures in this letter from Colonel Tucker, commanding the 80th Regiment, it appears that during a period of 10 months, in the garrison of Dublin, considerably over 43 per cent. of the unmarried portion of that regiment had been incapacitated for duty by venereal disease; that being so, would it not convey to your mind that there was very little idea amongst the soldiers of the regiment that the fact of their being in a subjected district protected them from disease?—I do not gather from your question where those men contracted that disease.

5483. They contracted disease in Dublin; does not such a startling fact as that convey to your mind the idea that the question whether they were in a subjected or in an unsubjected district, did not at all influence the consideration of a soldier when he was about to have connection with a prostitute?—It would seem to point in that direction. You cannot single men out so far as that; but I think you may speak of general tendencies in the way in which I answered the question before.

5484. Supposing the Acts to be repealed, and the inmates of the hospitals to be discharged, do you think there is any probability of voluntary contributions being raised to supply the void which would thus be left by the removal of the certified hospitals?—I should think so from what I know of hospitals; for instance, I was in Bradford as late as last January, and it is the custom there to take in cases of this kind, and to treat them. In Winchester, before the Acts came into operation, it was customary there to treat such cases voluntarily, and it was only when the Acts were brought into operation that that was discontinued.

5485. Are

5 May 1882.]

Rev. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

5485. Are you aware that the amount of accommodation in voluntary Lock hospitals is alarmingly insufficient throughout the country?—I did not know that.

5486. Assuming that according to Mr. Lowndes' statement, or according to the statements of other witnesses, that the number of beds in voluntary Lock hospitals throughout the United Kingdom is 450, whilst the total number of the beds in the certified Lock hospitals, excluding workhouses, was 664, supposing that the Acts were at once repealed, so that the women who are now being treated in the certified hospitals had to leave, do you think there is any probability of people coming forward voluntarily to save these women from the lamentable condition of health in which they find themselves?—I think there would be.

5487. At all events, such a state of things could not come about for a very long time?—Possibly not. I think that the mind of the people needs educating upon this matter very largely, that is to say, the necessity of giving help to this form of disease just as they give help to other forms of disease, not shutting it out because it is the result of sin any more than we shut a drunkard out of a hospital because his disease may be the result of sin.

5488. If you repeal the Acts suddenly, 600 women who are now being treated in these hospitals would have to go forth without any medical treatment, would they not?—I think efforts would be made in such a case to do the best that could be done for them.

5489. Do you think that efforts could be made within such a reasonable time as to save them from destruction?—I think so. I do not think that the destruction is very imminent.

5490. How do you account then for the subscriptions to the voluntary Lock hospitals being so small?—I prefer that the cases should be treated in ordinary hospitals, and not that they should be separated. To begin with, I should not subscribe to a hospital of that sort.

5491. Not to the London Lock Hospital?—Not to any place in which this disease is treated in an exceptional way, and I am a representative of many.

5492. And you would rather that the women should perish of disease than do so?—I would rather that they were taken into ordinary hospitals and treated in the ordinary way; and we think that in that way the disease could be overtaken, and that no moral exception could be raised to such a course of procedure.

5493. But you have to deal with the state of circumstances which exist. The general hospitals refuse to take in such patients, and therefore they must be treated either in certified hospitals or in voluntary Lock hospitals. I ask you this question, whether, rather than that they should be treated in voluntary Lock hospitals, you would prefer that they should not be treated at all?—I have inquired into that subject, and I would be prepared to say at once, without hesitation, that there are many hospitals that do receive them. Others again decline, I think, upon mistaken grounds.

5494. I believe that there are only about 130
0.75.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

beds in the United Kingdom altogether in general hospitals for venereal patients; would you prefer their not being treated at all to their being treated in voluntary Lock hospitals?—I do not see that I am put to that alternative. There is another alternative in practical life, and to that alternative I should flee. My alternative is that there are hospitals supported by voluntary subscriptions, and there are also workhouses to which these women go.

5495. Are you aware that Lock wards of the workhouses are under a compulsory power?—I was not aware that women having this disease treated in the workhouses were under compulsion.

5496. Do you know that they cannot leave before they are cured?—I was not aware of that. I never heard of such an arrangement, say in a workhouse outside a subjected district.

5497. At Question 4532 the Right honourable Gentleman asked you whether you did not think that the work of the doctors under these Acts was demoralising to them, and you say that, in your opinion, it is demoralising to the doctors. I suppose by that you do not mean to convey any imputation against the doctors themselves, and the way in which they carry out their instructions, but simply, as you said before, that it is a natural consequence of the Acts?—A consequence of their working of the Acts.

5498. But you do not make any imputation upon the doctors personally?—I make no imputation upon them further than this, that I regard them as engaged in an immoral work; that their work under these Acts is an immoral work, and that they cannot do an immoral thing without being injured morally by it.

5499. Have you read all the evidence which has been given in favour of the working of the Acts by various ministers of religion who were examined in the course of last Session?—No, I have not had the opportunity. I have the evidence, but I have been too busy to read it all.

5500. I think you said that you had read the evidence of one witness?—I have looked at parts of the evidence as they have been pointed out to me. There is one minister of religion whose evidence I have read fully, a minister of my own denomination, and I read it because he was a minister of my own denomination; I mean the Rev. Mr. Tuffield.

5501. To go to another branch of the subject, with regard to the inaccuracies (using the most polite term possible), as to the facts concerning the working of these Acts which are made use of by those who speak at public meetings for their repeal; in the first place I will refer you to what happened at Whitehaven in the month of December 1876. You recollect being at Whitehaven then, at the time when I was engaged in a contested election?—Yes, I remember being there.

5502. I was then opposed by Mr. Thompson?—Yes, I remember that.

5503. Did you go there at your own expense?—I did not.

5504. You went at the expense of a society?—I went at the expense of a society.

5505. You held a meeting there for the repeal
of

5 May 1882.]

Rev. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

[Continued.]

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

of the Acts, or I suppose the society held the meeting?—Yes.

5506. Do you recollect having an interview with me at Whitehaven Castle?—I do.

5507. Do you remember what I said to you?—I do not remember what you said further than this, if I can charge my memory with it: you said that you were as much in favour of these Acts as any man in England. I may be wrong, but that is the impression upon my mind.

5508. What I said to you and the deputation that accompanied you, was this: that being a member of the Government, I was absolutely neutral on the subject, as the intentions of the Government had not been declared, because I considered that it was not a question of sufficient importance upon which to separate myself from the Government, supposing that I differed with them as to the policy of retaining the Acts; and that, therefore, I was positively neutral on the subject, and I told the electors so. But I added that, personally, I was as much in favour of the Acts as any man could be. Do you remember that?—I remember your saying that. The former part of your statement I do not remember.

5509. Do you remember issuing a placard immediately afterwards?—I remember issuing a placard with the statement that you were as much in favour of the Acts as any man in England.

5510. But failing to mention that I was altogether neutral upon the subject?—I do not see how a man can be in favour of a thing and also neutral.

5511. Are you not aware that there are many members of a Government who are frequently obliged, on minor points, to keep their opinions to themselves, when they agree with the Government on general questions?—They keep their acts, I presume, within the bounds of party allegiance, but their views on those questions may be public property.

5512. But does it not happen every day that members of a Government are obliged to give up their own opinions on minor matters, in order to adopt the general views of the Government; is not that within your experience?—That is within my experience very recently.

5513. But you do not remember my having told you that I was neutral?—That I do not remember.

5514. You remember Mr. Galbraith very well?—I know Mr. Galbraith.

5515. He was then the Independent minister at Whitehaven?—He was.

5516. Do you recollect what he said at that interview?—I do not.

5517. He said that his main objection to the Acts was, that they were an attempt on the part of man to abrogate a penalty which it had pleased God to inflict upon vice; do you recollect that?—He might have said so; but I cannot charge my memory with what he said.

5518. Is that one of your objections to the Acts?—That does not state my view. I may state my view in one sentence, it is this: that I object to the Government giving guarantees beforehand, that men shall be safe from the penalties of vice.

5519. I understand you to say, that you do not agree with the view then put forward by Mr. Galbraith?—If Mr. Galbraith meant by that, that we ought not to interfere with a disease which has been incurred by evil-doing, I do not agree with him.

5520. You visited Whitehaven again just a year ago, did you not?—I did.

5521. And then you delivered a lecture called "One of the Rotten Spots of English Life"?—I did.

5522. And according to the report which appears in the "Whitehaven Free Press" of 7th May 1881 (which you have already admitted in a letter to me to be correct), you express yourself to this effect: "Those men, that is to say, the officials, whoever they might be." I suppose you meant by that the Contagious Diseases Acts' policemen?—I meant by that the policemen.

5523. "Those men had at their mercy females of all kinds, and their cowardly and brutal conduct made it absolutely dangerous for a decent woman in a place like Aldershot to answer any question put by a soldier, be it ever so proper." I need not trouble you with what was said to Inspector Anniss, because he does not live at Aldershot; but my honourable friend, the Member for West Aberdeenshire, in my absence from the Committee, at Question 4755 of last year's evidence, asked Dr. Barr this: "Has your attention been called to a lecture lately delivered at Whitehaven by the Rev. J. P. Gledstone, who is the agent or representative of the Northern Counties League for Abolishing the State Regulation of Vice?"—It is wrong to describe me as an agent of that league, because I am not an agent of that league.

5524. You would be the representative, I suppose?—I was simply there on that occasion lecturing for the league, but I am not an agent of the league.

5525. You are described on the 18th of December in the "Whitehaven Guardian" as "the Rev. J. P. Gledstone, an agitator for the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts," I suppose you do not consider yourself an agitator?—It does not trouble me how they describe me.

5526. Are you a representative of the Northern Counties' League?—No, I have no official connection with the Northern Counties' League.

5527. Then my honourable friend addressed this question to Dr. Barr: "So far as your experience of the Acts and knowledge of their working go, is there any foundation of truth for that observation?" (that is as to the alleged cowardly and brutal conduct of the police.) And his answer was, "It is a most untrue observation; virtuous women, whether speaking to soldiers or not, are protected by the metropolitan police. The metropolitan police know well the difference between a prostitute and a virtuous woman, and if they interfered at all it would be in a case of bad behaviour on the part of the soldier, or anyone else. I say that the presence of the police under these Acts is a protection to virtuous women. Virtuous women come to them for advice and information; it is only prostitutes they have to deal with, not virtuous women, in their official duties, and they could not make a mistake like that insinuated." Having heard what Dr. Barr said in answer to my honourable friend, I should be glad if you could place before the

the Committee any instances, within your knowledge, in which the Contagious Diseases Acts' police have been guilty of any such acts as those referred to in your lecture at Whitehaven?—I rest that statement first of all upon the report of Captain Harris for 1873, on page 6, paragraph 5, where he says, "The presence too of the officers employed is well known to the class of girls most likely to go astray, and the dread of detection is very salutary. In proof of this, young women in the position of domestic servants and others after nightfall leave their male acquaintances directly the police employed under the Acts appear in sight." I wish to go on with my further vindication of the ground upon which I made that statement, which would be this—I have read the statement which was issued by Mr. Frederic Wheeler, of Rochester, with regard to a case which occurred on the 30th of November 1875. I believe that case has been before this Committee.

5528. Is that the celebrated Wybrow case?—That is the Caroline Wybrow case. Then further, I have had in my mind a case which was brought under my attention by an old Wesleyan minister, the Rev. George Barnley, whom I met at Keighley. He reported this case at a meeting there, and I asked him to be good enough to send me a letter giving the details of it. I have the letter here. It would come under the rule of evidence that you have already laid down. The girl concerned became a servant in his employment; I refer to that. Then, as a further vindication of my assertion with regard to the police, I shall now feel myself at liberty to use a case which was brought before the Dover magistrates last Friday, when I was sitting in this chair as a witness; and I should like, if it be permissible, to read a few sentences from the evidence given with regard to this case, inasmuch as they so completely bear out what I have said with regard to the police.

5529. This is a tremendous charge against a very respectable body of men, and I think no man has a right to make such a charge, unless he brings direct evidence in its support; and I ask you now, what is the evidence upon which you venture to make this statement that the Contagious Diseases Acts' police have been guilty of cowardly and brutal conduct, making it absolutely dangerous for a decent woman in a place like Aldershot to answer any question put by a soldier. I ask you to give me and the Committee the evidence in full, and the grounds upon which you make that statement?—I make that statement upon Captain Harris's report, which I have already read, and I recapitulate the instances which I have already referred to.

5530. Those instances are an extract from Captain Harris's report, and Caroline Wybrow's case?—Yes, and the experience of a servant of a friend of mine, and the case of a servant who was in the employment of a Wesleyan minister.

5531. Are you aware that Caroline Wybrow's case is a disputed case?—I should think there never was any case that was not disputed yet; but the disputing of it does not invalidate it.

5532. Are you aware that it is not yet closed before this Committee?—I understood that it was closed.

0.75.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

5533. Are you under the impression that it is closed?—I was under the impression that the case was established.

5534. I understand that those are all the cases which you can mention now as justifying the statement concerning the cowardly and brutal conduct of the police?—I regard those as an ample justification of the statement.

5535. They are the only ones you have?—The only ones; I do not think it is necessary that I should add case to case.

Mr. Hopwood.

5536. Do you know Mrs. Percy's case?—I do.

5537. Would you wish to mention that case?—No, because I feel that the cases I have enumerated are sufficient to substantiate what I said in public. Nothing can be more general than the statement of Captain Harris himself.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

5538. Subsequently to this lecture delivered by you at Whitehaven, and in reply to a letter signed M. S., but signed by the writer's real name in another newspaper, written by a Mr. Mivast, you, speaking of the events that have happened since, what you call the yellow document of 1871 (that is the Report of the Royal Commission), and referring to the events subsequent to that Report, write: "I say notwithstanding this yellow old document of 1871, upon personal investigation made by me in some subjected places, that poor women are not free from molestation by the police." Does that represent actually what you wrote?—That is a letter signed by myself, written on 6th June.

5539. Will you kindly tell the Committee what were the subjected places where you made this personal investigation?—The term here "places" is too general. I ought to have only referred to a place; but the thing in my mind was that I had been to several places, and that at one of them, the case of this servant was brought under my notice, the case of the servant in my friend's employment; and I regard that as symptomatic of a decided feeling of distrust on the part of the poor women.

5540. Does this statement written by you refer to any other cases than those you have already mentioned to the Committee?—So far as my experience goes, it did not.

5541. Further down in the same letter you write: "Leaving the police, and going to the doctors, it is their appointment that rests with the War or Admiralty Office, and so they are practically the women's gaolers when they are sent to the hospitals, we have another count against the Acts." Will you kindly explain what you mean by that?—I think those doctors have too much power over these women when they are in hospital as to the time they shall be confined there.

5542. But do you think the doctors in any way abuse their powers?—I do not know of instances, but I object to their having the possibility of doing so in their hands.

5543. I understand that you have a general objection, but that you have no instances in which they have abused their power?—No, I have no instances: I should hold this objection simply with the Acts in my hand. There is one point which I feel, as Mr. Cavendish Bentinck has brought this Whitehaven matter up, should be set thoroughly right, inasmuch as correspondence has passed in the newspapers, and it was said that I was challenged to appear before this Committee. I was not challenged to appear before this Committee. When my name was mentioned Mr. Stansfeld said he would call me. In Mr. Cavendish Bentinck's examination of Mr. Shaen before this Committee, if I remember rightly, he says, "That I made my speech at Whitehaven rest almost entirely upon charges of brutality and cowardice on the part of the police;" I wish to deny that most distinctly to-day.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

Mr. Hopwood.

5544. Upon what ground did you make your charges beside that of brutality?—If I said charges against the police, I meant charges against the Acts. Mr. Cavendish Bentinck said that my case against the Acts was made to rest on charges against the police of brutal and cowardly conduct. That I wish to deny.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

5545. I am the last man in the world to wish to misrepresent you or anybody else?—I am quite sure of that.

Mr. Hopwood.

5546. Your attention was called to a regulation about the admission of ministers to the hospitals; I think the doctors' leave, and a formal application and so on is necessary, is it not?—I understand it to be necessary.

5547. Do you know of any instance of a Dissenting minister applying for admission and being refused?—I never heard of any one applying, and so I have never heard of any one being refused.

5548. But at all events, as far as we know, an Established Church clergyman is the minister at the hospital?—As far as we know.

5549. We are not to assume that all these unhappy women are Church women to a certainty?—I should doubt very much poor creatures what church they belong to; I should not like to separate them.

5550. On the discharge from any other hospital a woman is free; but when she leaves this examination room she is not free, I think?—She is not free when she leaves the examination room.

5551. In fact, when she goes away, it is contemplated that she is going to resume her trade?—That is the understanding upon which she goes.

5552. In fact, she is licensed to do so?—She is licensed to do so. With regard to visiting hospitals, since I gave my evidence last week, I have remembered a case, which I feel justifies me in the hesitation I then expressed with regard to the efficiency of the religious teaching in these hospitals. I doubted whether there was free access offered to persons to go, or whether that access, if obtained, was worth much; and after appearing before the Committee, I remembered distinctly the case of a lady who attended one of these hospitals to speak to the poor women there; but she was put either in a corner of a large room, or in a room by herself; my impression is that it was in a room by herself. The girls were told that she was there, and that if any of them wished to see her and speak with her on religious matters, they could go to her. She felt that this arrangement was altogether so useless that she gave up attending the hospital.

5553. That is an instance that has occurred within your knowledge of some one being, at all events, by the facts discouraged, from going on bringing reclamation as it were to these girls from outside?—It is.

5554. You were asked some questions about the voluntary submission, and the length of time for which it is given. Perhaps I might refer you to Mr. Anniss' evidence upon that point. At Question 4147 of the evidence of 1881, he is asked: "What is your general rule?" and he says, "In the case of young girls, where there is a likelihood of their discontinuing the mode of life, I get them signed for one, two, or three months. In the case of a woman who has been in hospital, or is known to be an old prostitute outside the district, I get them signed for 12 months. But I would like to show that in every case a woman, as I said just now, is told before she leaves the room, if she is found free from disease, that she will be exempt from that examination if she discontinues her mode of life, prostitution." Does that case, to your mind, show that here is a policeman who is entrusted with the discretion of enrolling women for two, three, four, five, or 12 months at his pleasure?—It seems to me that he has too much power over the future lives of these girls in the way of suggesting for what length of time they should be upon the register.

5555. I think you were asked some questions about Mr. Bompas' opposition, were you not?—The Judge Advocate General referred to the opposition which Mr. Bompas had offered before the Congregational Union.

5556. That is at Question 4565. "Did not Mr. Bompas oppose it?—(A.) Mr. Bompas opposed it, but Mr. Bompas' standing in the Union might have been questioned, though we did not question it. Mr. Bompas really is a Baptist, and not an Independent; it was, I think, a mere matter of courtesy that he was allowed to speak, or to vote, on that occasion." Did Mr. Bompas' speech show to your mind that it was founded on incorrect information and hearsay?—It did. I thought that Mr. Bompas made a very reckless and a very baseless assertion to the meeting.

5557. He said this: "Many of you do not live in the seaports; but go to any one of the protected places, and you will find that the majority of the Christian ministers of all denominations will say that that is true?" Now, I have canvassed all the ministers of my denomination thoroughly, and I have letters in reply, and I say that the statement advanced by Mr. Bompas upon that occasion, so far as my denomination is concerned, is totally without foundation.

5558. Perhaps you heard him make another statement, that there were only five prostitutes in Winchester?—I heard him make that statement.

5559. And perhaps you know that by Captain Harris' return 12 are shown?—I referred to Captain

5 May 1882.]

Rev. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

Captain Harris' return, and I found that it was mere hearsay on the part of Mr. Bompas to give this statement; but such statements I find have very great weight, coming from such men. It was mere hearsay evidence. I turned to Captain Harris' report, and I found that from the beginning of the operation of the Acts down to the year 1880, the number of prostitutes at Winchester had never been less than 10, which is double the number that Mr. Bompas had given; and in the year 1880, the last year that there is any return for, the number was 12.

5560. I think, in Captain Harris' return for 1880, page 17, on the 31st of December 1880, you will find 12 is the number recorded?—There are 12; that would be the last official return made.

5561. Then you were asked about your knowledge of the vice existing at Southampton as compared with unsubjected places, and you were asked, at Question 4612, to express the opinion of persons in whom you could place implicit confidence, and which led you to believe that the population of Southampton is more vicious than that of any town of the same size, say Birmingham or Manchester, or Bradford, where the Acts are not in operation. Your answer is "From statements made to me by respectable people in Southampton, I should believe that the condition of young people in Southampton is worse with regard to this particular vice than in a town like Birmingham or Bradford, or those northern towns." Can you illustrate that by any evidence or opinions that you have since obtained?—I should like to draw attention to the following Question, 4613, because the question framed there is in more precise and particular terms, and I feel that the answer which I gave to it was not so precise and particular as it ought to have been; it is too general.

5562. At Question 4613 you were asked the following question: "Have you any means of comparing a seaport town like Hull, for instance, where the Acts are not in operation, and Southampton where they are in operation; could you give us any data within your own knowledge which lead you to the conclusion that the population of Southampton, and particularly the youthful male population, is more vicious than that of Hull, or is it mere surmise?" and your answer is: "I have never lived in Hull; but comparing other towns in which I have lived, and as to which I can speak from my own observation, with Southampton, judging from the statements made to me by people in Southampton, I should say that there was more juvenile wrongdoing in Southampton than in the other towns?"—That reply, I feel, was too general in this respect, that inasmuch as the question contains this clause, "particularly the youthful male population," my information referred more particularly to the girls in Southampton. From the condition of the girls I infer that the condition of the boys is also very bad. I had also the general testimony of two respectable gentlemen, who have long lived in Southampton, with regard to the boys; but, inasmuch as I did not ask them particularly on that point, I have felt that that answer was too wide. In consequence of that I went to Southampton yesterday to make 0.75.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

further inquiries, and I was there introduced to a gentleman who knows the town thoroughly well, and who has also lived in districts not under the Acts; and he tells me that as compared with such a town as Hull, near which he was born, the condition is not one of comparison, but of contrast as regards the morality of the youth of both sexes.

5563. To the disadvantage or to the advantage of Southampton?—To the disadvantage of Southampton.

Chairman.

5564. That is from his own experience?—From his own experience.

Mr. Hopwood.

5565. Have you the petition presented by the inhabitants of Southampton as to young girls?—I have a copy here of a petition which was presented in July 1879 to the House. The number of the petition is 12,047. It refers to this question of the number of girls in Southampton.

5566. If there is any short paragraph that you could read that expresses it, perhaps you will do so?—It is a petition of ministers of religion and others resident in the town and neighbourhood of Southampton, and it shows: "That your petitioners reside in the town and neighbourhood of Southampton, which is subjected to the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts relating to women, and are well acquainted with the district. That your petitioners have had their attention called to the yearly report of the Contagious Diseases Acts' police, and amongst other things, to the following figures: that in Southampton, which has a population of nearly 54,000 persons, there were in the year ending 31st of December 1876, only one common woman under 18 years of age, and only four between the ages of 18 and 19, and that in December 1877 there were only two such women under 17 years of age, and six between the ages of 17 and 18; and that at the close of 1877 there were only 98 such women of all ages under and over 31 years of age. Your petitioners are shocked to find that these absolutely unreliable statements have been placed before Parliament year by year in an official return on the operation of the Acts bearing the signature of Captain Harris. If it had been stated to your honourable House in the aforesaid return that for humane and prudential reasons the police refrained from putting juvenile prostitutes on the register and submitting them to the demoralising effects of the Acts, your petitioners would have no reason to complain. But they observe that the object of the figures referred to is to lead your honourable House and the country at large to believe that juvenile vice is being stamped out by these Acts."

5567. That contests the accuracy of the figures given under Captain Harris' report, and treats them as grossly incorrect I may say?—Grossly incorrect. That petition is signed by several Non-conformist ministers, and I notice the name of one clergyman at least upon it, and of several magistrates.

5568. Is one of them Mr. W. B. Randall, J.P., the Chairman of the School Board?—One of them is.

5569. And another is Mr. W. C. Westlake, H H 4 J. P.,

5 May 1882.]

Rev. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

J.P., and a number of others, I believe, respectable by position?—Yes, Major General Tryon signed it, and Mr. Edwin Hearne, J.P., and John T. Tucker, J.P.

5570. You were considerably pressed by some questions in regard to how you would supply the deficiency if the Government subvention to Lock Hospitals was to cease, say to-morrow, or within a few months from now. In the first place, is it necessary that things should be done so violently; might it not begin by putting an end to the compulsory examination, for instance?—I have not gone into the various steps by which it might be brought about; but it seems to me that the alternative presented to us is a very extreme one.

5571. You were asked about the number of beds that were open to people afflicted with these maladies; do you at all accept the statement made to you and which you are asked to take as a true hypothesis?—Not the statement of Mr. Lowndes; for I read one of his pamphlets a few years ago in favour of the extension of the Acts, I think to Liverpool, and I found so many errors in that pamphlet, that I should take anything he said with very great caution.

5572. Is it a fact that he is a very strong partisan on the other side?—He is a very strong partisan on the other side.

5573. I think one of the questions put to you assumed that if the Government hospitals were closed to-morrow, or if the Government subvention to the hospitals was withdrawn, it would close 664 beds, and therefore shut out 664 poor women who are in need of surgical treatment. From Captain Harris' return does it appear that there were only 242 women in hospital on the 31st of December 1880?—Two hundred and forty-two.

5574. That is a large deduction from the supposed 664 with which you are pressed in the question, is it not?—Yes, it is 420 less.

5575. It was also suggested to you that there were above 450 beds in the United Kingdom available for this purpose; are you aware that it has been stated before us, in the evidence of Mr. Lane last year, at Question 2666, that there are 200 beds in London alone; he is asked "What other accommodation is there in London for that class of disease?" and he says: "I cannot speak very positively as to that; but I believe they have a ward at St. Bartholomew's Hospital and at St. Thomas' Hospital; but the accommodation is very limited indeed. I should think that 200 beds in the whole of London would comprise it all; but I cannot speak positively as to that." There you see that so very high an authority as Mr. Lane puts the number as at least 200, and he will not positively say that there are not more?—Yes.

5576. You have been asked about the treatment enjoined upon the surgeons by the confidential instructions; are you aware that those confidential instructions are in no way part of the Act, or prescribed by the Act?—I know that they are not; they are instructions issued by the departments that have the working of the Acts, and the instructions might be altered at any time at their pleasure.

5577. Do you think that that is a satisfactory state of things in a matter affecting the liberty of the people?—I think it is very unsatisfactory; and so far as it is written, and published to the country, the instructions that might be under the eye of the country to-day might be altered to-morrow.

Chairman.

5578. Do you mean to say that the confidential instructions might be altered?—The confidential instructions might be altered to-morrow, and the country might be misled by the published ones that are abroad.

Mr. Hopwood.

5579. As to the suggestion that under these confidential instructions, by Section 9 of the Act of 1869, the surgeon may, on satisfactory evidence, release a woman from the register, you were asked whether you could suggest anything easier by which she could be got off the register; as I understand your reply is that she should not be on the register to begin with?—Quite so.

5580. But you will observe that by these confidential instructions the surgeon is to do this on satisfactory evidence; does not that to your mind give him a very large extension of power?—It does; and I feel that the surgeons and the police have far too much power over these women; in fact, they have power that they ought not to have at all, not a vestige of it.

5581. Perhaps you are aware that we have it in evidence before us that in Wybrow's case the girl was subjected to punishment and to tea diet at the will of the surgeon?—I understand that she was.

5582. And that he has, in fact, been reprimanded for doing so, and the reprimand is printed in our Papers?—That I was not aware of.

5583. In Mr. Ralph Thompson's letter to the medical officer in charge of the Lock Hospital, dated the 5th of July 1876, he says: "It appears from your report that on one day you ordered this girl to be placed on tea diet on account of her unruly and defiant conduct towards you. Although as explained by you this may have been a lenient form of punishment, I am to point out that the Contagious Diseases Acts give medical officers no power of punishment for offences in hospital, and that your action was therefore irregular." That is a reprimand, is it not?—It is a reprimand, and a very severe one.

5584. Does not the fact of that being done by a surgeon, a gentleman of education, show you the danger of entrusting these powers to any man over any man or woman?—It does.

5585. With regard to the question of a woman applying for her discharge to the surgeon who may on satisfactory evidence, if he pleases, dismiss her, it is pointed out here, that under the 25th Section of the same Act, if any woman detained in any hospital considers herself entitled to be discharged, and the medical officer refuses to discharge her, she may be conveyed before a justice; that is to say, she has an appeal to a justice. That is still multiplying the difficulties, is it not?—It is increasing the difficulties, as I said in my evidence a week ago.

5586. You

5 May 1882.]

Rev. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

5586. You have been asked with regard to an answer which you gave on a former occasion at 4431, as to your opinion in regard to the impression of legal and Government sanction to prostitution entertained by the prostitute class itself; have you partly derived that opinion from the evidence given before the Royal Commission?—Yes.

5587. Women describing themselves as Queen's women or Government women?—Queen's women and Government women.

5588. Is not that to your mind an inevitable result of a system like this?—The inevitable result.

5589. Then you were asked, in 4485, as to whether you had seen Colonel Tucker's letter about some regiment in Dublin; perhaps you may be aware from the evidence before us that some regiments have an immoral pre-eminence over others for the amount of sexual vice that is disclosed by the state of disease amongst them?—I am aware of that.

5590. And before deciding upon the merits of Colonel Tucker's letter, perhaps you would like to know whether that gentleman himself is particularly cautious and correct in his figures, and whether his agents who supply those figures are particularly cautious and correct?—I should not accept the letter except on substantial ground.

5591. With regard to the question of subscriptions for hospitals being small or otherwise, apart from the objection to contribute to a hospital which is exclusively devoted to these diseases, are you not aware that while a matter of this sort is being subsidised by the Government independent action is very likely to be paralysed for the time?—When the work is being done by the Government there is no inducement to the public to do it.

5592. You were asked about Mr. Galbraith's opinion as to abrogating a penalty sent by God; do you think that Mr. Galbraith ever expressed himself in these precise words, so far as your knowledge of him is concerned?—My knowledge of him would not justify me in saying whether he was likely to use language like that or not. I am not familiar with his phraseology, though I should know the tone of his voice anywhere if I heard it. I should like it to be made clear to the Committee that with regard to Question 4613, upon which I spoke too generally last week, upon the information that I obtained yesterday, I now abide by that answer in its widest and most general terms.

Tuesday, 9th May 1882.

MEMBERS PRESENT :

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.
Dr. Cameron.
Colonel Digby.
Dr. Farquharson.
Mr. Hopwood.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.
Mr. O'Shaughnessy.
Mr. Stansfeld.
Colonel Tottenham.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, IN THE CHAIR.

MR. WILLIAM FERGUSON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5593. You reside at Kinnundie, Aberdeenshire, do you not?—I do.

5594. Are you a deputy lieutenant and a justice of the peace of that county?—I am.

5595. You are a member, and an elder, I believe, of the Free Church of Scotland?—I am.

5596. Are you the convener or chairman of the Assembly's Committee on the subject of the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I am.

5597. You have not, I am afraid, had an opportunity of reading the evidence given by the Rev. Mr. Gledstone the other day, before this Committee?—I have not.

5598. Under these circumstances I have no choice but to ask you some questions which, otherwise, I might have avoided. You have read the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I have.

5599. Do you understand those Acts to provide for the registration of all known common prostitutes, either by voluntary submission or by magistrate's order, and for their periodical examination by the medical officers appointed under the Acts?—Yes.

5600. You understand the object of such examination to be to discover whether each woman is, or is not, venereally diseased, and if she is free from disease she is allowed to depart, and to resume her course of prostitution; but if she is found to be diseased she is sent into hospital and compulsorily detained there, if necessary, for a period of nine months, until she is cured or discharged as incurable?—Yes.

5601. Do you consider such legislation absolutely and wholly immoral?—I do.

5602. And is that the opinion of the great majority of the religious body to which you belong?—It is.

5603. That body is the Free Church of Scotland?—It is.

5604. Does it comprise about 1,000 congregations?—It does.

5605. Is it part of the view entertained by yourself and by the Free Church of Scotland that such legislation practically recognises the fact of prostitution by each individual woman?—It is.

5606. And that it assumes, either by the form of voluntary submission, or by the magistrate's order, the continuance of such women in prostitution for some definite period not exceeding 12 months?—It does.

5607. Has your attention been called to Inspector Annis's evidence as to the length of time for which the voluntary submission is taken?—I think not.

5608. Inspector Annis, as you are probably aware, is the inspector under the Contagious Diseases Acts at Devonport; and in the course of his evidence last year, at Question 4146, I put this question to him: "The form in the Act has a blank for the number of calendar months, and you fill up that number?" and his answer was, "Yes, to any extent not exceeding 12 months." Then my next question was, "What is your general rule?" to which he made the following reply: "In the case of young girls, where there is a likelihood of their discontinuing the mode of life, I get them signed for one, two, or three months. In the case of a woman who has been in hospital, or is known to be an old prostitute outside the district, I get them signed for 12 months. But I would like to show that in every case, a woman, as I said just now, is told before she leaves the room, if she is found free from disease, that she will be exempt from that examination if she discontinues her mode of life, prostitution." Do you not gather from those questions and answers which I have just read, that under the voluntary submission the woman signs for some specific period of time, varying, it may be, from one to 12 months?—Yes.

5609. During that period it is assumed that she is to continue her life of prostitution?—I presume so.

5611. You are aware, are you not, that this license (if it be fairly regarded as a license) is renewed

9 May 1882.]

Mr. FERGUSON.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

renewed on each dismissal of the woman after she has been examined and found free from disease?—I believe it is.

5612. You have, I believe, paid some attention to the returns known as Captain Harris's returns?—I have had my attention called to them.

5613. Have you there Captain Harris's return, No. 1, for the year 1880?—I have.

5614. What do you find to be the total number of cases in which the women have been examined during the operation of the Acts up to the end of the year 1880?—504,607.

5615. In how many cases were the women found free from disease?—In 457,242 cases.

5616. Therefore, in those cases it follows, from the evidence which you have already given, that they were dismissed to continue, if they chose, their sinful vocation?—I presume that was the result.

5617. The difference between those numbers is 47,365, is it not?—Yes.

5618. That is about one-tenth of the whole number?—Yes.

5619. In those cases the women were found diseased, were they not?—Yes, and admitted into hospital.

5620. Does it not follow from these figures that, in about nine out of ten cases, the examinations were made for the sole and absolutely immoral purpose of ascertaining that the woman was physically fit for the exercise of her calling?—That is the inference that I deduce from those figures.

5623. In the case of the prostitute the examination made by Government officers is, in nine cases out of ten, to ascertain that she is fit for the pursuit of an immoral calling?—Yes.

5624. And the evidence of her consenting will, if there had been a voluntary submission at all, is a voluntary submission made at some previous time for a stated period before the expiration of which her will may have ceased to be consenting to the transaction?—Of course it may.

5625. Would you say, as a man somewhat familiar with law, that that is not consistent with your notion of law?—I think it is very inconsistent.

5626. Does it appear to you, as a man accustomed to public affairs, and somewhat to legal matters, that the very legislative idea which has found incorporation in these Acts, of obtaining a written voluntary submission for a certain number of months, which may be 12, even 0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

if the submission was obtained upon a perfect understanding at the time and with a real assent of the will, is an abuse of legislation?—I think it is.

5627. Is it your opinion that a submission of that kind ought to cease to have effect the moment that the will changes?—I think it ought.

5628. And it is anomalous and inconsistent, in your opinion, from the jurist's point of view, that persons should be bound by a so-called voluntary submission, even after the will may have changed?—I think it most unjust.

5629. You regard the system as being in the main established for the purpose of enabling certain classes of men to gratify their lusts in the belief that they can do so without any evil physical consequence?—That is the avowed purpose of the Acts, to make the indulgence of lust safe to certain classes of men.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5630. Where do you find that avowed purpose expressed in the Acts?—I am quoting almost word for word from the Report of the Royal Commission.

5631. Then it is not in the Acts themselves, although you said that it was the avowed purpose of the Acts?—I qualified that by saying "as explained by the Royal Commission."

5632. Can you refer us to the passage in the Report of the Royal Commission?—I have not it in my memory, but it is very near the beginning of the Report.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5633. Will you read paragraph 13 of the Report of the Royal Commission?—"This recommendation, as we have mentioned, was immediately adopted by Parliament at the instance of the Government. The Act of 1864 was repealed, its principal provisions being re-enacted in an amended form. A main feature of the new Bill was the introduction of the system of periodical examination. This effected a material change in the law. The Act of 1864 provided, though not completely, for the separation from the community of women in a condition to spread contagious disease. But the Act of 1866 went farther" (and this is what I was referring to). "It not only recognised prostitutes as agents in the propagation of the disease, but sought so far to control their conduct as to render the practice of prostitution, if not absolutely innocuous, at least much less dangerous. It is perhaps not surprising that such legislation should have given rise to serious misapprehensions of the objects and intentions of Parliament."

5634. I do not understand you to be intending to assail the objects and intentions of Parliament, but to be expressing an opinion upon the probable influence and effect of an act of legislation?—Quite so.

Chairman.

5635. Did I correctly understand you to say, in a previous part of your evidence, that this facilitation of prostitution was the avowed purpose of the Acts?—Perhaps I used rather a strong expression, but I had in my mind this quotation, which I have just read to the Committee,

9 May 1882.]

MR. FERGUSON.

Chairman—continued.

mittee, that the Acts recognised prostitutes, and sought to control their conduct for the purpose of rendering their vocation less dangerous. Therefore the natural conclusion is that that was the purpose of the Acts.

5636. But, as I understand now, you would hardly wish to apply the word "avowed"?—No, I should withdraw that word.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5637. You would prefer, perhaps, to use the word "result"?—Yes, that is a more proper word. I do not mean to attribute to Parliament, who passed these Acts, any desire of attaining such a result, because I believe that if Parliament had known what the Acts were they would probably not have passed them in such a hurry.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5638. You believe that the moral effects of such enactments on the minds of men, and especially upon the minds of youth, would be such as to lead to increased sexual indulgence, and to indulgence at an earlier age?—I think that would be very much the effect of them.

5639. Does a system of this kind, in your view, give a kind of State and legal sanction to the practice of sexual vice if it be conducted under conditions which are supposed to avoid, or prevent, the physical evils which are the consequences of that vice?—It does.

5640. Is it your view that this legislation is demoralising in this way, that instead of endeavouring either to suppress or even to check or diminish sexual vice, it facilitates and regulates it, and holds out inducements to its practice?—Yes.

5641. The inducement being the idea, be it illusory or not, that fornication can be practised with a very much reduced risk of the consequent disease in districts where the Contagious Diseases Acts are in force?—That is the feeling, no doubt.

5642. You are aware that the preamble of the Act of 1864 expressed its object to be to prevent the spread of venereal disease, the words being, "Whereas it is expedient to make provisions to prevent the spread of certain contagious diseases in the places to which these Acts apply"; and then came the Act of 1866, which extended and strengthened the Act of 1864?—Yes; and it explained what the contagious diseases were.

5643. Venereal disease is the result of the sexual contact of two persons of different sexes; does it appear to you that if the object of these Acts be to prevent the spread of venereal disease, it is either logical or practical to apply the measures which the Act applies to one sex only?—Certainly; it is most illogical and very unpracticable.

5644. But if the object be simply to facilitate the practice of sexual vice upon the part of men in these districts, and to give them either a real or a fancied security, then you would recognise the logical and practical character of these Acts?—No, I could hardly recognise that; they are practical in that way, because I do not think that the Acts applied to one party alone can possibly prevent disease if it is not applied to the other party.

5645. Therefore, even assuming the object to be simply the protection of men desirous of indulging in sensual vice, you would still say that the Acts were, on the face of them, absurd, because the method that they took was impossible of success?—Yes, I would say so.

5646. It is your opinion that a system of this kind must be demoralising to the entire community of both sexes, and especially to the young?—I think there can be no question of that.

5647. Can you give us any evidence which has come within your own observation, or experience, of the existence of these Acts having produced that effect upon the minds of young men?—I have heard young men express a wish that they were applicable all over the country. I have heard that desire expressed in Edinburgh by young men.

5648. Have you heard it frequently expressed?—Not very frequently, because I avoid, as a general rule, conversing about these Acts with young men; but I have heard it more than once.

5649. Have you heard it so often expressed as to lead you to believe that those cases were not exceptions?—I think they were not exceptional.

5650. Were those opinions expressed by civilians?—Yes.

5651. By the ordinary young men that you would meet in civil society?—Yes.

5652. And in their opinion they are disposed to approve of the Acts on the theory that they would enable them to consort with prostitutes without danger of disease, and upon the same ground they very logically advocated their extension to the country at large?—They did.

5654. Are those views confirmed in your mind by the fact that in the Contagious Diseases Acts there are no provisions whatsoever tending to a reduction of the number of brothels?—Yes.

5655. You are aware, are you not, that there is one section, the 36th section of the Act of 1866, under which a brothel-keeper is under certain circumstances subject to a penalty?—There is such a clause.

5656. Under what circumstances is he liable to a penalty under that clause?—If any person being the owner or occupier of any house, room, or place within the limits of any place to which the Act applies, or being a manager or assistant in the management thereof, induces or suffers any woman affected with a contagious disease to resort to or be in his house for the purpose of prostitution, then he is liable to a penalty not exceeding 20*l.*, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months.

5657. Are you aware that there is no other section in any of these Acts of a penal nature affecting

9 May 1882.]

Mr. FERGUSON.

affecting a brothel keeper?—I have not been able to find any other.

5658. You are aware, are you not, that these brothels are regularly, and in fact almost daily, visited by the Contagious Diseases Acts, police?—I take that from the evidence of the police which I have seen; I do not know personally.

5659. In your opinion can there be any doubt that that daily supervision for the purpose of looking after the health of the inmates, and the fact that this section is the only section of a penal character regarding their business must operate to make it in the minds of the brothel keepers, and of all persons associated with them, a business sanctioned by law and by Government supervision?—I think that must be the practical result. That is my inference; I have not heard it from any brothel keeper; but I have seen it stated in evidence, and I give you what is the result of my own judgment on the matter.

5660. I put it to you in this way, whether you do not consider that legislation and administration of this character is calculated to produce such an effect upon the mind?—It is.

5661. Do you not think that it is not only calculated to produce that effect upon the minds of the persons most nearly interested, but that it is also calculated, although possibly in a less degree, to exercise a similar influence upon the minds of the community at large?—I think it is.

5662. You, therefore, consider these Acts as calculated to operate immorally from an educational point of view, upon the population; and you tell us that you have had evidence within your own experience of their effect upon the minds of young men?—Yes.

5662*. You know, do you not, that religious instruction is provided in the hospitals which are instituted under these Acts for the inmates?—I know it from published statements.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5663. It is in the Act, is it not?—It is in the Act, and it is also in evidence that has been given.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5664. Are you also aware that in all hospitals and institutions of that kind such ministrations and instruction are provided?—Always, I believe; I know of no exceptions.

5665. Would you not expect their influence to be more felt, and to be productive of better results in voluntary hospitals than in Government hospitals where the patients are compulsorily detained?—I certainly would.

5666. You are aware, are you not, from Captain Harris's Return, to which you have already referred, that of the total number of 47,365 cases in the Government hospitals no less than 40,959, or 86 per cent., are known to have returned direct from hospital to the practice of their calling?—That is in this report.

5667. I would ask you to consider this incident in connection with some other figures of Captain Harris, regarding the ages of prostitutes in Return No. 2. There are one or two questions put by the Judge Advocate General to the Rev. Mr. Gledstone, which I will read to you, beginning with Question 4584: “(Q.) Perhaps you will take it from me that there was evidence to show that the Acts operated as a deterrent, particularly in the case of the younger and less hardened women, and consequently, that they were in the subjected districts deterred from entering upon a life of vice; assuming that to be so, would not that in itself account for the fact stated in Captain Harris's Return, that the prostitutes in the subjected districts are older, as a general rule, than the prostitutes in the unsubjected districts?—(A.) I should require that assumption to be substantiated by figures; it is a matter of fact. (Q.) But assuming that there are fewer young girls who enter upon a career of prostitution in the subjected districts, that of itself would, of course, account for the fact that the age of the prostitutes in the subjected districts was higher than in the unsubjected districts?—(A.) I should say that it was an assumption with all the assumptions against it. (Q.) But I have not asked you that question; I have asked you whether, assuming that that was so, it would not of itself account for the fact that the women who practise prostitution in the subjected districts are older than those in the unsubjected districts?—(A.) That would account for it.” If Captain Harris's return gave the average of the ages of registered prostitutes in the subjected districts, then a reduction in the number of the very young prostitutes would affect that average age?—It would.
0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

5668. You have before you, have you not, Captain Harris's return?—I have.

5669. And Captain Harris's return gives, does it not, the number of registered prostitutes of from 12 to 13 years of age, and then for every year up to the age of 21, and then there are three periods of five years, 21 and under 26, 26 and under 31, and 31 and over?—Yes.

5670. Now, a reduction of the numbers of the young prostitutes, say under 15 or 16 years of age, would affect the average age if an average were taken out; but there is no average age taken out in this return, is there?—There is no average age.

5671. But what we find is this, is it not, that when you come especially to the older periods, you have an increase in the numbers of women of a particular age?—You have.

5672. A reduction of the number of juvenile prostitutes has no bearing whatever upon the fact of the increase of those of a particular and greater age?—I do not think it has.

5673. Take the 12th column; do you not find that in the year 1866 there were only 99 registered prostitutes of the age of 31 and over?—Ninety-nine.

5674. And do you find an almost uninterrupted increase until, in the year 1880, you find that the number of such women is 398?—That is the number.

5675. And that increase in the number of that age is contemporary with a decrease in the total number of registered prostitutes, comparing the later with the earlier dates?—A very large decrease.

5676. Do not those figures in the 12th column satisfy your mind that, whether by inducement or compulsion, or by both combined, the effect of the Acts has been to keep women to a greater
I 13 age

age in the practice of that immoral profession?—I think that is the inference.

5677. The only escape from that inference would be this, would it not: proof that women entered the profession at that advanced age?—Yes.

5678. Will you take it from me that no such evidence has been tendered before this Committee?—I believe that no such evidence has been given.

5679. Have you seen the evidence given by Dr. Cook, the Chaplain of the London Lock Hospital?—I have.

5680. I refer to the evidence which he gives with reference to the peculiarly hopeless and degraded character of what he calls the Government women; do you agree with his evidence upon that point?—I agree with it; I think it is quite natural.

5681. You do not agree with it from any observation of these women in your own experience?—No.

5682. But you would expect that to be the result of a lengthened stay in the practice of their profession, and you would expect that to be the result also of the examinations which they have to go through, and of the system of supervision under which they live?—I think it is the natural result of such a system.

5683. Let me refer you to Question 2762, where I ask Dr. Cook this: (Q.) “You would expect to find a greater chance of reclamation amongst them; and, so far as I can judge from the figures with which we have been favoured, you find that greater chance?” (A.) Taking 100 for 100, or 20 for 20, of Government undoubted prostitutes, and ordinary avowed prostitutes (for we have only their own word to take), I should say that the probability and hopes of reclamation would be greater in the ordinary than in the case of the Government women.” Are you disposed to agree with that evidence?—I should agree with that.

5684. I need not detain you further upon your objection to the Acts, but I will ask you what steps the Free Church of Scotland has taken to convey its views of this legislation to the Government, or to Parliament?—They have had a Committee of the General Assembly ever since 1871, I think, and have petitioned against the Acts, both as an assembly and the inferior church courts. I think between 1870 and 1876, there were 400 petitions sent from the Free Church of Scotland, of which 242 were signed officially, that is to say, they were signed in the name of the General Assembly, which represents a body of about 800 ministers and laymen, and represents generally the thousand congregations of the Church, and then, by the subordinate church courts, the synods, the presbyteries, and the kirk sessions; and there were a number of individual petitions as well.

5685. Have there been any petitions since that time?—Very few since 1876.

5686. During the time that this inquiry has been proceeding, it has checked the flow of petitions, has it not?—I think it has.

5687. Can you give us some of the resolutions passed in your Assembly?—I have brought those for 1879, 1880, and 1881. If I read one of them it will give an idea of the whole of them.

5688. Do they differ in view at all from the preceding resolutions?—I think not.

5689. They may be taken as an expression of the continuous opinion of your body?—These are the deliverances upon the report of the committee. This resolution of 1881 refers first to the carrying out of the instructions of the previous General Assembly to petition Parliament, and then it goes on to say, “That the Assembly receive the above verbal report; thank the committee, and especially the convener; renew their condemnation of the Contagious Diseases (Women) Acts; resolve to petition against them, and authorise the moderator to sign such petition in their name; re-appoint the committee, adding the name of John Gordon Cumming Skene, Esq., of Parkhill, Mr. Ferguson (myself) convener; renew their recommendation to ministers and sessions to fully inform themselves, and as far as practicable, to inform their people regarding these Acts, so that a right public opinion may be formed, and all lawful and constitutional steps taken for their speedy and complete repeal; and authorise the committee to appeal to the Church for funds to carry out these recommendations.” I put in these three resolutions, which are practically the same. (The same were handed in.)

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5690. I think you stated that you lived in Aberdeenshire?—Yes.

5691. I gather from your evidence that you do not know these subjected districts?—I have not visited any of them.

5692. Therefore, of course, we may assume that the evidence which you have given is not founded upon personal observation?—It is not; it is purely inferential from the evidence which I have read before the Committee.

5693. I believe that no part of Scotland is under the Acts?—Not yet.

5694. You spoke of a woman, as I understood you, once upon the register being compelled to remain there for a certain period; of course, you are aware, as you have read the Acts, that a woman can always escape from the operation of the Acts by ceasing to be a prostitute; you are aware that provision is made for her relief from examination, if she can satisfy a magistrate that she has ceased to carry on the trade of a prostitute?—Yes, there is such a provision, but it is a very impracticable one.

5695. The 33rd, 34th, and 35th sections of the Act of 1866 contain a provision to that effect. I am not speaking now as to the difficulties of doing so, or as to the course which would have to be pursued; but the Acts do point out a road by which, if she chooses, she can escape from their operation, do they not?—They seem to do so.

5696. I understood you to say that it was the avowed purpose of the Acts to make vice safe; you desire to qualify that now?—Yes, to the extent that I do not think Parliament meant that in the sense that is usually attached to the word “avowed.”

5697. You

9 May 1882.]

Mr. FERGUSON.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

5697. You are aware, in fact I think it is common ground to everybody, that the professed purpose of the Acts was a sanitary purpose, whatever may be their actual results?—Yes, it professes to be sanitary.

5698. Your attention was called to the 36th section of the Act of 1866, which subjects to a penalty any brothel keeper who, having reasonable cause to believe that a woman is suffering from contagious disease, induces or allows her to remain in his house for purposes of prostitution; you are aware of that?—Yes.

5699. And that, of course, would be quite in keeping with what I have said was the professed purpose of the Act, viz.: a sanitary purpose?—It would.

5700. Are you aware that the Contagious Diseases Acts were never intended to supersede the powers of other Acts of Parliament with reference to prostitution and brothels?—There is a provision in that section to that effect; but practically the other effect is what occurs.

5701. You will see that the 36th section contains a proviso that a conviction under this enactment (that is for harbouring a diseased prostitute) “shall not exempt the offender from any penal or other consequences to which he may be liable for keeping, or being concerned in keeping, a disorderly house,” and so forth; so that it appears as if the Act intended to steer clear of all question of any legal liability of prostitutes or brothel keepers upon other than sanitary grounds?—Yes; but the practical outcome of that is just the reverse of that, because the police make use of this clause, and the brothel keepers immediately deduce the inference that they will not be troubled otherwise if they attend to this.

5702. You are aware of course that stringent laws have been passed, particularly in Scotland, as we have heard, against brothel keepers and others who are, so to speak, concerned in the practice of prostitution?—Yes, and whenever they have been put in practice they have been very efficient in abating the evil.

5703. You collect from what I have said, that these Contagious Diseases Acts in no way interfere with the operation of those enactments?—I say that they should not interfere, but I think that, practically, they do interfere.

5704. You could not state that from your own experience?—No, because I am not in any of those protected districts, but I have seen a great deal of evidence of it.

5705. Would you infer, and if so upon what grounds, that the Contagious Diseases Acts hamper, or in any way interfere, with the general operation of the other enactments upon these subject of prostitution?—As I said just now, they should not do it. I believe the intention was that they should not do it.

5706. I suppose you could hardly, without any actual experience of the subject, state that they do?—Only in the way that I have already mentioned, that I have read evidence that they do. Of course, personally, I have no experience.

5707. The Right honourable Gentleman put to you the case of a virtuous woman coming to 0.75.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

be examined by a surgeon voluntarily, and he said, and of course we all agree that that was a very different case from the case of a prostitute coming to be examined under the Acts; now, let me put this case to you: do you know Dublin?—I have been in Dublin, but I do not know it.

5708. Probably you will take it from me, as the result of the evidence, that in Dublin there is a voluntary Lock hospital supported by the State?—Certainly.

5709. Take the case of the Dublin Lock hospital: supposing that the woman A. B. is a prostitute, she comes to that hospital and tells the surgeon there, or the surgeon knows from other sources, that she, being a prostitute suffering from a contagious disease, comes there for the purpose of being cured in order that she may carry on with her trade of prostitution. The objections which you have raised against the Acts would apply even to such State support to a hospital as that, would they not?—I think the two cases are totally different. In the one case the will is voluntarily exercised; in the other case it has no existence at all.

5710. That is true as to the constitutional aspect of the question, but hardly as regards the moral aspect of the question. I will put the case again: A. B., a prostitute, who is avowedly carrying on the trade of prostitution, comes to a State supported Lock hospital, and says to the surgeon: “I am suffering from venereal disease; I want to be cured in order that I may go back to the streets;” the surgeon, who is paid by the State, is obliged to cure her; would not the moral objections, which you have very forcibly put, to these Acts apply to such an institution as that?—I think the moral objections would apply equally strongly, if it is simply a hospital for the cure of prostitutes to enable them to go back to their profession; but, as I understand most Lock hospitals, it is rather to escape from their profession that they apply to them. At least I know that in Glasgow and other places the Lock hospital is a means of redeeming them, and saving them, not of making them fit for their work.

5711. But I am putting a case which of course a Lock hospital surgeon would not be at liberty to refuse?—Quite so, but take the infirmary in Edinburgh; there are, I suppose, hundreds of cases of venereal disease there, and that is supported entirely by voluntary subscription.

5712. I am not speaking of an hospital supported by voluntary contributions, which would come under an entirely different category, but of a State-supported hospital; and I gave you the case of the Lock hospital in Dublin, which is supported entirely by State aid?—I have no objection whatever to State aid being given to Lock hospitals; what I object to is, a certain class of women being compelled to remain in their life of prostitution, and having that life of prostitution made safe.

5713. Still I understood you to say that the case I put is one that might at any time arise independently of the Acts, viz., that of a prostitute coming to this Westmoreland Lock hospital and saying, “I am diseased; I want to be cured, in order that I may go back to the streets," and the surgeon, of course, being obliged to cure her; the moral objections you have raised would apply to such a state of things as that?—Yes; but I would not have the same moral objection if that Lock hospital supported by the State had also a provision for saving the women from going back to their life of prostitution. Of course, in the case of a voluntary hospital, that you could not do, except by moral and Christian influences. I wish to distinguish between the idea that a number of people have got, that we who object to these Contagious Diseases Acts, desire nothing to be done for the reclamation of the women; we are the strongest supporters of every scheme of that kind. It is the compulsory element that we object to.
I 14 that

5714. No fair-minded person would suggest anything of the kind?—It has not been suggested here, but it has been suggested over and over again very strongly. It is one of the points that we have to contend very much against, as if we had no sympathy.

5715. I give you entire credit for it, so far as I am concerned; you are aware, of course, that there is provision required to be made in these Lock hospitals provided under the Acts, for the religious and moral reclamation of the inmates?—I am aware of that; but will you allow me to add, that I do not think it can be very effective in connection with the purpose for which the women are there.

5716. Why not?—Because what can be the influence of Christian teaching on a woman whom you are curing for the purpose of her continuing a sinful and unchristian life.

5717. But you assume that you are curing her for the purpose of her continuing a sinful and unchristian life?—I assume that.

5718. The supporters of the Acts would hardly agree with you there; have you ever been in one of these hospitals?—No, I have not.

5719. You have never been present at the religious ministrations, or talked to the chaplain?—I have heard of what has been claimed for them.

5720. But as to that again, you are unable to speak from personal experience?—Yes; I, at the beginning of my examination, said that I had no personal experience of the Acts, and that therefore I was only giving the judgment of an outsider upon them.

5721. Both upon moral and practical grounds; I think you said that you would consider it right that if women were examined, men should be examined also?—What I think I said, or what I mean to say was, that I do not think there would be any practical result in putting down disease in women, so long as men are allowed to go about disseminating disease.

5722. You are probably aware that that point was strongly urged before the Royal Commission, and that they advert to it in their report. I will read what they say on the subject: "Many witnesses have urged that as well on grounds of justice as expediency" (those are your own words I think). "Soldiers and sailors should be subjected to regular examinations." (In speaking of soldiers and sailors, they would refer to those whom it would be most necessary to examine.) "We may at once dispose of this recommendation, so far as it is founded on the principle of putting both parties to the sin of fornication on the same footing by the obvious, but not less conclusive reply, that there is no comparison to be made between prostitutes and the men who consort with them. With the one sex, the offence is committed as a matter of gain, with the other, it is an irregular indulgence of a natural impulse." I gather that that was the opinion of the whole of the Commission?—I fancy so; I believe that at one time men were examined as well as women, and they had to give it up.

5723. But you would not agree with that conclusion of the Commission?—Certainly not; I hold that the sin is as bad in the one as in the other. I dissent from the grounds upon which they give that opinion, that the sin is less in the one than in the other.

5724. And you do not think that the fact that the women carry it on as a profession, whereas the men do not, ought to make and would make the examination of the former more expedient or just?—I could not admit that.

5725. In fact, you do not recognise in any way the force of that paragraph which I read to you?—No.

Dr. Farquharson.

5726. I suppose you would not consider it desirable to maintain venereal disease as a necessary punishment for vice and sin?—Certainly not. I believe it has a deterrent power, but I certainly would not retain it.

5727. Then would you think it desirable for the State to make any efforts to put down prostitution by legal means?—I think so. I think it would be very desirable for the State to provide the Lock hospitals we have been speaking about, and these religious opportunities that are already provided in the Government local hospitals without the other accompaniments of compulsory attendance and facilities given to return to a life of sin.

5728. But not to put it down by making prostitution an offence?—I would not object to that.

5729. Do you think it would be practicable?—I do not think it would be practicable.

5730. Do you not think that even if it were done, great social evils might result from the want of an outlet for a man's evil passions?—I do not think so. You are pointing now, I fancy, to the doctrine that some people hold that prostitution must exist; but I cannot accept that doctrine.

5731. Not in the abstract certainly; but do you not think that, as human nature is constituted now, we must look prostitution in the face as almost a necessary evil?—I do not think so. We have been speaking of the army and the navy; I hold that a less expenditure probably than is incurred now upon these Acts would enable most of the soldiers to marry young, and you would have better men, and you would have better characters in every way.

5732. I am afraid that the expense of enabling soldiers to marry universally would be very great, would it not?—I do not know that it would be greater. I have read in these statistics that about one-third of the British army is in hospital all the year round. The expense of that would go a very long long way towards covering the cost of providing marriage facilities for the soldiers.

5733. But I do not think that so large a number as that are in hospital at one time for venereal disease?—I know I read in some of the returns some years ago something of that sort, that that was about the average.

5734. Of course we should have to increase the pay of soldiers largely if we permitted them to marry?—Yes; it is too small as it is.

5735. Then you would have to increase the barrack accommodation very largely?—Yes.

5737. Would you apply the same argument to the civil population, and recommend compulsory matrimony amongst the civil population?—I think that in our country places, where men marry early, there is less of that evil. We have other evils of course, which do not quite come under the same category; but I believe the fact is, that in country places where men marry early, you have very little of this vice as compared with what there is in large towns.

5738. But where men marry early do you not have a great deal of what is worse vice, viz., seductions and illegitimate births?—There is a great deal of that, unfortunately, in our part of the country, I think largely arising from its being used as a kind of trap by the young women to get settled early and get husbands.

5739. You do not think it has anything to do with the absence of what I may call the outlet for men's passions which is supplied by prostitution?—No, I do not think so. I think it is very unfair to compare country districts in point of illegitimacy with large towns, because you may say, taking it merely as a fact, that in the country districts every single case becomes known, whereas, of course, in towns you have vices without that particular element of illegitimacy. It is just the same question as it is in Paris, where, I remember, Professor Müller, the eminent surgeon, in one of the assemblies, calling attention to that. A clergyman had drawn a very strong parallel between what he chose to call Romanistic France and Protestant England on this very footing of illegitimacy, showing that there was a great deal more illegitimacy in Protestant England than there was in Catholic France; but Professor Müller replied, that all surgeons and professional men knew that vice was so very common in Paris and the other large towns that there was no outcome from it.

5740. You grant that venereal disease is not a necessary punishment for sin, and that we cannot attempt to check prostitution actually by law?—I have not admitted these two things; I said that I would not argue that venereal disease ought to be maintained as a punishment for sin. As you put it now you make it appear as though I said that I did not consider that venereal disease was a punishment for sin; I think it is a punishment for sin; but would not maintain it on that ground. Then, as regards the other part of your question, that I admitted that prostitution could not be put down by law; I did not admit that. I think it could be put down by law, and I say that it is put down by law in Edinburgh, and Glasgow, and other towns, in which these Police Acts are put in force.
0.75.

5741. The great drawback, of course, of venereal disease, as a punishment for sin, is the great inequality of its incidence; is it not right that the punishment should be made proportionate to the gravity of the offence?—There is a principle involved in that question which I have not considered. I do not know that there is any inequality in the incidence.

5742. A vicious person frequently, from superior knowledge and from great care, escapes altogether the consequences of vice in the form of venereal disease; whereas an unfortunate young fellow, who goes with a woman once, may contract a disease which may embitter the whole of the rest of his existence; in your view, is it fair that they should both be equally punished?—I am afraid that that is a matter hardly within the scope of our power to either judge or control.

5743. Is it not right that we should try and mitigate the consequences of what is an unequal punishment?—I have said, as strongly as I can, that I think every step ought to be taken to mitigate it, but not in the direction in which these Acts do it, which is not only to mitigate the evil and the danger, but also to go on and perpetuate the provision for satisfying the desire.

5744. But the primary object of the Acts, as I understand, is to mitigate the disease?—To control and mitigate it.

5745. Could you suggest any more efficient machinery to mitigate the disease than these Acts?—It is not for me to suggest my machinery off-hand. I think it could be done, but it would be taking too much upon myself to attempt at the moment to suggest legislation.

5746. Do you think that the fact of women only being examined necessarily renders the sanitary success of the Acts inefficient?—I think so. I think it makes it very illusory. For instance, a surgeon in Edinburgh the other night gave this illustration. He said: "It is constantly within our knowledge that a woman, in whom you could detect no visible disease might, in the course of a single night, contaminate half-a-dozen men, because the first man that she might have connection with was diseased; then of course she communicates the disease to every other man that she has connection with that night; and yet, at the end of the whole time you, as a surgeon, must know that you could not discover it."

5747. As a surgeon, I also know that this theory of mediate contagion is very much disputed by the medical profession?—I cannot go into that; but this is what Dr. Miller says, one of the surgeons of the Edinburgh Infirmary, in the wards in which these diseases are treated, and a man of great experience.

5748. Is he the surgeon at the Lock hospital?—I think he is; he is also surgeon in the venereal wards of the Royal Infirmary, which are very extensive.
K K venereal

5750. We have had evidence that one woman will have connection in a single night with 20 or 30 men?—Of course, if she is badly diseased, she must contaminate those men.

5751. Therefore, the fact of shutting that woman up in hospital would, at all events, check her opportunities of spreading disease?—That would be so.

5752. And, so far as that goes, a certain check is put upon the spread of venereal disease?—Yes, a limited check, if it is a check in the end.

5753. Then what you would say would be that the practice of this one-sided examination only renders the check less efficient?—Yes; it would never stamp out the disease.

5754. I think you indicated that you thought an increased indulgence in sexual vice at an early age was the result of the Acts; do you think that many young men in towns not under the Acts, or even in towns under the Acts, are likely to have heard of the Acts, or to know much about them?—Yes; they know very well about them everywhere. Some time ago it was a common topic of conversation amongst young men in Edinburgh.

5756. In what rank of life were those specific young men of whom you speak?—They were young gentlemen.

5757. Were they waiting to begin their evil courses until Edinburgh was put under the Acts, or had they already done so?—I do not know what their private character was before.

5758. Therefore, in that case, they were not driven into vice by hearing of the Acts?—The Acts are not applied to Edinburgh yet.

5759. But they had not been driven into vice by hearing of the Acts in other places; they had already, I presume, began to practice vice?—I cannot say that.

5760. You cannot say that, in this specific case, the influences of the Acts elsewhere had induced these young men to go into vice?—I cannot say that at all.

5761. We have had some evidence about the difference between the women on the voluntary and on the compulsory sides of Lock hospitals, and we have been told that the women are much more degraded on what is called the Government or compulsory side; but do you find any special superiority in the appearance of the women at Edinburgh or Glasgow, or London, where they are not under the Acts?—I have not, personally, had any opportunity of comparing their general appearance or demeanour with those of women in towns which are under the Acts.

5762. Then we are told that there is a very great difference in the reclamations between the women on the voluntary side and the women on the Government side in the Lock hospitals; but is not this comparison vitiated a little by the fact that these women are very often of totally different classes, and that on the one side you have only the professional prostitutes, while on the other side you have a mixture of women; you have some married women, some young women living with their parents, and some young people just going into vice; would not that great difference of class render the comparison a little illusory as far as regards reclamation?—I do not think that there is such a difference of class as you suggest, because many of these prostitutes are the children of respectable parents, and have been well brought up; they have been seduced, and then have fallen lower and lower. Of course there must be discrimination in judging of these things.

5763. I think you gave us some opinions about the patients in voluntary and Government Lock hospitals; the primary object of the introduction of patients into both of those hospitals is the cure of disease, is it not?—Yes.

5764. The reclamation, I presume, is merely secondary to that?—I think in the case of Lock hospitals supported by private contributions, they go together. The object of Lock hospitals supported by private contributions, at all events, is as much reclamation as cure.

5765. But a woman is not asked before she is taken to be cured, whether she wishes to be reclaimed?—No, I suppose not.

5766. Therefore, the primary object is the treatment of disease, and the secondary object is the reclamation of the women?—Yes.

5767. I think we may claim as much as that for the Government hospitals, that women are taken in for the cure of disease, and every effort is made and every facility is given for their reclamation, if desired?—That is just the point that I doubt.

5768. I think you say that the women are turned out of the Government Lock hospitals to go back to ply their trade; but the authorities of the Government Lock hospital have no idea what those women are going to do; whenever a woman is freed from treatment in a Government Lock hospital, she is freed from further inspection, she is a free woman, and for anything that the authorities know, she may give up her trade; she is not sent out for the purpose of continuing it, but only sent out as she would be from any other hospital to do as she pleases?—We have it in evidence that they do go back, according to the reports of your own inspectors, in nine cases out of 10.

5769. But it is not absolutely necessary; they need not go back unless they like?—The footing upon which they come in leads to that result.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

5770. I understood you to say that the religious body of which you are a member takes great interest in this question?—Yes, a great many of its members do.

5771. Did I correctly understand you to say that there was a committee appointed specially

to

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

to inquire into and consider the matter?—Yes, there is a standing committee of the General Assembly of the Free Church, which look into the matter.

5772. Which has to deal with this particular subject?—Yes, that has.

5773. And you are a member of that committee?—I am.

5774. Have you read all the evidence which has been given in favour of the maintenance of the Acts?—I have not read it all.

5775. What portions of that evidence have you read?—I have read very little of what has been before this Committee; it is not very easily got at.

5776. Then you have not taken any very great pains to acquaint yourself with the case which has been made out?—I have seen the results of it in various papers.

5777. In what papers?—In papers that deal with the subject.

5778. Can you give me the name of any such papers?—The “Shield,” and various papers.

5779. You are aware, I suppose, that the “Shield” is a paper published in the interests of those who desire to repeal the Acts?—Yes.

5780. And, therefore, it is naturally a partial witness?—Yes, I suppose you may say so, because the witnesses who come in favour of the Acts are partial witnesses too in the same sense as the others. I only put one against the other.

5781. I entirely concur in your remark. Those who give evidence in favour of the Acts have a bias one way, just as those who give evidence against the Acts have a bias the other way; is not that so?—I suppose so.

5782. At all events, you have not taken any special pains to acquaint yourself with the particulars of the evidence which has been given in favour of the Acts before this Committee?—No, I have not had an opportunity of doing so.

5783. Are you aware that when these Acts were originally passed, they were supported by many Members of Parliament from considerations of humanity towards suffering women?—I am not aware of that.

5784. But I suppose you would believe that Members of Parliament might be actuated by such considerations?—I think very few Members of Parliament knew very well what the Acts were when they were passed.

5785. Upon what grounds do you make that statement?—Because there was no public discussion upon them in Parliament, and they were passed at a late hour of the night when very few people were present.

5786. If you will refer to the circumstances under which the Acts of Parliament were passed, will you not find that not only was there an open discussion in the House of Commons, but also that there was a reference in each case to a Select Committee?—I am not familiar with the history of the thing just now; I cannot remember it; it is so long ago; but the general impression is, as I have stated it; and I have the authority of Mr. McLaren, the late Member for Edinburgh, for that statement.

0.75.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

5787. Do you know, of your own knowledge, that those were the facts of the case?—I know from the reports in the public papers that they were passed at a late hour of the night, when there were very few Members present; and Mr. McLaren declared the other day in Edinburgh, that he did not think even the Cabinet itself knew what the tenour of the Acts was.

5788. Are you aware that the Right honourable Gentleman, the Member for Halifax, was a member of the Government when the Acts of 1864 and 1869 were passed?—No, I am not aware.

5789. When a witness makes statements of the kind which you have just given, it is necessary to call attention to the evidence; referring to Question 7927, addressed by me last year to Mr. Shaen, are you aware that when the Bill came back to be considered, as amended, there was a division, and 76 Members voted on one side and five on the other?—That is 81 altogether. That is a small House.

5790. Are you aware of the fact?—I was not aware of the figure, but it bears out what I said.

5791. I then asked Mr. Shaen, in Question 7929, “In 1869 the subject was discussed again, and then it was again referred to a Select Committee, and then my Right honourable friend the Member for Halifax was, I think, Secretary of the Treasury and a member of the Government, who introduced the Bill;” are you aware of that fact?—I am not.

5792. Are you aware, from the evidence which has been given generally, that the condition of the prostitutes at the time when the Acts were passed was exceedingly bad?—I think it is very likely, but I do not know.

5793. You have not read the evidence to that effect?—I read it at the time, but I do not remember. I am quite prepared to take it from you that it was so, but I cannot speak from personal knowledge.

5794. Are you aware that evidence has been given that their condition is very much improved at the present time?—I know it has been stated, but I do not attribute that to the Acts.

5795. I suppose you will not hesitate to admit that a large amount of relief has been afforded to suffering women through the medium of these Acts?—I do not think that there has been a very large amount; however, I do not know, and I would not like to answer that question. I do not admit it, but I do not like to deny it.

5796. Is it not the fact that a large number of women have been taken to hospital, and have been cured of a very terrible disease, who otherwise would not have been so cured?—I do not know that there are a very large number. I know that a number have been driven away from the districts.

5797. Are you aware that the amount of voluntary Lock hospital accommodation in the three kingdoms is very insufficient to meet the wants of the case?—Probably it is. Then increase it.

5798. Have you any means of knowing the number of beds that there are in the voluntary Lock hospitals?—No, I never went into that question.

K K 2

5799. It

9 May 1882.]

Mr. FERGUSON.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

5799. It was stated before the last Committee (and I believe the statement was approximately correct) that in the whole of the United Kingdom there are but about 450 beds for women suffering from venereal disease?—I should be very much surprised to find it so.

5800. If that be so, or if the number be only approximately correct, is it not a fact that the amount of voluntary Lock hospital accommodation is deplorably insufficient?—Certainly it is, if that is the case. Then I say increase it.

5801. Are you aware that in the Government Lock hospitals at the present moment there are at least 50 per cent., or more, of the patients suffering from venereal disease attended to at the Government cost?—I do not know.

5802. You are not aware that at this moment the number of beds which are found in Government Lock hospitals is 670, in round numbers?—I am not aware of the fact.

5803. Supposing that the Acts were repealed to-morrow, those 670 patients would have to be turned out of the hospital, would they not?—I would not do that.

5804. Then what course would you advise to be taken in such a case?—I approve, either by voluntary subscription or by the Government giving subsidies, of providing a sufficient amount of hospital accommodation, apart altogether from the compulsory provisions of these Acts.

5805. You have to deal with an Act of Parliament which established these Lock hospitals; do I rightly understand that you would repeal those Acts absolutely, or that you would amend them?—I would repeal those Acts absolutely; but, at the same time, I would desire to see the Government continue the provision of those hospitals, on the same footing as other general infirmaries and general hospitals all over the country.

5806. You have got 670 women now in beds at the Government Lock hospitals; if you repealed the Acts absolutely those women would have to be turned out of their beds into the streets; I want to know whether you have any, short of the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts, such alternative to offer to this Committee as would prevent what I should consider a gross act of inhumanity?—I would do as I say, maintain these hospitals simply as curative establishments, not connected with these compulsory Acts at all.

5807. Then you would amend the Acts, and not repeal them?—There would be such an amendment as would entirely take them away.

5808. But if you are going to keep these women until they are cured and are not going to turn them out, you must take some steps by amending the Act to retain those women in the hospitals, must you not?—The Act repealing these Acts might contain a provision for maintaining those hospitals.

5809. Then that would be amending the Acts?—As I say, amending them in such a way as constitutes a practical repeal of them.

5810. Then do I understand this to be your view: that the Government should still keep up the hospitals for the reception of women of this class, but that there should be no compulsion at all?—Yes, that would be my view.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

5811. I understand, therefore, that your view is that you would have the Acts so amended that there should be Government hospitals upon the voluntary system?—Yes, certainly; but I would prefer the two being entirely separate. I would prefer those Acts being entirely repealed and blotted out, and an Act passed to make provision out of the public funds for the maintenance of sufficient accommodation for that class of disease. Of course, it is a matter of language whether you talk of amending the Acts, or whether you do as I say; but, for the sake of making it perfectly clear, I would prefer to have these Acts entirely swept out of the Statute Book, and a new provision made altogether on new and higher lines.

5812. Supposing that, technically, it could be done?—Supposing that, technically, it could be done.

5813. But still you would desire that the Government should maintain, at the public expense, hospitals for the reception, treatment, and cure of diseased women, provided that their attendance, and so forth, was entirely voluntary?—I think so; I think I would go that length.

5814. Are you at all acquainted with the voluntary Lock hospitals of Scotland?—Not personally.

5815. Do you subscribe to any yourself, personally?—I have done so; I do not do so at the present moment, except to the Royal Infirmary at Edinburgh. I subscribe to that, and that has venereal wards.

5816. I need not trouble you about Glasgow, because we have had evidence as to Glasgow; but could you give the Committee any details of the Lock hospital wards, or of the treatment in the Royal Infirmary at Edinburgh?—No, I could not give any personal information; but there are separate wards set apart for the treatment of venereal disease.

5817. You know, of your own knowledge, that there are separate wards set apart for venereal patients?—Yes, there are.

5818. Do you know the number of beds?—No, I cannot say how many beds there are.

5819. You cannot give the Committee any details on the subject?—No.

5820. Have any inquiries been made into prostitution and its conditions and results by the Committee of the Free Church to which you belong?—Not very minutely.

5821. Are you of opinion that stronger laws should be enacted against the practice of prostitution?—In Scotland we have Police Acts which are very efficient in preventing, at any rate, open prostitution. For instance, in Edinburgh such a thing is almost unknown as soliciting in the streets; it used to be very different when I was young. And I believe that the same may be said with regard to Glasgow, but I am not quite sure; and also with regard to Aberdeen.

5822. Are there a large number of prostitutes in Edinburgh?—Yes, I have no doubt that there are; but they have been very much diminished of late, and the houses of ill-fame have been very much diminished of late by the operation of the new Police Act.

5823. Is it your belief that there are fewer women practising prostitution now in Edinburgh than

9 May 1882.]

Mr. FERGUSON.

than there were five years ago?—I believe so. I knew that the operation of these Police Acts has brought a great many more of these poor creatures into the refuges and homes for reformation.

5824. Upon what grounds do you form that opinion as to the diminution of the number of prostitutes in Edinburgh and Glasgow?—Very much on that ground; that so many of these poor creatures have now been seeking entrance into these homes, and refuges, and reformatories. In fact it is difficult to supply the accommodation in these homes now.

5825. Do you know at all what number of women are received into homes in Edinburgh and Glasgow?—A very considerable number in Edinburgh; I have not the figures.

5826. And those women all belong to the prostitute class?—A great many of them do.

5827. Do I correctly understand that you would not increase the stringency of the laws against prostitution?—I think I would increase their stringency. The Police Acts are very strict already, and, by carefully putting them in force, prostitution can be decreased.

5828. What steps do you recommend to be taken for the purpose of increasing their stringency?—I am not prepared to submit steps.

5829. You are not prepared to suggest any methods by which the law might be made stronger?—No.

5830. Then, with regard to the examination of men, I understood you to say that it was neither logical, nor practical, to apply this law or any similar law to one sex only?—Unfortunately it is practicable, because it is done; but it is very illogical. If the object of the examination is to destroy the disease it is a most illogical thing to only attempt to destroy it in one-half of the persons who are promoting it, and to leave it alone in the other half.

5831. I am afraid that what is logical will always be a matter of opinion. But, with regard to the practical part of the matter, how do you propose to put any law in force against men?—It is not for me to say how that is to be done.

5832. As a practical man you cannot suggest any means by which it could be done?—You could do it by the same force that you apply in the case of women.

5833. But in the case of the woman you know who the woman is; she is practising a profession; she is a prostitute, she is taken into the hospital, and there she is. How are you going to examine the men?—I am not prepared to say how you would do it. I do not see that it is impossible to do it.

5834. Would you show me any way in which it is possible to do it?—It is not for me to do it; it is for the people who make the laws.

5835. If you make a practical suggestion, it is, I apprehend, incumbent upon you to show some means of carrying it out. Can you suggest no means by which an examination of men, such as you desire to see, would be carried out?—I would rather put it in this way: that I would rather not have the examination of either sex.

5836. But you say that the men ought to be put upon the same footing as the women?—I say that unless you treat both the factors of the vice you cannot expect to stamp it out.
0.75.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

5837. But will you show me how you can treat them both?—It is not my business to show you, and I am not prepared to do so.

5838. You are obliged to abandon any idea of suggesting to the Committee how the men could be examined?—I think I said, in answer to Dr. Farquharson, that it would not be practicable to carry it out. Men would not submit to it; you would have a revolution if you attempted it.

5839. Having regard to the fact that precautions of a limited character are now applied to some regiments in the service, would you desire to see those precautions extended to the whole of the army?—It would be more just to do so than to have it only in the one-sided way that it is done now; but, as I have already stated, I do not approve of the examination of either sex.

5840. But given the examination of one sex, then I understand you to say that you want to have an examination of the other?—I think that justice would require the other to be examined also.

5841. The examination of the male sex following the examination of the women, can you point out any way in which that examination could be made effectual?—No, it is not for me to do so at all.

5842. Would you extend it to civilians, too?—I object to the whole thing.

5843. But if the examination is applied to the military, would you also desire to see it extended to civilians?—No, I would not. I do not want to see it carried out in the case of the military, either.

Mr. Hopwood.

5844. You were asked as to whether these Acts applied to any part of Scotland, and I understood you to say that they do not; perhaps it was a matter of prudence not to apply them to Scotland?—I think so. There was a proposal to apply them to the district of Maryhill, near Glasgow, about which Dr. Calderwood gave evidence the other day; but there was such an outcry about it that it was given up.

5845. Those who prompted these Acts were careful to get them enacted where they were least likely to excite commotion?—Yes.

5846. It was assumed, in some question put to you, that a woman can always, and with ease, escape from off the register; do you conceive that that is so from your perusal of these Acts?—I think I replied that, although the Acts had provision for that, it was extremely difficult for a woman to take advantage of it, and, practically, I think it is almost impossible for her to take advantage of it.

5847. She has, in fact, convinced her judges, either the surgeon or the magistrate on appeal, that she has formed an intention for the future?—Yes.

5848. Do you conceive that that is what a woman should not be subjected to?—I think she should not be subjected to it. I do not think it is possible for her to do it; I do not see what evidence could be given.

5849. Do you think that by these Acts the entrance

entrance into prostitution or on to the register is made as easy, and the exit from it as difficult as possible?—It is.

5850. The latter depending on inquiry being previously made, and consent given by a police officer?—Yes.

5851. It was pointed out to you in one question that these Acts were not to supersede other Acts in regard to brothels, and so on, existing already in the Statute Book; but is not the effect of them to make those Acts of less practical effect?—The effect of them is so.

5852. Supposing that there be Acts which say that brothels are unlawful, is it your judgment that these Acts, in fact, recognise them as lawful?—They seem to do so, practically.

5853. They seem to give a legality to them?—Yes.

5854. You were asked about the Dublin Lock Hospital, and whether, inasmuch as that happened to be endowed or subsidised by the State, there was any difference between that and these hospitals which are subsidised by the State under the Acts; and it was put to you whether you saw any difference between a woman presenting herself at the Dublin Lock Hospital, and another woman being sent to an hospital under these Acts; do you see a great difference?—I see a very great difference; I tried to state, as forcible as I could, that the cases were not analogous.

5855. In the case of a woman going to the Dublin Lock Hospital, it is not necessary that she should say even that she is a prostitute?—It is not, I should think.

5856. A respectable woman who was diseased by the misconduct of others might there get relief or cured, might she not?—Yes.

5857. Perhaps you are aware that under these Acts no respectable women, none but a prostitute, can be received into the Government Lock Hospitals?—I presume so; they would be all received as prostitutes.

5858. You were pressed with the relative culpability of the two sexes, and you were asked whether, in the case of the women, it is not a matter of gain, as the Commissioner's phrase is; do you adopt that altogether in regard to the women?—No, I regard it more as a matter of misfortune that they have been driven to that life.

5859. Then as I understand you in your judgment, and from your knowledge of the world, with many women it is not a matter of choice, but it is in great part a matter of necessity from want of means and destitution?—Yes; and it is considered by the great majority of them as a very dreadful necessity.

5860. And very often it is the result, possibly, of seduction?—In a very great many instances.

5862. You base your argument upon the principle itself?—Yes.

5863. With regard to the number of seductions

in country places, have you ever heard that seductions are as prevalent in places where soldiers are stationed as in other places?—Yes.

5864. With regard to the idea that a woman is more dangerous for this purpose hygienically than a man, I suppose it is in the nature of things that a woman must be first diseased by a man?—I fancy so.

5865. Therefore, if a woman be a dangerous instrument, one man may create a dangerous instrument?—Yes.

5866. With regard to the State recognising the brothels, you are aware that these constables acting under the Acts are constantly visiting the brothels, and being in communication with the keepers of them?—I see that from the evidence.

5867. And perhaps you are also aware from Captain Harris's Return, that he professes to return the number of known brothels?—Yes.

5868. Therefore, if those be unlawful he, the head of the police, has the information in his power to set them in motion to put them down?—Yes, precisely so.

5869. And he abstains from putting them down?—He does.

5870. The inference is that they are tolerated by the highest authority?—Quite so.

5871. And that is part of the system engendered by the Acts which you object to?—It is.

Dr. Cameron.

5872. Questions have been put to you based upon the presumed admission, upon your part, of the sanitary benefits of the Acts; you are aware that the sanitary benefits of the Acts are completely a matter of dispute?—I consider them so, and have always done so.

5873. I presume you would require very strong evidence to convince you of their sanitary benefits before you would feel yourself reconciled to the Acts?—I would.

5874. You are aware that there is great diversity of opinion among competent authorities as to the sanitary benefits of the Acts?—I am aware of that.

5875. Are you aware that there are a large number of competent judges and scientific men who do not admit the beneficial sanitary results to be proved?—I am quite aware of that.

5876. And you have no reason to believe that their opinion is incorrect?—I have no reason to believe so, but very much the reverse.

5877. You have also been pressed to suggest some means for the mitigation of disease, assuming the Contagious Diseases Acts to be repealed. Of course, if you do not admit that they are of use in mitigating the disease, you are not called upon to make any proposal?—Certainly not.

5878. But, under any circumstances, you told us that you did not feel bound to make any suggestion of the kind?—No.

5879. You consider that a great deal can be done by moral means?—Yes, a great deal.

5880. And you have suggested such means as early marriages, marriage in the army, and the enforcement of ordinary police regulations?—Yes.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5881. My Right honourable friend the Member for Whitehaven asked you whether you were not aware aware that the object of many Members of Parliament in originally voting for the Acts was to relieve suffering women. You accept, of course, that object as far as their minds were concerned; but you have before you the report of Captain Harris, No. 1; column 31, on page 5, is the annual ratio per cent. of cases of disease calculated on the average number of women on the register. You will probably take it from me that the Acts came into full operation in the year 1870. In the year 1870 you find that the annual ratio of cases of disease amongst the women was 148.25 per cent.—Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

5882. And do you not find a certain increase year by year, particularly after the first few years, until in the year 1880 the proportion was 176.48 per cent.—Yes.

5883. So that between the year 1870, when the Acts came into full operation, and the year 1880, the proportion of cases of disease amongst the women had risen from 148 per cent. to 176 per cent.—It had.

5884. Therefore, that benevolent object of those who voted for the Contagious Diseases Acts does not appear to have been carried out.—It does not.

5885. As to the insufficient supply of voluntary hospitals; first of all, as to the figures. You have been reminded that there are 645 beds supplied and paid for by the Government?—Yes.

5886. My Right honourable friend has asked you to agree with him in the assumption that if the Contagious Diseases Acts were repealed 645 patients would be deprived of the advantage of care and cure; but if you turn to column 26 of the same return, do you find that, so far from 645 beds being occupied, the number of individual women remaining in hospital at the end of that year was 242?—Yes.

5887. As to the examination of men as well as the examination of women, I understand your view to be this: that from a hygienic point of view the system which examines one sex only to ascertain and cure a disease resulting from the contact of two sexes is absurd?—Yes.

5888. But the Committee is not to infer that you recommend the examination of either sex?—Certainly not.

5889. You do not believe that the examination of one sex, as it is at present conducted, has any efficiency at all?—I do not think it has any efficiency at all. Of course, it is less efficient because it is not efficient.

5890. You have not come here prepared to be examined upon the hygienic question, but you are not prepared to admit that the Acts have had any hygienic success?—No.

5891. With regard to the examination of men, you are aware, are you not, that the army authorities have reported, and witnesses before this Committee have reported, in favour of the examination of all soldiers, and that that examination has not been carried out?—Yes.

5892. I will only refer you to the evidence of Dr. Barr and of Mr. Shaen, and to a quotation of Mr. Shaen's from the Report of the Medical Committee of Inquiry, of which Mr. Skey, I think, was the chairman. You will probably take it from me that, in the opinion of experts, civil and military, the examinations ought to have been extended to men as well as to women, and that they have not been so extended?—Yes.

The Rev. CHARLES DEWICK WARD, D.D., called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5893. ARE you a Minister of the Denomination known as the Methodist New Connexion?—I am.

5894. Were you President of the Conference of that denomination in the year 1876?—I was.

5895. What other post do you occupy with regard to that denomination?—I am the Editor and Book Steward of the denomination.

5896. Therefore, from your official connection with that denomination of which you are a minister, you are intimately acquainted with their views upon this subject, and with their action with regard to it?—Quite so.

5897. Have you heard the evidence of Mr. Ferguson?—I have heard it all.

5898. I will ask you simply whether, upon the objections from a religious and moral point of view to this legislation upon which I examined him, you concur in the answers which he gave?—On those points I concurred altogether with his answers.

5899. Is there anything in Mr. Ferguson's evidence as to which you would wish to make any reserve?—Not as to that kind of evidence; I have no reserve.

5900. But as to any other opinions which he expressed, is there any reserve that you would like to make?—Certain legal questions were asked of him upon which I, not being a lawyer, could not express an opinion.

5901. All that you could say, I understand, would be this, that you would not wish to be understood as endorsing the opinions expressed by him upon other than the moral aspects of the questions, because the moral aspects of the question are the only ones with which you profess to be familiar?—Quite so.

5902. Under those circumstances, I will simply ask you to inform the Committee, first of all, whether you can say that the great majority of your friends of the Methodist New Connexion concur in the view to which you have expressed your assent?—I believe they would almost unanimously concur—possibly and probably with perfect unanimity; I never heard any exception.

5903. You never heard any exception amongst either ministers or laymen?—None.

5904. You have never heard in the Methodist New Connexion of a minister or layman who approved of this legislation?—I have not.

5905. Will you inform the Committee what action has been taken by your body with respect to it?—As to the annual Conference of the denomination, formed, as it is, of an equal number

9 May 1882.]

Rev. C. D. WARD, D.D.

of ministers and laymen, reaching in the aggregate 150 members, I may say that in 1873, 1874, 1875, 1876, and 1880, the Conference passed with unanimity (for I was present on each occasion and proposed some of them, and voted for all), resolutions condemning the Acts and calling upon the Presidents of the denomination, for the time being, to send protests against them to both Houses of Parliament, with urgent requests that they be repealed as early as possible. Copies of those resolutions I should like to hand in. (The same were delivered in.)

5906. Has your body also presented petitions to Parliament for the repeal of the Acts?—The Conference has done so five times to my knowledge, and certain district meetings have done the same, and separate congregations have taken the same action. In 1875, for example, 66 congregations petitioned for the total repeal of these Acts, and the petitions were signed by 2,409 persons. In 1876, 71 congregations petitioned with an aggregate of signatures of 2,476. But since 1876 nothing has been done in this direction by the congregations of the body. In 1880, as I have said, the annual Conference sent a petition for the total repeal of these Acts.

5907. And you are prepared, as I gather from what you have already said, to say that the feeling and conviction on the part of your congregations is not only unanimous, but is very deep seated?—Very, as the wording of the resolutions would prove, if I read them.

5908. And you do not believe that the religious body to which you belong could ever be induced to accept legislation based upon the principle of these Acts?—Of that I am certain.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5909. Do you know these subjected districts at all, personally?—Not one of them.

5910. You have never been in any of them?—Not any.

5911. You could not give me any sort of idea of the number of your ministers who carry on their ministrations in the subjected districts?—Not one of them. We have not a single church in any of those districts; we exist mainly in the northern and midland counties.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

5912. Do you belong to the Wesleyan Methodist body?—I belong to the Methodist New Connexion, so called, though it is the oldest Methodist Church in existence.

5913. It is a different body from the Wesleyan body?—It separated from the Wesleyan body on questions of church polity in 1797.

5914. When do you carry on your ministrations?—I have no pastoral appointment; I am the editor of our denomination. I issue several monthly magazines, the hymn books of the denomination, the tune books, and all the Sunday school literature, as well as other kinds of literature.

5915. Have you ever resided in a subjected district?—No.

5916. Have you read the evidence which has been given by ministers of religion and others who are favourable to the continuance of these

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

Acts?—I have not. I did not know that any such evidence exists from ministers of religion.

5917. You have never read the Report of the Committee, and the evidence given to them during last year and in 1879?—The only reports I have read of the evidence given before this Committee are those which have been issued within the last few months.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5918. You have not read the Report of 1881?—I think not.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

5919. You have never taken any trouble to ascertain what evidence has been given by those resident in the subjected districts with regard to these Acts?—Yes, I have seen some of it.

5920. But not all of it?—Not all, certainly.

Mr. Hopwood.

5921. But I understand you to speak, and to be entitled to speak, with great confidence of the feelings and opinions of the body that you belong to, and you have already spoken as to those feelings and opinions being almost unanimous?—Yes; and I think no minister has a better opportunity of knowing the sentiments of the denomination than I, as I am in constant correspondence with many laymen and ministers, and have been to the last 22 conferences without one exception.

5922. You are not to understand when you are told that some ministers from the subjected districts have given evidence in favour of the Acts, that the majority of the ministers from the subjected districts are in favour of them?—I should not expect that.

5923. You will, perhaps, be aware when you come to look at the evidence that there is a great body of feeling the other way on the part of ministers of religion in the districts against the Acts?—I am quite aware of that from my own personal knowledge.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

5924. Have you any return of the number of persons belonging to the denomination to which you belong?—The actual membership of the denomination is 33,000 communicants.

5925. Does that 33,000 comprise the largest number of attendants at the chapels?—Oh, dear, no; I should think five times that number at least, attend our chapels.

5926. In round numbers, what should you put as being the number of members of your congregations?—I have given simply the members of the churches, the communicants.

5927. That is a technical distinction; but, generally, how many members of the Methodist New Connexion are there altogether in the United Kingdom?—I should think the worshippers will number quite 140,000.

5928. That is including the 33,000 communicants?—Yes, including those. Then we have, 80,000 Sunday scholars of all ages. In Lancashire, we have Sunday scholars 70 years of age.

5929. That would make 220,000 men, women, and children?—Broadly speaking, yes.

5930. Of

9 May 1882.]

Rev. C. D. WARD, D.D.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

5930. Of whom about 140,000 would be adults?
—Yes, fully that, because many of the Sunday scholars are adults.

5931. The Sunday scholars would not be capable of understanding the Acts?—They would be capable of being subjected to them.

5932. But when you speak of those who are against the Acts in the Methodist New Connexion, the object of my question was to know what proportion of the adult population it represented, and I understand that it would be about 140,000; is that so?—Yes.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5933. I think you were President of your Conference in 1876, were you not?—I was.

5934. You have been asked whether you have read the evidence of certain people who have given evidence before this Committee in favour of the Acts, and you say that you have not read much of that evidence; have you read the evidence of Mr. Tuffield, the Congregationalist minister at Woolwich?—I have not.

5935. The opinions which you have expressed as representing your denomination are opinions hostile to this legislation on moral and religious grounds?—Yes.

5936. They are objections of principle?—Yes.

5937. And I take it for granted that those objections of principle lie deep in your convictions, and that they would not be affected by the evidence of other people professing to speak of the practical good consequences of the Acts?—Not at all, I believe.

5938. You came here to represent the moral and religious convictions of a given denomination, and you say, in their name, that they protest against this legislation, as immoral?—I do, most decidedly.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.
Dr. Farquharson.
Mr. William Fowler.

Mr. Hopwood.
Mr. Osborne Morgan.
Mr. Stansfeld.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. RICHARD HANSON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5939. ARE you now an Army Scripture Reader in Woolwich?—Yes.

5940. Have you acted in that capacity since October last?—Yes.

5941. Will you give us the particulars of your military service; when did you enter the army?—In 1855.

5942. At what age did you enlist?—At 14.

5943. Then you enlisted for the band?—Yes.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5944. What they call boy service, I suppose?—Yes; four years' boy service.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5945. Then your service for pension would begin in 1859, at the age of 18?—Yes.

5946. And 21 years would bring it to 1880, and I understand that you were discharged as a pensioner in 1880?—Yes.

5947. To go back to your period of 21 years' service, promotion in the band is slower and more difficult than from the ranks, is it not?—Yes, it is.

5948. Will you give us the particulars of your promotion during your period of service?—I was made lance corporal in 1865, corporal in 1868, lance serjeant in 1873, drum major in 1878; and I was discharged as drum major.

5949. I need hardly ask you whether those particulars of promotion are not a guarantee, and a proof of the respectability of your services in the army?—Yes; my parchment certificate stated, at the time I was promoted to the rank of drum major, that I was in possession of four good-conduct badges, and if I had not then been of the rank of serjeant, which was equivalent to drum major, I should have been in possession of five good-conduct badges; but serjeants do not hold good-conduct badges.

5950. What was your regiment?—The 9th.

5951. Therefore you served 25 years?—I served 25 years in that same regiment, and in the same battalion the whole of the time.

5952. During those 25 years, which take us back to the year 1855, your regiment was doubtless stationed at various places?—Yes.

5953. Was it ever stationed at places called subjected or protected districts, under the Contagious Diseases Acts?—Yes.

5954. Was it stationed at one time at Aldershot?—Yes.

5955. In what year?—Part of 1875 and part of 1876.

5956. Was it also stationed for a year at Colchester?—Yes, we went from Aldershot to Colchester in 1876, and left Colchester in 1877.

5957. Was it also for other periods stationed abroad in colonies where systems more or less similar to the Contagious Diseases Acts were in force?—Yes.

5958. In what places?—The regiment was a little more than three years stationed in Corfu, one year in Cephalonia, and a little more than a year in Gibraltar.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5959. Was it not a voluntary system in Gibraltar?—Not then. The whole of the prostitutes in Gibraltar lived in one quarter called the Ramps, and they were all inspected every Saturday.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5960. In what year was that?—I went there in 1864, and left in 1865. We were a little more than a year there.

5961. You have, have you not, in consequence of this varied experience, had opportunities of observing the effect of the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts and of similar systems upon the minds of your fellow soldiers in England as well as elsewhere?—Yes.

5962. Can you tell us of your own knowledge how such men generally regard these Acts?—I believe as a rule that the body of the soldiers approve of the Acts, and for this reason, that they do not know very much of the Acts as Acts of Parliament, but they know that a system is in existence which provides for the inspection of prostitutes, and so very much in their opinion lessens the probability of their contracting venereal disease; and, as a body, I am bound to say that the men who are addicted to consorting with prostitutes like the Acts, and they are in favour of them; I am sure of it.

5963. Do

12 May 1882.]

Mr. HANSON.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

5963. Do they regard the Acts as legislation whose object it is to ascertain the condition of the woman, in order that men may consort with her without becoming diseased?—They do.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5964. Do you know that from what men have told you?—From living in the barrack-room amongst the men.

5965. And hearing soldiers say what you have told us?—Yes; it has been the common talk.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5966. In any future questions that I put to you, please understand that the Committee wishes for no statement except that which is founded upon your own experience. If you have heard men express certain opinions and give evidence of certain influence brought to bear upon their minds by the Acts, give us that evidence; but if you have simply heard one man say that another man had said something to such and such an effect, do not give us the result of that?—I will bear that in mind.

5967. Do I correctly understand from you now that, from what you have during this period of service of yours from time to time yourself heard men say of themselves, and for themselves, you express the opinion that that is the way in which they regard these Acts?—Yes.

5968. What practical consequences have you observed to flow from this view which the men have, not unnaturally, adopted with regard to these Acts; in the first place, have you observed an increased indulgence of their passions?—I believe, from my own observation, that men do consort with prostitutes more generally than they used to, and more openly. I am sure they do, more openly. I know that when I enlisted men would not have been allowed to walk the streets with known prostitutes, but they would have been taken into custody and put into the guard-room, and brought before the commanding officer. But now no notice is taken; men do walk the streets with prostitutes at all hours; they can get out in the town at all hours, and nothing is said.

5969. And the men do not attempt to hide themselves?—No.

5970. Is it within your knowledge, from what you have heard men say, that they regard the system as being a permission to them to consort with women whose health is supervised by Government officials?—It is within my knowledge.

5971. And the great fact, from your own observation, to which you have just drawn our attention, is this: that they used to avoid being seen with prostitutes, and that if they were seen they were arrested?—Yes; it was altogether more a thing of the dark in former days.

5972. And now they have no hesitation in parading the streets and the neighbourhood of the camp openly with women?—They have not.

5973. Speaking simply from your experience, and from what you have yourself heard, what can you say as to the effect upon their minds with respect to the idea of moral blame as attached to the practice of sexual vice?—In visiting the hospital in Woolwich, and speaking to the men who are there under treatment for venereal disease, I find it a difficult thing, in many cases, to get the man to acknowledge that it has been wrong at all; he declares in almost every case that it is a necessity, and that it cannot be helped; and he pleads, in fact it has been pleaded to me over and over again, that there are wiser people than he and I, and that if they did not know that men who were not allowed to marry must go with women, the women would not be inspected in order to see that they were free from disease.

0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.

5974. Who are those wiser men to whom the soldiers refer?—They mean the Government.

5975. And the Legislature who pass the Acts?—Yes.

5977. Do they complain that that provision has not been efficacious?—The men really, I think, consider it pretty much a matter of chance whether they get diseased or not. There is a certain risk they think. Those who have had venereal disease two or three times, know that there is a risk. But, from what I know of the younger men coming from country districts, when this matter is brought before them by conversation with men who are addicted to it, the older soldiers, they are led to believe that it is pretty safe, and that there is no danger of disease.

5978. And they naturally feel rather injured when the defence which they relied upon fails them?—They are very sorry because they have got the disease.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5979. You are speaking now of what you know yourself?—Yes. Then I see, from time to time in the Herbert Hospital, a pretty large number of men; I am there at least twice a-week, and sometimes three times a-week, in all the wards of the hospital.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5980. Then, I understand you to say, not only that men now consort openly, and walk about with prostitutes, but that they are allowed to do so?—Yes, no notice is taken. The pickets would pass up and down the streets of Woolwich now in the evenings, and would take no notice of a man, even having a prostitute on each arm. That could not have been done in olden times when I was a boy. In the streets of Limerick it would not have been allowed.

5981. You are not, I take it, able to say what is the cause of this change of view on the part of the military authorities?—I can see no other cause for it, except that the fact of the women being examined, recognises a necessity of the soldier's consorting with prostitutes.

5982. That

12 May 1882.]

Mr. HANSON.

[Continued.]

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5982. That is your own inference, of course?—That is all.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5983. Then what you would say, as I understand, is this: that without knowing what the views of the authorities may be, it would appear to you to be a somewhat inconsistent proceeding, by specific legislation and at a large national cost, to register and inspect women to ascertain that they are fit for prostitution, and then to arrest soldiers and send them to the guard room if they are seen with them?—It would be simply nonsense, according to my idea.

5984. Have you observed any difference in this respect: do you under the Acts find the consorting of soldiers with prostitutes, not only more open, but more systematic than it used to be in former days?—It is.

5985. Is it the result of your observation that, in former days, it was very often the case of a drunken soldier who was accosted by a woman, whereas now a man deliberately, as a matter of business, goes out to meet such women?—Men do so more frequently than they used to do. In fact some of the women actually send notes to the men in hospital, and I have observed them coming up to the hospital to visit the men who are ill, and I could be certain that some of them were prostitutes.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5986. Are you speaking now of the Soldiers' Hospital at Woolwich?—I am speaking of the Herbert Hospital for troops.

5987. The general soldiers' hospital?—Yes.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5988. Then I understand you to say that you are under the impression, from what you have seen, without being able absolutely to prove it, that so recognised is this association of soldiers and registered prostitutes under the Acts, that you believe the soldiers themselves are visited in the hospital by women?—Yes. I am not very well acquainted with the prostitutes of Woolwich; my work does not lie amongst them; but from a service of 25 years in the army, I think I know a prostitute pretty well when I see her.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

5989. Some of the women you believe from your knowledge of the class to be prostitutes?—Yes. Taking the fact that the men are in hospital with venereal disease, and that the men do not belong to that station, and have no relations there, and that they are not a class of men to have respectable friends; and then again taking the appearance of the women whom I have seen, all those things put together, convince me that sometimes prostitutes get into the hospital.

5990. You judge from the appearance of the women, and not from your knowledge of them?—Not from my knowledge of her.

Mr. Stansfeld.

5991. You said that the soldiers consorted with prostitutes, not only more openly but more systematically than formerly, as I understood?—As far back as 1861 (that was the first experience I had of a place where anything like these Acts was in existence) I rejoined my regiment after an absence from it of two years. I had been sent to the Military Music School, Kneller Hall, which was instituted for the training of musicians and for bandmasters, and during my absence from the regiment they had embarked and proceeded to Corfu. I rejoined them in 1861; they had then been there for a year and seven months, or a year and eight months, and during all that time they had been in contact with this system that existed there of the inspection of women. I then joined my band, and I found a difference in the conversation in the rooms. One is almost ashamed to think of it. I have heard the most disgusting details as to the visits of the men to the prostitutes' quarters. In the summer time the men were not allowed out without a pass, in consequence of the heat; but many of the men used to get passes from one o'clock in the day, for the sole purpose of going to consort with prostitutes. This I have never known in England, or in Ireland; and I have never known such disgusting talk as I heard then about what the women did with the men, and what the men did to the women. I was perfectly astounded, and I could only conclude from the conversation that I heard that it was the result of this system of inspection. Besides that almost the first day I went on parade with my regiment after this absence of two years, I noticed a young man going out of the barracks and a corporal with him. It was rather an unusual hour; I knew that this young man had gone to hospital sick that morning, and I asked why he was going. Some one told me that everybody who went into hospital with venereal disease was sent out under charge of a non-commissioned officer to find the woman who gave him the disease. There was a good deal of laughing and canvassing as to who the woman was. I had never known this at home where prostitution was essentially a thing of the dark.

5992. Have you had at all a similar experience in subjected districts in England as compared with unsubjected districts in England?—I really do not think that the men themselves distinguish much now between the subjected districts and the unsubjected districts. They go from place to place, and there is a sort of hazy idea that all our military stations have this system; and sometimes, in fact in most instances I believe, the men do not realise that they have removed from a subjected district to an unsubjected district, or vice versa, so that the conversation has become much the same in one as in the other.

5993. Has the conversation become deteriorated to a certain extent in the sense to which you have just alluded; do you find that these subjects are more freely discussed in the barrack-room, and with more disgusting details than used to be the case?—They are; I am confident of that. In the olden times, though soldiers' wives used to live in the corners of the rooms with nothing between their beds and the single men's beds but a blanket screen, and I am bound to say that in those days the soldiers perhaps were many of them hard drinkers, and were not so well educated as they are now, still there was a sort of native native honour about them, so that there never was any vile or obscene talk in the room. I am bound to say that for the old soldiers; I remember them well. But I am afraid that if such were the case now there would be very frequently things said that no woman could listen to. I do not say that this is general throughout the army, but men who are bad have become more openly obscene and vile in their language. I do not say for a moment that the army generally is lower in tone than it used to be; it is not; it is better. There are a large number of total abstainers; there is a good proportion of Christian men in the army which there was not then; but the class of men who were addicted to going with prostitutes seem to be worse now than they were formerly.

5994. Now they are more brazen; that is what it comes to, is it not?—Yes.

5995. They have not the sense of shame which they would have had under earlier conditions?—Many men seem rather to glory in it. In the room to which I belonged for some years I was a non-commissioned officer, and I had for many years, more than 10 years, charge of one of the rooms where the single men of the band of my regiment lived; and I am bound to say that of late I have heard many remarks from good and moral men about the difference in the language; not the swearing, but the filthy talk.

5996. You have heard good and moral men express that opinion, but have you noticed the change yourself?—I have noticed the change myself; they have spoken to me about it.

5997. And your experience has agreed with theirs?—Yes.

5998. Have you heard soldiers talking distinctly about women being subjected to inspection with reference to the time of their visits to them?—Yes.

5999. What have you heard them say?—I have known men who have got intelligence by some means or another that a woman with whom they were in the habit of consorting was coming out of hospital, and they have declared their intention of going to see her that night, because she was coming out, and would be well.

6000. That you have yourself heard?—That I have myself heard.

6001. You do not mean only once?—No, not once only.

6002. You have heard that from time to time?—I have heard it from time to time.

6003. So as to give the impression to your mind that the men watched those times and opportunities in order to safely indulge their passions?—I believe they do.

6004. Have you ever heard the women say anything to the men about their condition?—As my regiment was passing the end of a lane where prostitutes live, when it has been an inspection day, women have been standing there, and I have heard them call out, "I am all right to-day; I am clean to-day"; and a conversation has followed amongst the men in the barrack-room, when we have got home, on the subject.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

6005. When was this?—That was some years ago; the last two or three years of my service.
0.75.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

I was married, and I was not in the barrack-room so much.

6006. It was seven or eight years ago?—Yes.

Mr. Stansfeld.

6007. There is a case of a young recruit at Woolwich, is there not, to which you desire to refer?—Yes.

6008. How long ago is that case?—That is about a month ago.

6009. Will you tell us the particulars about this young recruit?—I was going through one of the venereal wards in the Herbert Hospital, and I met a young man. This young man seemed to have rather a different face from those of a good many who were there; he seemed simpler looking. I inquired what was the matter with him, and he, with tears, declared that it was the first time he had gone wrong. He told me how he had been brought up; his parents were Christians, and had brought him up well; he had been for four or five years a total abstainer; he had only been enlisted for three weeks, and he had been persuaded by one or two of the older soldiers to go down to a public-house and have some drink, and he had got excited, and they had persuaded him to go with a woman; and I gathered from him that he thought from what they said that there was not much danger. He assured me that he had resolved before God that he would never have anything to do with them again. That young man has gone away, but I believe he has kept his determination.

6010. But did he state to you that he was tempted by the promise of immunity from disease held out to him by his comrades?—I do not believe he said that distinctly; but he gathered from their advice to him and their temptation, that it was safe. I could not say that he did distinctly say that.

6011. Am I right in imagining that you distinctly understood from this young recruit that one of the causes of his being led to this act was the belief, or expectation, that he would not suffer physical consequences?—He did not tell me so.

Mr. Hopwood.

6012. You used the words "there was not much danger;" what did you refer to?—He thought there was not much danger, but he did not say distinctly anything about these Acts, or about the inspection of the women. He was a young lad, who had been only three weeks up from the country, and, I suppose, really hardly knew of such a system at all; and he was inflamed by drink at the time.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

6013. And he probably did not know what he was doing?—He may not have been able to give perfect details.

Mr. Stansfeld.

6014. You are aware, are you not, that in subjected or protected stations, when a regiment, or troop, or a single soldier returning from furlough, enters that station they are examined, personally, in order to ascertain whether they are diseased; and that if they are diseased, they are

are sent to hospital, and that if not, they are let alone?—I am aware of that.

6015. And you are aware, are you not, that that rule obtains only in subjected districts, and that in other districts that precaution is not taken?—Not now.

6016. What is your opinion of that system of examination of the men?—It is very offensive indeed to a good number of men; others do not mind it at all.

6017. Do you think that it is demoralising?—I think it is. When 20 men, and some barely men amongst them, lads of 16 and 17, are together in a room and in the sight of each other are inspected in what, I must say, is a disgusting manner sometimes, it must be demoralising in its effect on those youths.

6018. You are not in favour, therefore, of the periodical examination of men, in order to render less objectionable upon the ground of justice, the examination of women?—I am not in favour of examination as it is at present conducted.

6019. The Committee, from your evidence, know that you are opposed to the system of examination of women; are you, or are you not, altogether opposed to the examination of soldiers?—I am not altogether opposed to it.

6020. But to the indiscriminate examination of every soldier upon entering a subjected district you are opposed?—Yes.

6021. For instance, let us see what that system of indiscriminate examination implies. There are, are there not, in almost all regiments, instances of moral, religious, and temperate men who do not consort with these women?—There are men of that character.

6022. Do not those men feel it an indignity to have to submit to examination?—They do.

6023. Especially in the same room with, and in sight of other men?—Yes, especially when some of the other men are men who have lost all modesty, and who make fun of the blush of shame that appears in the cheek of the modest young man. That makes it more offensive.

6024. Are any men exempt from this examination?—Only married men; they are exempt.

6025. But I suppose it sometimes occurs that those married men would be better for examination, does it not, or at any rate that they might be found not free from disease?—I have known cases of married men contracting disease, and I have known cases of married men who consorted with prostitutes, and who boasted of it; and they were not subjected to inspection.

6026. And they would somewhat enjoy their exemption from inspection?—That class of men would.

6027. Have you known them laugh at or jeer the moral single man whom there was no need to examine, for the necessity of having to submit to the examination?—I have; I have heard a married man say to a single man, who strongly objected to it, "Oh, I wouldn't care if I was inspected every day," and I have heard him laugh at him for his objections. There is a man who is still in my regiment; I remember his enlistment; he came to the regiment a total abstainer and a thoroughly good man; he remained so all my time; I knew him 12 years, and I am sure that, in the mind of anyone in the regiment, there never was the slightest suspicion that this man consorted with prostitutes; but he had to go in to the examination the same as the others, and I, as the serjeant who paraded the band, had no power, although he was a very dear friend of mine, to say, "You need not come;" I was bound to parade him the same as the others, and I felt it a wrong myself; and there were two or three other men too who ought not to have been subjected to examination.

6028. You have read Captain Harris's Returns, have you not?—I have looked at some parts of them.

6029. You were in Aldershot in 1875 and 1876, were you not?—Yes, part of both years.

6030. I have before me Captain Harris's Return for the year 1880; and, in Return, No. 3, page 21, I find the total number of brothels at Aldershot, including public-houses, beerhouses, and private houses, is put down at 26 in the year 1875; what do you say to those figures?—I never counted those places, but I am inclined to think that there must have been three times that number.

6031. The exact figures are these: in the year 1875, private houses in which women resided and practised prostitution, 22; private houses in which accommodation was indiscriminately provided to all comers for the purpose of prostitution, 2; and others, coffee-houses, &c., 2; you do not believe those figures?—The place seemed to me to literally swarm with prostitutes; it is not a large town, but there used to be an enormous number of prostitutes; they seemed to live in houses all over the place.

6032. Do you know the extent of the district under the Contagious Diseases Acts at Aldershot?—It included all the surrounding places; I have been out to most of the little surrounding places, because I was on the local preacher's list of the Wesleyan's there while I was a serjeant, and I used to go round to wherever there was a Wesleyan chapel.

6033. I find in the first schedule to the Act of 1869 that the Aldershot district comprises a number of parishes in the county of Surrey and the county of Hants, the total number being 23 parishes; you are not disposed to think that there is only one house per parish where prostitution is practised, and three over?—No.

6034. I find in the same Return that the number of prostitutes in that year is put down at 142; does that accord with your observation and experience, or not?—No.

6035. Do you say the same that you said of the brothels, viz., that you should have thought the number was not less than three times as great?—Not less, I should have thought.

6036. Have you read the evidence of the Rev. Dr. Osborn, the President of the Wesleyan Conference?—I have.

6037. Speaking, not merely as an Army Scripture Reader, but speaking in your private and individual capacity, do you agree in the moral and religious objections stated by Dr. Osborn to this Committee, against the Contagious Diseases Acts?—I do.

6038. Is it within your knowledge that those moral and religious objections are shared generally by those whom you would call the moral and and religious men in the service?—They are. Of course when you say the men, I mean those with whom I have come in contact, of the non-commissioned officer, and private ranks. I cannot say much for the officers. I do not come in contact with the officers much.

6039. You mean those men with whom you have come in contact, and whom you have found to be moral and religious men who have joined, I suppose, in religious services with you?—Yes, who are members of the Bible class at the Home, and members of the Temperance Society.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

6040. You would not go so far as to say that no moral and religious man was in favour of the Acts, would you?—No, I would not say that.

Mr. Hopwood.

6041. On the other hand, perhaps you do not know any one that is in favour of them?—Yes, I do; the great body of the men, the majority of men of moral character, men who themselves are not addicted to this vice, are of opinion that it tends to demoralise the men by making the thing easy, and, as they think, safe.

Mr. Stansfeld.

6042. And that you undertake to say, from your own experience, is the greatly preponderating opinion, to say the least, of moral and religious men in the army?—So far as I know, it is.

6043. Have you yourself met with cases of moral and religious private soldiers, who nevertheless favoured these Acts?—I have met with men who were really good men, but who were in favour of the Acts, because they believed that they had the effect of lessening the disease, and of modifying the character of the disease.

6044. And those men were tempted to waive their moral and religious objections upon hygienic grounds?—Yes, they thought of the lessening of the nursery attendant upon the disease.

6045. But those men would be quite exceptions in your experience, would they not?—I was talking last night to a man of that character, and I wanted to get what he thought of these Acts, and he started by taking that ground. He is a man I have known for some years. I knew him in Aldershot before; he is now in Woolwich. We entered into conversation upon the operation of these Acts, and he began to recollect as to what he had seen, and I believe he is inclined now to hold the other view, that the Acts are morally wrong, and therefore cannot be physically right.

6046. But I understand you to say explicitly, judging from the men with whom you yourself have come in personal contact, that the large majority of the moral and religious men in the service are opposed to these Acts?—Yes.

Dr. Farquharson.

6047. With regard to the Acts at Gibraltar, was Gibraltar ever actually under a system like that of the Acts, or was it only a voluntary measure?

Dr. Farquharson—continued.

nicipal arrangement?—That I cannot say. I only know that the women were inspected on one certain day.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

6048. Were they compulsorily inspected?—Yes, every one of them had to be inspected every Saturday. That was in 1864 and 1865.

Dr. Farquharson.

6049. Do you think from your military experience that in the olden times, before the Acts were introduced, men were deterred from fornication by the fear of catching disease; do you think that they reflected beforehand?—I think they did.

6050. And you think that acted as a deterrent?—I do not think that in former days men, as a rule, contracted venereal disease while they were sober; I do not think they much went with prostitutes while they were sober; they did not form the plans of going with prostitutes so much. And there was another thing; I am bound to say that when I was in Limerick there were some terrible cases in the hospital of venereal disease, and they must have had a deterrent effect on the men. Ugly stories went round among the men of some who had got so bad that they had to be smothered.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

6051. When was this?—In Limerick, many years ago, 25 years ago.

Dr. Farquharson.

6052. Are there any rumours of that sort about now as to the nature of the disease?—No.

6053. Do you hear opinions that the disease has been lessened in intensity since the Acts have been put in operation?—I do.

6054. In former days, I think, you stated that the men were arrested if they were seen walking with prostitutes, and that that constituted a military offence?—Yes.

6055. Are they still arrested in towns which are not under the Acts if they are seen walking with prostitutes?—Not anywhere that I know of.

6056. There is no difference in that respect between towns under the Acts and towns not under the Acts?—No.

6057. Do you think, from your experience, that more men consort with women now than in former days; from your recollections of Woolwich, for instance, do you think that men practice fornication more largely now than they used to do in the olden times before the Acts?—I think they do.

6058. But that is, I suppose, an impression in your mind; of course you cannot give statistics?—I think they do. There is more carelessness about the way in which they speak of it.

6059. But that would not necessarily imply a greater amount of vice; they may talk more about it, but of course that is a very different thing from actually going with the women; do you think they actually go more with women

Mr. HANSON.

than they used to in the olden days?—They would not talk about it if they did not do it.

6060. We are told that there is a considerable number of clandestine prostitutes in these towns that are under the Acts; I suppose that if the men have as much confidence, as you say they have, in this Government provision of clean women for them, they do not associate with the clandestine prostitutes?—But the men would not know all the women who were protected; I take it that no soldier in Woolwich would know half the women that were, or were not, protected.

6061. I thought one of your great arguments against the Acts was that the men knew when the women came clean out of the hospital?—In some cases.

6062. But I thought your general argument was that the Acts increased their consorting with women, because they thought these women were clean?—The men who are given to the company of prostitutes in Woolwich believe that the women are all inspected.

6063. Then it is evident that they have not taken pains to make themselves acquainted with the provisions of the Acts?—I think I said that all that the men considered about the Acts was that there was a system of inspection of the women by which they were, in a sense, kept free from disease, sent to hospital if they were suffering from disease, and sent out again when they were well. I do not think that the general knowledge of the men of the army as to the Acts is much more than that.

6064. As regards the disgusting details which you heard in the regiment on your joining it in Corfu, the details had reference to what passed in Corfu, had they not?—Yes.

6065. Have you any knowledge as to the condition of the women there, and whether their mode of conducting themselves may be more degraded than in this country, and whether that may not have made a special impression upon these men's minds and induced them to furnish you with these details?—Prostitutes are pretty much the same everywhere.

6066. As regards the deterioration in the conversation of the men which you observed, may not some of that be due to the impression made upon your own mind being stronger on these points than it used to be?—But it was just then, in 1861, that it made that very strongest impression, when I went from England to Corfu and got among them, and found the difference of tone which had crept, I suppose, over the men during those two years that I was absent from the regiment.

6067. They were the same men, I think; you admitted that the tone of feeling and morality of the army generally is better than it used to be years ago?—Yes, the men are soberer. As a whole, the army is soberer.

6068. Of course, that would indicate rather that the Contagious Diseases Acts have not any general deteriorating effect upon the army?—There have been other influences at work that have, in a sense, counteracted that. In these towns there were no Scripture readers, there were scarcely any recreation rooms, there was nothing for the soldier but the canteen, or the public-house. A Bible class saw almost unknown; there was not such a thing, I believe, as a regimental temperance society. Taking into account the improved moral tone of the army at large, all these things must be reckoned for.

6069. One word about the alleged demoralising influence of the medical inspections. I do not know how you conduct matters in your regiment, but in the regiment with which I was formerly connected, and in which I made many hundreds of inspections, those inspections were never conducted in sight of the different men; they were always carefully introduced into a corner and inspected one by one; was not that so in your regiment?—No; the men fell in a line in the barrack-room, and were all inspected one after the other as the surgeon walked along.

6070. That is very objectionable, but that is only a detail of the examination. In my old regiment we examined them very carefully in a corner of the room shut off from the rest of the men, and the examination conducted with all decency?—There cannot be any decency about it to a decent modest man; it is indecent altogether.

6071. But I think you said that you did not object to the indiscriminate examination of soldiers?—I said I did object to the indiscriminate examination of soldiers.

6072. I think you indicated that you did not object altogether to the examination of soldiers?—I objected to the indiscriminate examination of soldiers.

6073. You said that you have frequently known diseased married men, I think?—I did not say frequently; I said I had known some.

6074. You would not believe in the panacea recommended by some of the witnesses here as a preventive of immorality, i. e., to allow universal matrimony in the army?—There are immoral married civilians, as well as immoral married soldiers.

6075. I do not wish to cast any aspersions upon the army; I only wish to know what your view would be on this point; do you think it desirable to allow universal matrimony in the army, in order to check disease?—There never would be universal matrimony. I do not see why men of good character should not be allowed to marry, provided that the women they were going to marry were of good character.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

6076. Would you allow every soldier to marry?—Every man of good character if he could find a young woman of good character too who was willing to marry him.

6077. You think it would not interfere with the efficiency of the army?—I do not think it would.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.

6078. You would not allow a man to marry a prostitute?—Certainly not; I would not allow a known prostitute to be brought in to associate on terms of equality with the other women.

6079. Are you opposed to the Acts; would you desire to see the Acts repealed?—I should be glad to see them repealed, but I should not be glad to return to the old state of things which allowed allowed some poor unfortunate women to die of venereal disease on a heap of straw in the corner of a brothel.

6080. Then what you would desire to see is some modification or alteration of the Acts?—I should certainly like there to be ready access to a hospital for a woman who was diseased.

6081. And would you desire that she should be detained there until she was cured?—I think she would wish to stay there until she was cured.

6082. I understand your view to be that there should be hospitals maintained at the expense of the Government where these poor women, whom you so feelingly describe, should be received and treated for venereal disease?—I would not have hospitals for these special cases. I would have the women able to get into any hospital for the treatment of sick people.

6083. All the hospitals for the treatment of that disease are special hospitals, practically?—Yes, but why could they not go into other hospitals which are not specially for venereal disease?

6084. Are you aware that at the present moment the general hospitals do not receive venereal patients?—No, I am not. If they do not do so they ought to.

6085. Is it not your opinion that there should be hospital accommodation provided for these suffering women?—Yes.

6086. Must not that be provided by the State?—If the voluntary effort of the people of the country would not meet it it would have to be done by the State.

6087. Are you not aware that at the present moment the voluntary efforts of the country are insufficient for the purpose?—I am aware that they are; but it may be that they are deterred by the operation of these Acts.

6088. You desire to see a sufficient provision for these suffering women?—Yes.

6089. Supposing that these suffering women are admitted into Lock hospitals, do you think that it is expedient that they should be detained there until they are cured?—I do not believe in Lock hospitals at all; I do not believe they ought to be in there.

6090. Supposing that there are women taken into hospitals to be cured of venereal disease (it does not matter whether in a Lock hospital or in any other hospital), when once they are in the hospital, do you think it expedient that they should be detained there until they are cured?—Yes, I believe they have as much right to be detained until they are cured of that as they would have to be detained until they were cured of small-pox.

6091. I understood you to say that you were aware of cases where soldiers in hospitals, both for venereal disease and for other complaints, have been visited by prostitutes; do you know of any such cases from your own knowledge?—I said I believed some of the women to be prostitutes?—I did not say that I could prove that they were prostitutes, or that I was certain of it.

6092. Have you, yourself, seen soldiers being visited by any of these women whom you have thus described?—Yes.

6093. But you only believed by their general appearance that they were prostitutes?—And, as 0.75.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck—continued.

I said before, from the character of the men, and from the disease that they were suffering from. All these things together led me to the opinion that the women were prostitutes.

6094. But you did not know positively that they belonged to that class?—Practically a man cannot say that he knows a woman to be a prostitute unless he has seen her in the act of prostitution.

6095. And you had never seen them in the act of prostitution?—No.

6096. Do you believe that the soldiers distinguish between subjected districts and unsubjected districts, and that when they are in a subjected district, they indulge more freely in fornication than when they are in an unsubjected district?—I said before that I did not think the men at all knew when they passed from a subjected district to a subjected district.

6097. You think it made no impression upon them?—Not a bit.

6098. Are you stationed at Woolwich now?—Yes.

6099. Have you been there any considerable time?—No, not very long; a year and eight months.

6100. Have you ever seen any indecent conduct there on the part of the registered prostitutes going to the examination rooms?—No, I did not know where the examination room was until I read Mr. Krause's evidence.

6101. Have you ever seen anything peculiarly indecent in the conduct of the registered women who consort with soldiers at Woolwich?—Not more in Woolwich than anywhere else.

6102. Have you read any of the evidence that has been given before this Committee by those persons who are in favour of these Acts?—No, I do not think I have.

6103. You have not read Mr. Tuffield's evidence?—I know Mr. Tuffield well, but I have not seen Mr. Tuffield's evidence.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

6104. Will you excuse me asking you what is the exact position of an Army Scripture reader; by whom are you employed?—By the Army Scripture Reader's Society.

6105. You have no official position recognised by the military authorities have you?—No; permission is always given for the Army Scripture readers to go about amongst the men and to visit them in barrack quarters.

6106. You are employed by a society which devotes itself to that laudable purpose?—Yes.

6107. You spoke of the state of things which existed before the Acts; I presume, from the length of your service, you had ample opportunity of observing the state of things to which you referred, which prevailed before 1864, had you not?—Yes.

6108. I suppose that the condition of those poor women at that time was very terrible, was it not?—I was a boy when I enlisted, but still I heard men talk about the terrible things that happened as regarded the women.

6109. When you spoke of these shocking instances of disease, were you speaking of the men, or of the women, or of both?—Of both.

6110. You, of course, had a great deal of
M M experience

experience while you were in the army, both of subjected and of unsubjected districts; do I correctly understand the result of your evidence to be this: that you think that as regards the general prevalence of immorality, there is not much to choose between the one and the other?—I do not think there is.

6111. I suppose that if the increase has been equal in places under the Acts and in places not under the Acts, you could hardly attribute this increase of licentious conduct that you speak of to the operation of the Acts?—But the men go from one to the other, and they carry the habits from the subjected districts to the unsubjected districts.

6112. Would you go so far as to say that you think the effect of the operation of the Acts in the subjected districts is to demoralise the unsubjected districts?—It demoralises the soldiers.

6113. Does it demoralise the men, even when they escape, as you would put it, from the evil influences of the subjected districts into the unsubjected districts?—Yes, if a man forms the habit of consorting with prostitutes in a subjected district when he thinks it is safe, that habit is very hard to break off, and he carries it with him wherever he goes.

6114. In that way you would account for there being no difference in point of immorality between the subjected and unsubjected districts?—Yes, and regiments come and go.

6115. Has every regiment to pass through a subjected district?—Yes, a regiment rarely stays more than a year in one place.

6116. You certainly astonished me very much by saying, and I regretted very much to hear, that there had been a great increase in the licentious habits of the soldiers of late years; is not that contrary to the impression generally prevalent upon the subject. I certainly was under the impression that the soldiers were very much better behaved now than formerly?—There is not so much drunkenness; that is the thing which is taken most notice of with regard to the soldier.

6117. But surely there is not so much sexual vice in the army as there was, is there?—I think there is more.

6118. Are you aware that there is evidence the other way?—I have not seen any evidence as to that. I know that in my regiment the boys of late years went out with prostitutes; they did not in the old times.

6119. Might not that increased prevalence of sexual vice be, to some extent, owing to the short service system; the men are of course younger under the short service system than they were under the old system?—The average age of the men is younger than it was, of course.

6120. Would not that perhaps account for the greater prevalence of sexual vice, if it is the fact that there is a greater prevalence?—I do not know; I think that a man of 30 is quite as likely to be addicted to consorting with prostitutes as a man of 20.

6121. You would go so far as to say that there is more vice now in the army than there was in former days?—More of that particular kind.

6122. Notwithstanding the decrease of drunkenness and the increase of education?—I do not believe it is so much regarded as a vice or as a sin as it used to be; and so it has spread.

6123. Are you prepared to say that there is in the army generally in the unsubjected districts, as well as in the subjected districts, a greater prevalence of sexual vice than there was when you joined?—I believe so.

6124. May I ask the grounds upon which you found that rather paradoxical opinion?—From day after day and night after night seeing the soldiers with the women.

6125. In Woolwich?—And everywhere else; in Cork and in Dublin.

6126. Where has your regiment been stationed for the last five or six years?—I left the regiment in Limerick; before that we were at Kinsale; before that at Parsonstown, sometimes called Birr; before that in Dublin; before that at Colchester; before that at Aldershot; and before that at Pembroke Dock.

6127. Of course you are aware that the examination of the men is not a matter that comes under the Acts at all, but that it is purely a matter of regimental or military regulation?—How can that be? If a man went on furlough from Pembroke Dock and came back again, he would not be inspected. If he went on furlough from Aldershot and returned, he would not be inspected.

6128. But that inspection is not provided for by the Acts?—I do not see anything about it in the Acts; but still it is a consequence of the Acts.

6129. You mean that only those men who come into subjected districts are subjected to examination?—That is all.

6130. That might be altered, might it not, without any alteration of the Acts; it is a pure matter of regimental discipline, is it not?—It cannot be regimental discipline.

6131. It is a matter of military regulation, is it not?—I suppose so.

6132. In fact all those examinations of men (not the examination of women, which are statutory) are purely matters of arrangement which the military authorities could alter to-day if they liked; do you not suppose that if those examinations are conducted in the promiscuous and public and indecent way in which you state they are conducted, that might be very easily changed?—It might.

6133. It would not require an Act of Parliament to do that, of course?—No.

6134. It is a matter within the discretion and under the control of the military authorities, is it not?—Yes.

6135. I gather from what you said that you would not approve of an immediate repeal of the Acts, which would have the effect of throwing things back into the condition in which they were some years ago?—I do not think it would make things as they were that number of years ago.

6136. May I ask why not?—The sanitary inspection of towns is a good deal looked after. Those houses are not left in secret in any place as they used to be. I do not think we ever could get back to the original state of things altogether.

6137. But assuming that the result would be to throw these unfortunate women back to the state which existed, say in 1864, soon after you joined the army, you would consider that a great evil, would you not?—That would be an evil.

Mr. Hopwood.

6138. But you do not think that that would be the necessary result, do you?—I do not think so.

6139. I suppose you think that benevolent people and religious people might subscribe for hospitals for the care of these women, and for the cure of disease?—I am quite sure they would.

6140. It is, as I think you have told us, your opinion that they are some what deterred by the existence of these Acts from doing all that they might do in that direction?—I think they are.

6141. You were asked about the disgusting mode of examining men in the army in some regiments, and you were asked if that could not be changed, and you said that it could; but is that to your mind evidence of how people, when they begin these matters, get accustomed to something that is disgusting, and do not change it?—I do not altogether understand what you mean.

6142. To your mind, is the effect of the authorities indulging in such indecent matters as the examination of men, that they become hardened to the mode of doing it, as, for example, in the instance you give us, where it is done without any decency, and without any regard to the feelings of the men, who are all paraded together?—I am sure I cannot tell.

6143. The first time that one has to do with anything that is indecent is a shock, the second time it is less of a shock, and the third time, perhaps, you may become accustomed to it?—Of course there is no shock to the medical man, because he is accustomed to these examinations; he has to examine recruits, and to see sick men.

6144. And that leads him to be less careful about the feelings of those whom he has to examine?—Perhaps he does not think about it.

6145. He is hardened to it, is he not; is not that the result of the system?—It may be the result of the system.

6146. I understand you to say that you are not altogether opposed to the examination of soldiers; to what extent would you examine soldiers in regard to this matter?—I certainly would have a periodical examination of men who were pretty well known to be given to going with prostitutes, unless there was some other method of inducing them to go to hospital when they become diseased.

6147. Would there be any more difficulty in ascertaining who those men were than there is on the part of the police in ascertaining who the prostitutes are?—I do not think there would. As a non-commissioned officer I knew the men in my room well; I knew their habits; they were before me all day.

6148. I do not understand you to approve of the system, yet you would not be opposed to the examination of soldiers of bad moral character?—I believe that, as a rule, the non-commissioned officer in charge of a room would know whether any man in his room had venereal disease, or not, 0.75.

Mr. Hopwood—continued.

and if he did his duty he would see that that man was sent to hospital.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

6149. Without examination?—Without examination.

Mr. Hopwood.

6150. That is where you have reason to believe him to be diseased?—I believe it to be impossible that a man could live in a barrack room without his comrades knowing that he had venereal disease, if he had it.

6151. You have been asked about the amount of sexual immorality in the army; when you speak of an increase of sexual immorality are you speaking of that part of the army which is not what I should call the good character part of the army?—Yes.

6152. Then if the army has been improved, either in the class of men who have enlisted, or by the elevating agencies which you yourself have described, that portion of the army is, of course, of the highest character?—Yes.

6153. It has improved as compared with the old state of things?—Yes.

6154. It seems to be suggested to you that the younger a man is the more likely he is to resort to the company of prostitutes; taking the lads who enter the army at the age of 18, is that your opinion, or is it your opinion that a man must be rather older to become more hardened to the society of prostitutes?—This young man that I saw the other day was absolutely ashamed; he was a young man who had not been long from home, and he resolved that the offence should not be repeated.

6155. Then I understand that you do not adopt the idea that the younger age of the men in the army will account for the increase of sexual immorality?—I do not think it will.

6156. In fact, you quite repudiate the suggestion, do you not, that boys or young men are likely to be as hardened as those who have gone through some years of this life?—I do not think they are so likely to be hardened.

6157. As regards the difference between the conduct of men in the subjected and in the unsubjected districts, I understand your opinion to be that the effect of the Acts upon that class of men is to bring them all to a level in point of morality, whether they are in the subjected districts or in the unsubjected districts?—That is my idea; in fact, it must be so. I saw something about a return of Colonel Tucker's, whose regiment had gone from a subjected to an unsubjected district. It was plain that the men had not in any way lessened their visits to prostitutes in consequence of going to an unsubjected district, because he said that the disease immediately increased.

6158. You are speaking of Colonel Tucker's letter which has been referred to two or three times, regarding the state of his regiment at Dublin?—Yes; that would show that the men did not begin to guard themselves because they had got into an unsubjected district.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

6159. Did you know that that regiment had just come from a subjected district?—I did not; but

Mr. HANSON.

Mr. Osborne Morgan—continued.

but I concluded that it had come from a subjected district from its being alleged that the disease had so much increased in Dublin, and that there was a request on the part of that Colonel that Dublin might be placed under these Acts.

6160. But that is mere speculation on your part; you do not know, as a matter of fact, that the regiment of which Colonel Tucker had command had just come from a subjected district?—It is not altogether speculation; it could easily be verified.

6161. But you do not know, as a matter of fact, that they had come from a subjected district?—No, I do not know, but I could find out.

Mr. Hopwood.

6162. You have told us that in the ordinary course all the regiments go through the subjected districts in turn in some way?—No regiment passes through its tour of service at home without being at Aldershot once or twice.

6163. I believe this regiment of Colonel Tucker's had recently come from Zululand, but we will not follow that up any further. Your impression, as I think you have told us already, is that the effect of these Acts upon the part of the army, which is not of good character, is that immoral sexual intercourse is not regarded as a vice?—It is regarded as a necessity.

6164. And it is defended by such arguments as you have stated, that it is sanctioned by authority, and that there are surgeons provided to inspect the women?—Yes, and hospitals provided to put them in.

6165. And all this under Acts of Parliament passed for the purpose?—Yes, and the men believe that they were passed solely for their benefit.

6166. You know the fact to be that if a man goes on furlough from an unsubjected district, he is not examined on his return?—He is not.

6167. But if he goes from Aldershot (which is a subjected district) on furlough, and returns, he is examined on his return?—Yes.

6168. Is that to give the subjected districts a good chance, as compared with the unsubjected districts, of putting down the disease?—I should think it would have that effect. There is no possibility in that way of a man's importing disease from an unsubjected to a subjected district; but there is on the other hand, a possibility of a man taking disease from a subjected to an unsubjected district.

Mr. Stansfeld.

6169. Do I correctly infer from what you have stated to the Committee to day that you have in your experience met with a certain number of men in the army who, in spite of all the temptations to sexual vice which military life affords, have lived lives guiltless of that vice?—I have.

6170. And not very few?—They are a minority.

6171. But have you in your time known a considerable number of persons who have succeeded in resisting all these temptations?—Yes; and I know from the testimony of men who were formerly addicted to this vice, that some of those men have become converted to God, and have become thoroughly godly soldiers; and their testimony to me is that the disuse and discontinuance of the practice begets a strength which enables them to resist the temptation; it does away with the desire in a large measure; continued indulgence increases the appetite.

6172. The appetite grows by what it feeds upon; that is what they tell you?—That I am sure of.

6173. The men who, as you think, reasonably object to an examination of their persons are the men who have never committed themselves with women, or the men who, having committed themselves with women, have seen the error of their ways and are leading reputable lives; they consist of those two classes?—Yes.

6174. I understand you to object to any system of the indiscriminate examination of men, periodical or otherwise?—I do.

6175. Have I followed you aright in interpreting you in this sense; that your opinion is that it might be left to the non-commissioned officers in charge to report soldiers who ought to be sent to hospital, and that those soldiers should be so sent?—Yes.

6176. And you could trust to that?—Yes. There are various means of arriving at this knowledge. Men having venereal disease get into corners and begin to wash their own linen instead of giving it to the washerwoman. All these are certain indications that there is disease. If the non-commissioned officer is doing his duty he knows this, and takes steps to see that the man goes into the hospital.

6177. Are not those really truer indications of probable disease than would necessarily be found in a cursory and perfunctory examination such as often occurs?—I think so.

6178. Let me bring you back to a question of the Chairman's. He concluded his examination by asking you whether you would not consider it an evil to go back to the condition of things which existed before 1864, and your answer appeared to be an assenting answer?—But I said I did not think we could get back to that system altogether.

6179. What was the state of things that existed before 1864, to which you would not wish to return?—The utter neglect of the poor women. People seem to think then that they were fallen and degraded as low as they could possibly be, and they did not think about them, and never touched them, but they were left to die as they chose.

Mr. Osborne Morgan.

6180. They were left to die, in fact?—I do not believe that the people of England would allow it to be so now.

Mr. Stansfeld.

6181. In those days, if I have correctly followed your very interesting evidence, on the one hand there was no recognition of vice, but there was no care for the vicious. The women were left to rot and to die; no hospitals were provided for them?—No.

6182. And the men were allowed to get drunk.

MR HANSON.

drunk, and though they were not allowed to parade the streets with the women, they were not prevented from going with them; and they very often consorted with them in a condition of drunkenness when they would be most likely to become diseased?—Yes, and it was bidden altogether then; it was a thing of the night then.

6183. Since then we have by a kind of revulsion come to a different state of things, that is to say, recognition and strict supervision; and I understood you to say that you would not wish to go back to the neglect of the period prior to 1864, but you are not to be understood as in any way approving the alternative into which we have drifted?—No, I do not approve of that.

6184. First of all, I take the case of the soldier; a great deal that has been done to render the soldier healthier since 1864, I presume you strongly approve of; all measures for the innocent employment of his time, all measures for the cleanliness of his person, and for the improvement of the sanitary conditions which surround him; all those, I take it, you approve of?—Yes, and they have had good effects.

6185. And you would attribute the great improvement in the condition and character of the soldier to those measures?—Yes.

6186. With regard to the women, I take it that you would approve of there being proper medical care in hospital or out hospital, as the case may be, provided for women suffering from the diseases which are the result of sexual vice, and that you disapprove of the utter neglect of that class of disease?—Yes, I believe that something of this kind ought to be done. You might have homes, whose first purpose was to reclaim the poor women, with hospitals attached.

6187. We have had the evidence before us of Mr. Cooper of the Rescue Society in London; I do not know whether you know that gentleman by name?—I have seen his name, but I am not acquainted with him.

The Reverend RICHARD WATSON ALLEN, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stansfeld.

6195. You are, I believe, a Wesleyan minister at Woolwich?—I am.

6196. How long have you been there?—Nearly three years.

6197. Where were you before?—At Aldershot for seven years.

6198. And before that where were you?—At Chatham for two years.

6199. We had before us the other day the President of the Conference of your denomination, the Rev. Dr. Osborn; and the Judge Advocate General, at Questions 4833 and 4834, asked him this: "Then you do not speak from personal knowledge of what goes on in any of them" (that is to say, in the subjected districts)?—"A. No, how can I? I am living far away from them, and am occupied with another class of duties altogether. One of the Army chaplains would be able to give full information in regard to what he has seen in more than one of the subjected districts. Q. I am not questioning your evidence 0.75.

Mr. Stansfeld—continued.
